A STREET WAIF.

A NOBLE WORK OF RESCUE.

Dr. Thomas J. Barnardo and His Many Homes for England's Child-Waifs—Thousands Lifted from the Slums.

WHILE the philanthropies of London are commensurate with its size and vast population, they are still sadly inadequate, as far as affording general relief to the great majority of the poor and distressed of the English metropolis is concerned. Among the noblest of those philanthropies, and one that strikes at the very root of the vice and misery common to all great cities, is that conducted by Dr. T. J. Barnardo, who, for many years has devoted his energies and means to the care of the homeless and helpless children. What the late Rev. Charles. L. Brace, of the Children's Aid Society, did for the waifs and strays of New York, Dr. Barnado has done for those of London and many other cities beside. So widespread are his charitable projects that he is known throughout England as the "Destitute Children's Friend," and it would be hard indeed to find, in Victoria's little kingdom, one more worthy of this title of affectionate admiration.

Thomas J. Barnardo was born in Dublin, Ireland, forty-seven years ago. He was converted in his nineteenth year, and resolving to consecrate himself to the Lord's work in the mission field, he went to London with the view of securing the medical and other training necessary to the work of a missionary in China. His father—a good but worldly man—strongly opposed this project, believing that such a course would be the wasting of a career of promise. Young Barnardo, however, was resolute and entered London Hospital in 1866 as a medical student. During the years he spent in this capacity, he became acquainted with the poor of the modern Babylon, his duties taking him much among them. It was not long before the serious-minded young student recognized that his real field of duty lay near at hand, instead of in distant China. It was one of the indications of Divine leading, so frequent in the lives of those who have consecrated their time and talents to the Master's service.

Dr. Barnardo, who was then about twenty years of age, during his medical rounds visited hundreds of the low East-end lodging-houses. In one of those dens he saw a sick boy whose only hope of rocovery lay in being immediately removed to a hospital. When he attempted to take the boy away, the keeper of the place—a drunken and heartless virago—refused to let him go until his arrears of rent were paid, and she even seized his clothing to secure herself against loss. But the kind-hearted Christian student was not to be balked in his Samaritan purpose; he wrapped the sick lad in his own greatcoat and bore him off to healing and restoration. After this touching experience, he spent his evenings in searching through the foulest and lowest nooks of the great city, seeking and saving the lost, and the scenes he there witnessed so convinced him of the urgent necessity of rescue work, that if he had ever hesitated about his call to that special field, he hesitated no longer. One mid-winter night, he saw no less than seventy-three ragged and homeless children lying under a piece of old tarpaulin at St. Paul's wharf, packed together, big and little, like sardines in a box. He soon became aware that thousands of others were faring just as badly and were growing up to a godless and criminal manhood, if they escaped death by starvation or accident meanwhile

In 1870, Dr. Barnardo made an effort to put his rescue schemes into practical operation, and to provide a home for the waifs. In the intervals of his medical studies, he had devoted himself to rescue work and preaching the Gospel; indeed the one insensibly led to the other. He was a qualified graduate of the Royal College of Surgeons, and a medical practitioner also. On submitting his rescue project to the public, it met instant and spontaneous encouragement from many Christian people and he was quickly enabled to provide a shelter for some of his homeless army.

He rented an old house in Stepney Causeway which was soon transformed into a most cheerful and attractive "Home for Destitute Lads," and filled with a number of children gathered in from the dark alleys, railway arches, fruit markets and river front, where they were surrounded by vicious and criminal associations. From this beginning the rescue work yearly expanded until at the present time Dr. Barnardo's philanthropies include, besides the Boys' Home already mentioned, the Girls' Village Home, opened in 1873, the Little Boys' Home, the Infirmary for Sick and Destitute Children, the Labor House for Destitute Youths, and the Leopold House Orphan Home for Little Boys. All except the first of these institutions were opened between 1873 and 1883. There are also a number of other agencies under his direction and control, including the Servants' Free Registry and Home, the Wood-Chopping Brigade, the Union Jack Shoeblack Brigade, City Messenger Brigade, two Coffee Palaces and Mission Halls, Ragged Schools, Free Day and Sunday Bible Schools, Deaconesses Houses, Cab Shelter, Creche, a Home for Cripple Waifs and another for old women.

There is seemingly no limit to the energies and resources of this wonderful Christian worker. So universally trusted and beloved is he by the benevolent people of London and other English cities, that every new project he proposes for the physical betterment and moral elevation of the wretched poor commands instant attention and support. He is in many respects like the late Dr. Cullis of Boston, whose splendid record of a life devoted to Christian charity was recently outlined in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Both men began by conversion and consecration, and both, with nothing save a mighty faith in God and a burning zeal to do his work among the poor and suffering, achieved a name and fame that will outlive mere earthly honors.

In his latest annual report, Dr. Barnardo explains some very interesting features of his work. Up to the present time, nearly 20,000 poor boys have been rescued from privation, suffering and moral peril and a large proportion of them placed in Christian households. He proposes to establish in different provincial centres, new receiving-houses, with ever-open doors, where application may be made on behalf of destitute children. This has been rendered necessary by the fact that a considerable proportion of the applicants are from other cities than London, and that they, too, would inevitably drift into the great tribe of hopeless and helpless waifs, were not a rescuing hand held out in time. Every year new branches of the Homes are being opened. New Lodging Houses, Mission Centres, Young Helpers' Leagues, and Adult Helpers' Associations are projected and the work promises to extend widely throughout the United Kingdom. It has also taken root in Australia, where the Rev. Walter J. Mayers has laid the foundation on the model of Dr. Barnardo's plans.

When application is made by a child, or in its behalf, Dr. Barnardo's system allows of no delay, his motto being "admit first, inquire afterwards." No payment or patronage is necessary; only the really destitute are admitted to the Homes, and no distinction of creed is made, as they are entirely undenominational. The inmates are trained industrially as well as educated, the girls for domestic service, and the boys in any one of fourteen trades which they may select as a future vocation. During the last year, nearly 2,000 children were admitted to the Homes. The infinite variety and pathos of the stories of the rescued would fill many volumes, but they are all treasured up by Dr. Barnardo, who knows the sufferings of each of his little charges. Deserted children, the progeny of tramps, the orphaned children of respectable parents, street arabs, "wharf-rats," motherless girls, cripples (some even legless or armless), little girls rescued from dire moral peril, little sleepers in wagons or alleyways, the blind, deaf and dumb, the hunchbacks and every conceivable variety of waif are to be found there.

Since 1882, nearly 5,000 girls and boys have been sent out in organized parties to Canada, and a large number of young emigrants to Australia and South Africa by the Barnardo Homes. Many of the children who have been reared in these homes, are now grown men and women, earning an honorable livelihood for themselves in different parts of the world. It is ascertained that over 98 per cent. of all who have been trained in the homes, and afterwards started in life under their auspices, are doing well—some in Canadian homesteads, other on Australian ranches, and still others on their native soil. About seven years ago, Dr. Barnardo acquired about 9,000 acres of land near Russell, Manitoba, for the purpose of starting an industrial farm. Buildings were erected and a number of young lads sent out under the care of a competent superintendent. The farm now includes about fourteen square miles of the most fertile prairie land in the dominion. Nearly 100 young graduates of the Homes live on it; their conduct has been a

THE MARCH OF YEARS.

Dr. Talmage's New Year's Day Sermon, "The Chronology of the Bible, or God Among the Centuries." Deut. 32: 7: "Consider the years of many generations."

AT twelve o'clock last night, while so many good people were watching, an old friend passed out of our homes and a stranger entered. The old friend making valedictory was 1892; the stranger arriving is 1893. The old friend was garrulous with the occurrences of many days, but the stranger put his finger over his lip and said nothing and seemed charged with many secrets and mysteries. I did not see either the departure or the arrival, but was sound asleep, thinking that was for me the best way to be wide awake now. Good-bye, 1892! Welcome, 1893!

As an army is divided into brigades and regiments and companies, and they observe this order in their march, and their tread is majestic, so the time of the world's existence is divided into an army, divinely commanded: the eras are the brigades, the centuries are the regiments, and the years are the companies. Forward! into the eternity past, out of the eternity to come. Forward! is the command, and nothing can halt them even though the world should die. While obeying my text, "Consider the years of many generations," I propose to speak of the "Chronology of the Bible, or God among the Centuries."

Six Divine Steps in Chronology.

We make a distinction between time and eternity, but time is only a piece of eternity, and chronology has been engaged in the sublime work of dividing up this portion of eternity that we call time into compartments, and putting events in their right compartment. It is as much an injustice against the past to wrongly arrange its events, as it would be an injustice if, through neglect of chronological accuracy, it should, in the far distant future, be said that America was discovered in 1776, and the Declaration of Independence was signed in 1492, and Washington born on the 22d of March, and the Civil War of the United States was fought in 1840. As God puts all the events of time in the right place, let us be careful that we do not put them in the wrong place. The chronology of the Bible takes six steps, but they are steps so long, it makes us hold our breath as we watch the movement. From Adam to Abraham. From Abraham to the exodus out of Egypt. From the exodus to the foundation of Solomon's Temple. From the foundation of Solomon's Temple to the destruction of that Temple. From the destruction of the Temple to the return from Babylonish captivity. From Babylonish captivity to the birth of Christ. Chronology takes pen and pencil, and calling astronomy and history to help, says: "Let us fix one event, from which to calculate everything. Let it be a star, the Bethlehem star, the Christmas star." And from that we go back and see the world was created 4,004 years before Christ, the deluge came 2,348 years before Christ, the exodus out of Egypt occurred 1,491 years before Christ, and Solomon's temple was destroyed 586 years before Christ. Chronology enters the first chapter of Genesis and says the day mentioned there is not a day of twenty-four hours, but of ages; the word there translated as "day," in other places meaning ages, and so the Bible account of the creation and the geologists' account of the creation are completely harmonious. Chronology enters the Book of Daniel, and says that the words "time and a-half" mean a year and a-half. Chronology enters at another point and shows us that the seasons of the year were then only two—summer and winter. We find that the Bible year was 360 days, instead of 365; that the day was calculated from six o'clock in the morning to six o'clock at night; that the night was divided into four watches, namely, the late watch, the midnight, the cock-crowing, the early watch. The clock and watch were invented so long after the world began their mission that the day was not very sharply divided in Bible times. Ahaz had a sun-dial, or a flight of stairs with a column at the top, and the shadow which that column threw on the steps beneath indicated the hour, the shadow lengthening or withdrawing from step to step.

Ancient Time-Measuring.

But the events of life and the events of the world moved so slowly, for the most part in Bible times, that they had no need of such timepieces as we stand on our mantels or carry in our pockets in an age when a man may have a half dozen or a dozen engagements for one day and needs to know the exact minute for each one of them. The earth itself in Bible times was the chief timepiece, and it turned once on its axis and that was a day, and once around the sun and that was a year. It was not until the fourteenth century that the almanac was born, the almanac that we toss carelessly about, not realizing that it took the accumulated ingenuity of more than five thousand years to make one. Chronology had to bring into its service the monuments of Egypt, and the cylinders of Assyria, and the bricks of Babylon, and the pottery of Nineveh, and the medals struck at Antioch for the battle of Actium, and all the hieroglyphics that could be deciphered, and had to go into the extremely delicate business of asking the ages of Adam, and Seth, and Enoch, and Methuselah who, after their three hundredth year wanted to be thought young. I think it must have been in recognition of the stupendous work of making an almanac that all the days of the week are named after the gods. Sunday, after the Sun, which was of old worshipped as a god. Monday, after the Moon, which was also worshipped as a god. Tuesday, after Tuesco, the god of War. Wednesday, after Woden, the chief god of the Scandinavians. Thursday, after Thor, the god of thunder. Friday, after Frea, the goddess of Marriage. And Saturday, after Saturn. The old Bible year began with the 25th of March. Not until 1752 did the first of the month of January get the honor in legal documents in England of being called the first day of the year. Improvements all along have been made in chronology until the calendar and the almanac and the clock and the watch seem to have reached perfection, and all the nations of Christendom have similarity of time calculations and have adopted what is called "New Style," except Russia, which keeps what is called the "Old Style," and is twelve days different, so that, writing from there, if you wish to be accurate, you date your letter January 1st and January 12th, or December 10th and December 22nd. It is something to thank God for that the modes are so complete for calculating the cycles, the centuries, the decades, the years, the months, the days, the hours, the seconds. Think of making appointments, as in the Bible days, for the time of the new moon. Think of making one of the watches of the night in Bible times a rooster's crowing. The Bible says, "Before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice"; "If the Master cometh at cock crowing;" and that was the way the midnight watch was indicated. The crowing of that barnyard bird has always been most uncertain. The crowing is at the lowest temperature of the night, and the amount of dew and the direction of the wind may bring the lowest temperature at eleven o'clock at night or two o'clock in the morning and at any one of six hours. Just before a rain the crowing of chanticleer in the night is almost perpetual.

Truth of Bible Chronology.

Compare these modes of marking time with our modes of marking time, when twelve o'clock is twelve o'clock, and six o'clock is six o'clock, and ten o'clock is ten o'clock, and independent of all weathers, and then thank God that you live now. But, notwithstanding all the imperfect modes of marking hours or years or centuries, Bible chronology never trips up, never falters, never contradicts itself, and here is one of the best arguments for the authenticity of the Scriptures. If you can prove an alibi in the courts, and you can prove beyond doubt that you were in some particular place at the time you were charged with doing or saying something in quite another place, you gain the victory, and Infidelity has tried to prove an alibi by contending that events and circumstances in the Bible ascribed to certain times must have taken place at some other time, if they took place at all. But this Book's chronology has never been caught at fault. It has been proved that when the Hebrews went into Egypt there were only seventy of them, and that when they came out there were three millions of them. "Now," says Infidelity, with a guffaw that it cannot suppress, "what an absurdity! They went down into Egypt seventy and came out three millions. That is a falsehood on the face of it. Nations do not increase in that ratio." But, my sceptical friend, hold a moment. The Bible says the Jews were 430 years in Egypt, and that explains the increase from seventy persons to three millions, for it is no more but rather less than the ordinary increase of nations. The Pilgrim Fathers came to America in the Mayflower, one small shipload of passengers, less than 300 years ago, and now we have a nation of sixty million. Where then is the so-called impossibility that the seventy Jews who went into Egypt in 430 years became three million? Infidelity wrong and Bible chronology right.

The Ages in Review.

Now, stop and reflect, why is it that this sublime subject of Bible chronology has been so neglected, and that the most of you have never given ten minutes to the consideration of it and that this is the first sermon ever preached on this stupendous and overwhelming theme? We have stood by the half day or the whole day at grand reviews and seen armies pass. Again and again and again on the Champs Elysees, Frenchmen, by the hundreds of thousands, have stood and watched the bannered armies go by, and the huzza has been three miles long and until the populace were so hoarse they could huzza no longer. Again and again and again, the Germans, by hundreds of thousands, have stood on the palaced and statued Unter den Linden, Berlin, and strewn garlands under the feet of uniformed hosts led on by Von Moltke or Blucher or Frederick the Great. When Wellington and Ponsonby and the Scots Greys came back from Waterloo, or Wolseley from Egypt or Marlborough from Blenheim, what military processions through Regent Street and along by the palaces of London and over the bridges of the Thames. What almost interminable lines of military on the streets of all our American capitals, while Mayors and Governors and Presidents, with uncovered heads, looked on. But put all those grand reviews together and they are tame compared with the review which on this New Year's Day you from the pew and I from the pulpit witness. Hear them pass in chronological order; all the years before the flood; all the years since the flood; decades abreast; centuries abreast; epochs abreast; millenniums abreast: Egyptian civilization, Babylonian populations, Assyrian dominions. Armies of Persian, Grecian, Peloponnesian and Roman wars: Byzantine empire, Saracenic hosts, Crusaders of the First, the Second, Third and the last—avalanche of men: Dark Ages in sombre epaulettes and Brighter Ages with shields of silver and helmets of gold: Italy, Spain, France, Russia, Germany, England and America, past and present: dynasties, feudal domains, despotisms, monarchies, republics, ages on ages, ages on ages, passing to-day in a chronological review, until one has no more power to look upon the advancing columns, now brilliant, now squalid, now garlanded with peace, now crimson with slaughter, now horrid with ghastliness, now radiant with love and joy.

A Chronological Study.

This chronological study affords among many practical thoughts, especially two—the one encouraging to the last degree and the other startling. The encouraging thought is that the main drift of the centuries has been toward betterment, with only here and there a stout reversal. Grecian civilization was a vast improvement on Egyptian civilization, and Roman civilization a vast improvement on Grecian civilization, and Christian civilization is a vast improvement on Roman civilization. What was the boasted age of Pericles compared with the age of Longfellow and Tennyson? What was Queen Elizabeth as a specimen of moral womanhood compared with Queen Victoria? What were the cruel warriors of olden times compared with the most distinguished warriors of the last half century, all of them as much distinguished for kindness and good morals as for prowess; the two military leaders of our Civil War on Northern and Southern side communicant members of Christian churches, and their home life as pure as their public life? Nothing impresses me in this chronological review more than the fact that the regiments of years are better and better regiments as the troops move on. I thank God that you and I were not born any sooner than we were born. How could we have endured the disaster of being born in the eighteenth or seventeenth or sixteenth century? Glad am I that we are in the regiment now passing the reviewing stand and that our children will pass the stand in a still better regiment. God did not build this world for a slaughter-house or a den of infamy. A good deal of cleaning house will be necessary before this world becomes as clean and sweet as it ought to be, but the brooms and the scrubbing brushes and the upholsterers and plumbers are already busy, and when the world gets fixed up as it will be, if Adam and Eve ever visit it, as I expect they will, they will say to each other: "Well, this beats Paradise when we lived there, and the pears and the plums are better than we plucked from the first trees, and the wardrobes are more complete, and the climate is better." Since I settled in my own mind the fact that God was stronger than the devil, I have never lost faith in the emparadisation of this planet. With the exception of a retrogression in the Dark Ages, the movement of the world has been on and on, and up and up, and I have two jubilant Hosannas—one for the closing year and the other for the new year.

Time Robbers.

But the other thought coming out of this subject is that biblical chronology, and indeed all chronology, is urging the world to more punctuality and immediateness. What an unsatisfactory and indefinite thing it must have been for two business men in the time of Ahaz to make an appointment, saying: "We will settle that business matter to-morrow when the shadow on the dial of Ahaz reaches the tenth step from the top," or, "I will meet you in the street called Straight in Damascus in the time of the new moon," or, when asked in a court-room, what time an occurrence took place, should answer: "It was during the time of the latter rain," or, "It was at the time of the third crowing of the barnyard." You and I remember when ministers of the Gospel in the country, giving out a notice of an evening service, instead of saying at six or seven or eight o'clock would say, "The service will begin at early candle-light." Thank God for chronological achievements which have ushered in calendars and almanacs and clocks and watches, and at so cheap a rate all may possess them. Chronology, beginning by appreciating the value of years and the value of days, has kept on until it cries out: "Man, immortal; woman, immortal; look out for that minute; look out for that second!" The greatest fraud a man can commit is to rob another of his time. Hear it, ye laggards, and repent! All the fingers of chronology point to punctuality as one of the graces. The minister or the lecturer or business man who comes to his place ten minutes after the appointed time commits a crime, the enormity of which can only be estimated by multiplying the number of persons present by ten. If the engagement be made with five persons, he has stolen fifty minutes, for he is ten minutes too late and he has robbed each of the five persons of ten minutes apiece, and ten times five are fifty. If there are five hundred persons present, and he be ten minutes too late, he has committed a robbery of five thousand minutes, for ten times five hundred are five thousand, and five thousand minutes are eighty three hours, which make more than three days. The thief of dry goods, the thief of bank bills is not half so bad as the thief of time.

Vain Regrets.

Doctor Rush, the greatest and busiest physician of his day appreciated the value of time, and when asked how he had been able to gather so much information for his books and lectures, he replied: "I have been able to do it by economizing my time. I have not spent one hour in amusement in thirty years." And taking a blank book from his pocket, said, "I fill a book like this every week with thoughts that occur to me and facts collected in the rooms of my patients." Napoleon appreciated the value of time when the sun was sinking upon Waterloo, and he thought that a little more time would retrieve his fortunes, and he pointed to the sinking sun, and said: "What would I not give to be this day possessed of the power of Joshua and enabled to retard thy march for two hours?" Voltaire, the blatant French infidel, appreciated the value of time, when, in his dying moments, he said to his doctor: "I will give you half of what I am worth if you will give me six months of life," and when told that he could not live six weeks, he burst into tears, and said: "Then, I shall go to hell." John Wesley appreciated the value of time when he stood on his steps waiting for a delayed carriage to take him to an appointment, saying: "I have lost ten minutes forever." Lord Nelson appreciated the value of time when he said: "I owe everything in the world to being always a quarter of an hour beforehand." A clock-maker in one of the old English towns appreciated the value of time when he put on the front of the town clock the words: "Now or when?" Mitchell, the astronomer, appreciated the value of time when he said: "I have been in the habit of calculating the value of a thousandth part of a second." They best appreciate the value of time whose Sabbaths have been wasted and whose opportunities of repentance and usefulness are all agone, and who have nothing left but memories, baleful and elegiac. They stand in the bleak September, with bare feet, on the sharp stubble of a reaped wheat field, crying: "The harvest is past," and the sough of an autumnal equinox moans forth in echo: "The harvest is past!"

The Passing Years.

But do not let us get an impression from chronology that because the years of time have been so long in procession they are to go on forever. Matter is not eternal. No, no. If you watch half a day, or a whole day or two days, as I once did, to see a military procession, you remember the last brigade and the last regiment and the last company finally passed on, and as we rose to go we said to each other: "It is all over." So this mighty procession of earthly years will terminate. Just when, I have no power to prognosticate, but science confirms the Bible prophecy that the earth cannot always last. Indeed there has been a fatality of worlds. The moon is merely the corpse of what it once was, and scientists have again and again gone up in their observatories to attend the death-bed of dying worlds, and have seen them cremated. So I am certain, both from the Word of God and science, that the world's chronology will sooner or later come to its last chapter. The final century will arrive and pass on, and then will come the final decade, and then the final year and the final month and the final day. The last spring will swing its censer of apple blossoms, and the last winter bank its snows. The last sunset will burn like Moscow and the last morning radiate the hills. The clocks will strike their last hour, and the watches will tick their last second.

No incendiaries will be needed to run hither and yon with torches to set the world on fire. Chemistry teaches us that there is a very inflammable element in water. While oxygen makes up a part of the water, the other part of the water is hydrogen, and that is very combustible. The oxygen drawn out from the water, the inflammable hydrogen may put instantly into conflagration the Hudsons and Savannahs and Mississippis and Rhines and Urals and Danubes, and Atlantic and Pacific and Indian and Mediterranean Seas. And then the Angel of God descending from the Throne, might put one foot in the surf of the sea and the other on the beach, and cry to the four winds of heaven: "Time was! But time shall be no longer!" Yet, found in Christ, pardoned and sanctified, we shall welcome the day with more gladness than you ever welcomed a Christmas or New Year's morn.

When wrapt in fire, the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's last thunder shakes the earth below;
Thou, undismayed, shalt o'er the ruin smile,
And light thy torch at nature's funeral pile.

Won From Suku to Jesus.

How the Children of the Heathen Biheans are Trained by the Missionaries.

PROBABLY the most important work that is now being done by Christian missionaries in Africa is among the little children. Wherever the Gospel of Jesus is preached, schools have been opened and thousands of dark-skinned boys and girls are being trained in the Christian faith and elevated from a condition more or less savage to a certain degree of civilization and culture. It is impossible to over-estimate the good that must result from this devoted work for the Master when these young folks, grown to manhood and womanhood, mingle with their people and disseminate among them the precious truths they have learned in the mission schools.

A GROUP OF BIHEAN CHILDREN.

On this page is an illustration showing a group of children in Bihe, West Africa. On coming to the mission schools they are usually nude little savages, having a vague notion of their terrible national deity, Suku, whom their parents worship. After a short attendance at school, they wear garments like those shown in the picture, and become generally well behaved and earnest little students. The group is from a photograph taken by Rev. Walter T. Currie, whose interesting story of his six years' missionary experience in Equatorial Africa appeared in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"Polygamy prevails everywhere in Bihe," Mr. Currie explained. "A man marries a free woman and afterward has as many slaves as he can afford to keep as additional wives. There is a peculiarity about this: the children of the free wife are not supposed to belong to the father, but to the mother and her brothers. The children of the slave wives belong to the father. There will be less difficulty in eradicating polygamy there than in other parts of Africa, however, when the Gospel is thoroughly disseminated. We have as yet organized no church there; but when we do, we shall not admit to membership any man who has more than one wife. This will involve no hardship for the women; they are slaves, and will be glad to be set free. The children at our school at Cisamba are bright intelligent little fellows.

"We have a large part of the Scriptures now translated into the language of the Biheans. Mr. Stover and Mr. Sanders did the translating and it was printed on a press we had at Bihe. The mission was started about twelve years ago with three stations in the interior. Cisamba had no station until we came. After laboring there five years, I had to return home for my health. I was also anxious to study medicine. Having some slight knowledge of medicine, I treated about twenty people while in Africa. Among them was one of Kundundu's priests, who was ill with pneumonia. I treated him with medicine from home and he recovered. When Kundundu was asked how it was that the white missionary had been able to heal his priest, he replied that 'he cured him with the white man's medicine.' When another priest was taken sick, a number of the priests came and said that 'Kundundu had sent them to the white man to give his servant medicine.' I did so and the invalid got well. The second case of sickness was a serious one and the people thought the man was dead. After his recovery they declared that 'the white man had put life in him!'

"The men of Bihe have stopped wearing skins and braiding their hair and many of them wear European clothes. The women wear a cloth skirt only, except in the cold weather, when they throw a cloth over their shoulders, shawl-fashion. The temperature sometimes falls below the freezing point in the cold season. Bishop Taylor's missionaries are to the north of us. Mr. Arnot's missionaries had to pass through Cisamba on their way to their station at Garenganze.

"The Biheans belong to the powerful tribe of the Ovimbundu, and are a part of the great Bantu family. Their government is patriarchal. There is a headman over every village who is responsible to the osoma of the district and he again is responsible to the king of the whole Bihe country. Beer-drinking is the great curse we have to contend with. Biheans make beer from native herbs and some of it is very intoxicating. When they go to the coast, they frequently bring rum back with them, but they are afraid to use it to a great degree lest they should become degraded and stupid and lose their country. Still, there are some among them so besotted that they would sell their wives and children for rum. We had a war before I left the country, and the Bihean chiefs collected all their troops to fight against the Portuguese forces, and drive them out of the country. Afterward, the Portuguese sent officers of their own army with Dutch Boers and black soldiers and burned the umballa or capital of Bihe, a place called Akobondo. They killed about 125 men in capturing the place, which struck such terror into the hearts of the people that the invaders had no difficulty in subduing the whole country. They built a fort and established themselves there. During the troubles, we were frequently called upon to act as umpires and the Portuguese officers would send their orders to us and we would translate them into the Bihean language and return the answer. The Portuguese still hold the country. I have personally been well treated by them. There is no question that the whole province is within the sphere of Portuguese influence, under the Treaty of Berlin.

"Justice in Bihe is simple and practical. When a man has committed a crime, a charge is laid before the village headman. The complainant gives a pig or some cloth to have the case tried; the headman summons all the old men of the village as a jury, and the complainant and accused can appear either personally or by counsel. If either is dissatisfied with the result he can appeal to the osoma of the district and again to the king. As a rule substantial justice is done. I have known a man who was charged with stealing a dove have to pay, before he was through, as much as the value of an ox!

"After a time I won the confidence of the people to such an extent that I have been frequently invited to act as judge and arbitrator in their disputes. I have gone for them as envoy to another tribe in cases of dispute. On one occasion, when the chief of a neighboring tribe died, his people sent to ask my advice as to the choice of a successor.

"I received a warning that a certain tribe meant to waylay and plunder me; but when the chief, Kapoko, heard of it he placed his young men at intervals along the road by which the raiders might be expected, and also around my hut. He assured me that each would give his life rather than that harm should befall me."

ENCOURAGING THE PEOPLE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 15, 1893. Haggai 2 : 1-9. Golden Text, Ps. 127 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"THE good fight of faith" 1. Tim. 6 : 12, admits of no truce with the enemy. It may seem sometimes as though he had the advantage, and even prevailed against God. It is not for the children of God in such times to give in to the pressure of circumstances, and to take for granted that nothing can be done. Every difficulty, every impossibility, is a God-given opportunity for men of faith to prove, and to testify to others, by their restful faith in him, that our God is Almighty. When the enemies of Israel had succeeded in making the Jews cease from building the temple, "by force and power," there was still a possibility of making an appeal from the earthly powers that be to the heavenly powers that be; from kings' courts to the court of heaven. But the people took for granted that the thing was beyond their power, they from man; and after the wonderful intervention of God in stirring up Cyrus, and then in stirring up the captive Jews to return and rebuild their temple, they failed, at this moment of crisis, to endure "as seeing him who is invisible," (Heb. 11 : 27.) Some fifteen years passed over them, a new generation grew up, and it was not until God prepared and sent prophets among them, that they awoke out of their apathy, and discovered that they had not to wait until God made another move, but that he was waiting for them to rise to the occasion, and trust him. He had commanded them to rebuild their temple, he had stirred up the king himself to authorize them and make it possible; he had not withdrawn his word, and had they obeyed God rather than man, as the disciples did in Apostolic times, he would most certainly have stood by them.

Accepted the Situation

In their supineness, they had come to the conclusion that it was not God's time for the building of the temple! (Hag. 1: 2.) A favorite excuse for unbelief is this. Why had God commanded it if it was not his time? But the Lord stirred up mightily the spirit of his prophet Haggai, and he appealed to them: "Is it time for you yourselves to dwell in your ceiled houses, while this house lieth waste." (R.V.) God has called you into the land of promise for his temple's sake, and because of an opposition which he can easily deal with, you excuse yourselves from the work of his temple, and turn eagerly to your own interests! It was no wonder that God could not bless them. A selfish man, a selfish family, a selfish church, a selfish mission, a selfish nation, cannot have the blessing of God. It is the invariable principle of Christ's kingdom that "he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." (II. Cor. 5: 15.)

Haggai was not alone, God inspired also Zechariah the son of Iddo, and these two men on whose hearts God had laid his cause in the midst of the prevailing indifference, did not speak in their own name, they "prophesied unto the Jews that were in Judea and Jerusalem in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them." (Ezra 5: 1.) Two hearts were specially penetrated, these men were Zerubbabel, the governor, and Jeshua, the priest; they obeyed the voice of the Lord their God, and, as a certain result, "the people did fear before the Lord." (Hag. 1: 12.)

No sooner was there a move among the people than our merciful God sent them a message of encouragement: "Then spake Haggai, the Lord's messenger in the Lord's message, unto the people saying:

I am With You,

saith the Lord." When God's children yield to discouragement through getting their eye on circumstances, the devil often tries to persuade them that God is not with them, that the Lord hath forgotten to be gracious. But the moment a returning prodigal is fairly on his way back to his Father's house, he finds out that that Father is as full of love as ever he has been, and that he has never for one moment left him alone. "I am with you." This is power, this is success, come what may.

With spirits stirred up by God to an enthusiasm of his own kindling, the people came together and "did work in the house of the Lord of hosts their God" (Hag. 1: 14); "and with them were the prophets of God, helping them." (Ezra 5: 2.) Message after message came to them through the two prophets, Zechariah, who saw wondrous visions of God's power and love and purposes, and the practical Haggai, who dealt closely with the people, and told them how they might repent, and do their first works. The circumstances were unaltered; their enemies were unchanged in their opposition, the decree of Artaxerxes to make them stop the work was unrepealed; and yet the work went forward. God gave Zechariah and to tell them out for the encouragement of those who were standing on God's side, and on the side of his temple. He saw in vision God's sentinels walking to and fro through the earth, and he knew that nothing escaped the eye of God. He heard the message of an angel to him: "Cry thou, saying: Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy. And I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease: for I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward the affliction." (Zech. 1: 8-15.) It was a revelation to Zechariah, and he understood that God was indeed on the side of his people; while their enemies despised, and looked down on them, the Lord esteemed and cherished them. And when he further learned that the Lord would "yet comfort Zion," and "yet choose Jerusalem," that he would "be a wall of fire round about her," that he that touched her touched the apple of his eye, so sensitive was he to all that concerned her, and that the Lord declared that he would dwell in the midst of her, he was ready to trust, and to encourage the people to trust, all contingencies into the hands of God.

Of course their enemies were not asleep; Tatnai and Shethar-boznai, with their companions, came to institute an official inquiry, and to take the names of those who dared to go on with the building; "but the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came to Darius." (Ezra 5: 5.) None may lay a finger on his children without his leave. Then these hostile governors, in order to carry the cause to king Darius, demanded their names, the only names they had to give were: "We are servants of the God of heaven and earth," and their answers to found a glorious testimony to their God, and an honest acknowledgment of their own sinfulness. Such an official memorial, so fully recognizing the hand of God as dealing with the sins of his people, and as using the kings of the earth as his instrument, is a sadly rare thing. It was a witness to Darius that the true God, the God of heaven and earth, had a people who believed in his power, and in his wise and just intervention in the affairs of men, and the memorial ended: "Now therefore, if it seem good to the king, let there be search made in the king's treasure house, which is there at Babylon, whether it be so that a decree was made of Cyrus the king to build this house of God at Jerusalem, and let the king send his pleasure to us concerning this matter."

How easy everything was now that the eye of the people was upon their God, but how difficult, how impossible, while their eye was upon themselves! It was not a question now whether these heathen governors who hated them, or whether the despised Jews, would have the most influence with the king. The great matter to men of faith was: "On which side is God, the Lord of hosts? Haggai was the messenger who should answer this question, he calls upon the few who had seen the house of God in its former splendor, and says: "Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord; and be strong, O Jeshua, the high priest; and be strong, all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work; for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts: according to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth among you; fear ye not."

With such a word, how could there be anxiety about the issue of their memorial to the king? What were kings compared to the Most High God? Only instruments which he could use or lay aside at pleasure. But his people, the people chosen to be his inheritance, a special treasure to himself, the people whom he was educating, whom he had formed for himself, he could not, he would not forsake.

What induced Darius to have his royal book searched? Human influence? No: it was God who disposed his heart to it. To the great surprise of Tatnai, and all his associates, Darius the king not only discovered the decree of Cyrus, but endorsed it, and commanded them, first, to let the work alone, and, secondly, to apply the revenue which accrued to the king from their provinces, to the expenses of the work, and that "day by day without fail; that they may offer sacrifices of sweet savor unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons." And he further threatened punishment upon all who should molest the Jews in this work of God. Thus our God sustains those who really trust in him. God on our side, who can be against us? "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man; it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE building of the temple, the foundations of which were laid, as we saw in last week's lesson, was delayed for fifteen years. There was opposition from the peoples around, jealousy at the Persian court, the rise of a king there unfavorable to the enterprise and other obstacles. The people lost heart. They set to building their own houses and beautifying them, but work on God's house was stopped. The altar had been reared and sacrifices were offered, but all around was ruin and desolation. Again the time came for the Feast of Tabernacles to be kept. The people were assembled within the ruined walls. Then Haggai, the old prophet who had seen Solomon's Temple, stood up and urged the people to resume the work of building, assuring them that he had received a message from God full of encouragement. His message is the subject of the lesson.

The word of the Lord by the prophet. When a hearer is convicted under a sermon or the conversation of a friend and becomes aware that something he is doing is a sin, or something that he is neglecting is a duty, he ought to realize that what he has heard is the word of the Lord by the person uttering it. In the town-hall of Nyekoebing, Sweden, the portrait of a minister hangs in the place of honor. The name of the minister was Jessen. The cause of his portrait being hung there dates back to the time of King Charles Gustavus. The king had ordered a levy on the people of Nyekoebing of a large sum of money. They were unable to raise the sum demanded, and the king, thereupon, ordered the town to be burned. On Sunday, Jessen denounced the impending destruction as an act of cruelty and oppression. Some officers were present, who reported to the king what the minister had said. The king listened and sent for the clergyman to ascertain whether he had really said what had been reported. Jessen replied that he had, and went on to tell the king to his face how iniquitous was the thing he contemplated. Those who knew Charles Gustavus expected to hear him order the minister to prison, if not to death. But instead of doing so, the king thanked the clergyman for showing him that what he was about to do was displeasing to God and countermanded the order for the burning of the town. The delighted people honored the clergyman whose boldness had saved the town by ordering his portrait hung in the town-hall, where it now is.

The house in its first glory. It was the old men who were discouraged. As sixty-six years had elapsed since the temple was destroyed none but the very old could remember it. But they were not likely to forget such a sight if they had once seen it. Its magnificence was almost beyond the power of fancy to imagine. It was ablaze with gold and precious stones. It has been estimated that the pure gold which covered the Holy of Holies was alone worth twenty-one million dollars. As the old men realized their weakness and poverty and thought how comparatively poor must be the house they could now raise, it seemed scarcely worth the doing. But Haggai told them that God commanded them to make the effort. When the city of Chicago was smoldering in the ruins of the great fire, which had consumed the beautiful house of the New England Church and the homes of every family in it, the pastor, searching among the ashes within its walls for some memento, found a charred leaf of the pulpit hymn-book on which he was able to decipher these words:

> Daughter of Zion, awake from the dust,
> Exalt thy fallen head:
> Rebuild thy walls, thy bounds enlarge,
> And send thy heralds forth.

That hymn was sung at the first service in the rough board tabernacle erected upon the same spot.

For I am with you. Think of the stimulus there was in this assurance that God would be with them. A Highland chief of the noble house of M'Gregor, fell wounded by two balls at the battle of Prestonpans. Seeing their chief fall the clan wavered and gave the enemy an advantage. The old chieftain, beholding the effect of his disaster, raised himself on his elbow, and cried aloud, "I am not dead my children; I am looking at you to see you do your duty." The words revived the sinking courage of his brave Highlanders. There was a charm in the fact that they still fought under the eye of their chief. It roused them to put forth their mightiest energies, and they did all that human strength could do to turn the dreadful tide of battle.

The desire of all nations. The Messiah was needed not by the Jews alone but by all peoples, as is seen from the success which attended the preaching of the Apostles to the Gentiles. It is recorded that Socrates endeavoring to satisfy the mind of one of his disciples on the subject of acceptable worship, said: "It is therefore necessary to wait till some one may teach us how it behooves us to conduct ourselves both toward the gods and men." To this the disciple answered: "When shall that time arise, O, Socrates? and who shall that teacher be? Most eagerly do I wish to see such a man."

The glory of this latter house shall be greater. History tells of a young noble who wasted his property in gambling and dissipation. Ruin came, and the castle which his forefathers had lived in for many generations was sold. The priceless works of art and the heirlooms of the family and the vast library accounted one of the finest in the possession of any private owner in the country, were all sold to satisfy the claims of the creditors. The young noble went to live in a cottage which had belonged to his mother. All his friends deserted him and for a time he was utterly disconsolate. Then in his loneliness he began to read and study. At first it was only to divert his mind, but afterward the desire of knowledge grew in him, and having renounced his evil ways, he studied uninterruptedly. He became a noted scholar and the fame of his learning spread throughout the land. The king heard of the change in him, and resolved to send his eldest son and heir to him to be taught. The youth came every day and gained not only book learning but lessons on the evil of youthful sins and temptations. The king was so pleased with the training his son was receiving that he visited the scholar himself and delighted to pass hours in conversation with him. "I have lost my beautiful castle," said the scholar, "but this humble cottage has had greater honor than the castle, for here I have entertained royalty which neither my forefathers nor I ever did at the castle."

Sir Astley Cooper, the eminent surgeon, on visiting Paris, was asked by the surgeon-in-chief of the Empire how many times he had performed a certain difficult operation. He replied that he had performed it thirteen times. "Ah," said the Frenchman, "I have done him one hundred and sixty times. Did any of ze patients live?" Sir Astley Cooper replied that eleven of the thirteen lived and fully recovered, "What was your experience?" The Frenchman said, "Ah, Monsieur, they all die. Not one live through it, but ze operation was brilliant." So it is in some churches. The architecture is classic, the windows are beautiful, the seats comfortable, the singing exquisite, the preaching eloquent, but souls are not saved. While in some dull, ugly church where things are all common and poor but where the Gospel is preached simply and earnestly, many are won from the world for Christ and the glory of the latter house is greater than that of the former.

A NOBLE WORK OF RESCUE.

admirable, and the general prosperity and prospects of the settlement are all that could be desired.

The work of these institutions, both in England and abroad, is wholly dependent upon the voluntary contributions of a circle of friends which is now world-wide. The Homes have no endowment, and they receive no State aid; yet the fact that every year shows an extension of the work, is conclusive evidence of the generosity with which they are supported. Nearly $7,000 have been received in contributions from the first start up to the present time; the annual offerings now averaging over half a million dollars. Over 5,000 orphans or destitute children are now in the various institutions in London and the English Provinces.

Dr. Barnardo writing of his work says: "The eye turns with hope and expectation to the children of to-day, who will be the workers of to-morrow. With this hope full in view the Young Helper's League now 9,000 strong has been established in order to draw into vital sympathy with children of the Waif and Stray class, boys and girls of the upper classes under 18 years of age.

"From the beginning, the Homes have been conducted on definitely religious lines. They took their rise in a Sunday ragged school. They are, as they always have been, Christian institutions—their work being the practical outcome of the Gospel spirit. But they have ever stood outside the camps of mere sect and denomination; in their operations all Evangelical Christians, by whatever subsidiary names they may be described, may do and join hands. They are, of course, Protestant, but no shibboleth of creed or of party can claim their work exclusively for its own.

"These Homes are essentially on the broadest Christian basis, consistent with loyalty to the truth, and are undenominational. Out of the very large number of waifs and strays—5,426—who have been under my care during the year, of whom a large number were under five years of age—only 34 have died, being at the rate of but 6.27 per thousand per annum, or less than half the rate of mortality of our healthiest cities. Assuredly here is a special cause for devout and hearty thankfulness.

"My heart has been filled oftentimes with unspeakable gratitude to the Lord as signs and tokens of the good hand of God among the Children have been brought to light, and as evidence has been forthcoming of the Gospel of the Grace of God preached among the masses havrng been in the power and demonstration of the Holy Ghost."

WORK AMONG THE CHINESE.

A new Christian mission for the Chinese was opened in New York on Dec. 19. It is an outcome of some very earnest and self-denying work on the part of Miss Helen F. Clark and other ladies. The mission is at 17 Doyer Street, near Chatham Square close to the most densely populated Chinese quarter. The dedicatory services were conducted by Rev. H.L. Moorehouse, D.D., Secretary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society. A reading-room is attached to the mission which is sure to prove a strong attraction to the Chinamen, and will serve as an introduction to distinctively religious work amongst them.

HOW A PRAYER WAS ANSWERED.

FOR some years past, a large number of the poor of New York and Brooklyn have been taken into the country or to the seaside by Rev. D. M. Heydrick, the well-known city missionary. The excursions cost a large sum of money and Mr. Heydrick has too many calls upon him and too willing a heart to have funds of his own for the purpose, but they have been supplied every year by Christian people who knew what he was doing. Much good has been done by the excursions, for those who went generally came from the tenements and many of them were sick and in need of fresh air. Sometimes it was a party of children, sometimes a party of aged people—always the poor whom Christ left as a special charge to his people. Mr. Heydrick has often wished that there was some house in a salubrious spot to which he could take some of the more feeble of them who could remain for a week if necessary instead of having to bring them back to their stifling homes in the evening. Some two months ago just such a house was for sale. It was adapted for the purpose in every way, but the price was over $3,000. Many large sums have come to this believing worker in former days in answer to prayer, but none so large as this. He is not however a man who limits his prayers because of the desired object being a great one. This matter, according to custom was committed to the Lord in prayer and several friends of like faith united with him, believing that the Lord would fulfil his promise that "if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them." Earnest prayers were offered and the promises pleaded. They have now been answered. A few days ago a gentleman who had also heard of the house being in the market and knew the purpose for which it was wanted, paid the whole amount of the purchase money and placed the house at the disposal of these friends of the poor as an offering to the Lord. "According to your faith be it unto you," was Mr. Heydrick's comment on the result. "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing."

THE KIND OF RELIGION.

A HINDOO opinion of the kind of religion which will touch the Hindoo character was given in the course of a lecture by a learned pundit not long ago. He said: "The religion of the future in India must be one which will call out the mysterious faculty of faith, which is the characteristic, par excellence, of the Hindu nature; and which shall discover and worship a divinity in mountain, river, tree; in man and animal; in fire, wind, and sky; in every striking object of nature. It will also be conspicuously ritualistic; for rites, ceremonies, symbols of all kinds, parables, and allegories, bells, vestments, incense, flowers, and ornaments have an indescribable charm for the Hindu mind. It will be emotional, exuberant, ecstatic, inebriatic; for a monotheism of reserve and respectability, a cold, polite, formal religion will never suit the Hindu race."

Sir Charles Atchison presided at the lecture and at its conclusion he remarked, "There have been national religions which have decayed, and I do not think that mere national sentiment and unity will be found to be an element of permanency in any religion. What strikes me is this, that what we require is not only to have the true monotheistic idea, but we require to grasp the truth in the relation of that idea to the individual mind. We are required not only to know the true God, but to know his relations to the individual soul; and that religion which shows how the life which is besmirched with evil can be purified, how the proud heart can be humbled, how the wicked will can be made wholly pure and righteous—in proportion as a religion strikes the truth in regard to these relations, that religion promises to be not only the religion of India, but the religion of the whole world."

Feeding the Lambs.

George Muller's Great Work and How it Has Been Divinely Prospered.

IT was characteristic of the late Pastor Spurgeon that, whenever the treasury that contained the funds for the support of his Orphanage began to fall short, and whenever the larder was depleted, he would "draw upon the bank of faith," as he aptly expressed it, and the draft was unfailingly honored by Him to whom belong the gold and silver and the cattle on a thousand hills. This implicit faith in God's providence has been the leading feature in the whole career of George Muller, of whose orphanages at Ashley Down, England, nearly every Christian has heard. Fifty-eight years ago, Mr. Muller began his philanthropic work (which has at different times been described in these columns), and in all that time he has never made an appeal for funds, either to the public or to private individuals. He has built orphanages costing nearly $600,000 and maintained them till now, by the exercise of faith in the liberality of God's people, and although there have been times without number when the grim shadow of want hung over the thousands of orphan children under his care, he would call his flock together and earnestly implore help from above. And there has never been an occasion when those prayers have passed unanswered.

In his latest annual report, just issued, Mr. Muller sheds some light on his work of supporting two thousand orphans by faith and prayer.

"As to funds," he says, "at the end of the year 1891–2, $10,000 more was expended than had been received; and there was likewise due to matrons, teachers, and other helpers, in the orphan work, salaries for the last three-quarters of a year, amounting to $8,500. All the servants of the institutions were paid in full. This is, within the past fifty-eight years, the second time only that the income was not equal to the expenses. For fifty-eight years and nine months this institution has been carried on, and we have never appealed to man, but simply prayed to God. Without anyone having been personally applied to for anything by me, $4,250,000 has been given to me for the orphans, as the result of prayer to God, since the commencement of the work, which sum includes that amount received for the building fund for the five houses. Every shilling has been obtained entirely as the result of prayer and faith, not a single donor having been asked for anything. To the living God we appealed, and he spoke to the donors, influencing them to help us."

A striking illustration of Mr. Muller's faith and its results is related by himself. One winter morning, several years ago, he found on awakening, that an accident had happened to the steam pipes in the orphanages, caused probably by the severe frost. The pipes had frozen and finally burst in several places, doing considerable damage. The most serious feature of the case, however, was the danger of pneumonia to the two thousand and more little inmates, the entire heat supply having suddenly been cut off. The rooms were like ice-houses, no fires could be made, and the situation seemed almost desperate. The orphanages are located several miles from Bristol and the number of men necessary to do such extensive repairs in a short time could not be found near at hand.

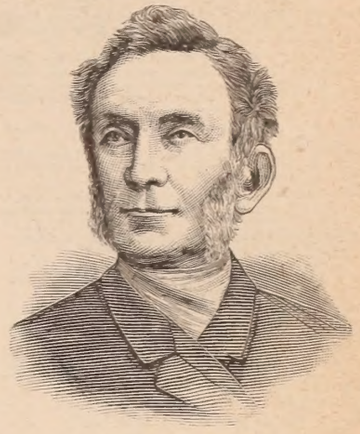
But Mr. Muller did not hesitate in this trying emergency. He directed the bell to be rung and the entire "family," large and small, children and attendants, were soon assembled in the main hall, where the aged founder, in a most fervent prayer, submitted the case to God, and pleaded for divine light how to proceed. They had just finished and were retiring from the hall, when one of the attendants informed Mr. Muller that a gentleman had called and wished to see him. He was shown into the reception room.

"I have been for a long time promising myself the pleasure of a visit here," he began, "but till now have been unable to come, being a very busy man. But this morning a large number of my workmen, who are dependent upon the progress made by the masons and carpenters on one of our large public buildings now going up, are made temporarily idle. The other tradesmen have been stopped to-day by the sharp frost and my men have to wait for them, you see. So I thought I would drive over here and see the Orphanages."

"You are very welcome," said Mr. Muller, cordially shaking his hand. "And what is your own business, might I ask?"

"I am a plumbing contractor," was the reply. "But it strikes me, Mr. Muller, that you have it very cold indoors here. Don't you?"

Mr. Muller inwardly thanked God that his prayer had been heard, for here, in this man's presence at the Orphanages, was the answer. In a few words he explained the situation, and told the visitor that he felt that the Lord had sent him there that morning. With tears the contractor avowed his readiness to help.



MR. GEORGE MULLER.

"Then," said Mr. Muller, "send your men here. You say they are idle for the time being, since the frost has stopped the masons and carpenters. Here, in a few hours, they can do what will make all these little ones comfortable, and may save many precious lives besides."

The workmen were soon busy at the Orphanages, and in a few hours the danger was passed. Worldly persons would have pronounced Mr. Muller's way of meeting this trouble a mere waste of time; they would have declared that, instead of spending precious moments in praying, he should have gone to Bristol for aid. But such is Mr. Muller's sublime faith, that as he himself expresses it, the shortest way to accomplish anything is to lay it before the Throne. His experience has convinced him that time spent in prayer is time gained—not lost.

Some of the letters Mr. Muller receives bear internal spiritual evidence of Divine influence at work in the orphans' behalf. One gentleman writes:

"A day or two ago, the Master bid me send you a cheque and told me what its value should be." Another says:

"I was not thinking specially of you when I retired to rest last night, but awoke this morning with the following words ringing in my ears. 'Send Mr. Muller help to-day!' I cannot run the risk of allowing this to be an unheeded voice, and therefore have much pleasure in enclosing you a cheque."

The expenses of maintaining the orphanages average $8,500 per month, and this is supplied from many sources and by Christian donors in many countries who have learned of Mr. Muller and his work. It is a work that has enlisted the sympathies of godly men and women everywhere and whose results cannot now be estimated.

A PRAYER.

LORD, make my heart a garden;
Till now it was a tomb,
Where withered hopes were buried,
On earth no more to bloom.

But e'en the sandy desert
At thy life-giving breath, will blossom like the rose-tree
And life arise from death.

Breathe o'er my barren spirit,
And make this heart of mine
Abloom with Eden flowers,
And every grace divine.

There let the Rose of Sharon
His fragrance sweet distill,
Till all my life is perfumed,
And conquered every ill.

May rills of heavenly mercy
With showers of grace combine;
So give new life and beauty
To every plant divine.

Lord, make my heart a garden,
Free from the weeds of sin;
And as thou walked through Eden,
So come and walk therein.

A GRAND CRUSADE.

TO-DAY—not in the millennium, but to-day—the Church holds the balance of power in America; and if Christian people—the men and the women who profess to love the Lord Jesus Christ and to love purity and to be the sworn enemies of all uncleanness and debauchery and sin—if all such would march side by side and shoulder to shoulder, the drink evil would soon be overthrown. Think of 300,000 churches and Sunday Schools in Christendom marching shoulder to shoulder! How very short a time it would take them to put down this evil, if all the churches of God—trans-Atlantic and cis-Atlantic—were armed on this subject!

I indict this evil as the regicide, the fratricide, the patricide, the matricide, the uxoricide of the century. Yet under what innocent and delusive and mirthful names alcoholism deceives the people! It is a "cordial." It is "bitters." It is an "eye-opener." It is an "appetizer." It is a "digester." It is an "invigorator." It is a "settler." It is a "night-cap." Why don't they put on the right labels—"Essence of Perdition," "Conscience Stupefier," "Five Drachms of Heart-ache," "Tears of Orphanage," "Blood of Souls," "Scabs of an Eternal Leprosy," "Venom of the Worm That Never Dies"? Only once in awhile is there anything in the title of liquors to even hint their atrocity, as in the case of sour mash. That I see advertised all over. It is an honest name, and any one can understand it. Sour mash! That is, it makes a man's disposition sour, and his associations sour, and his prospects sour, and then it is good to mash his body, to mash his soul, and mash his business, and mash his family. Sour mash! One honest name at last for an intoxicant! But through lying labels of many of the apothecaries' shops, good people, who are only a little undertone in health, and wanting of some invigoration, have unwittingly got on their tongue the fangs of this cobra, that stings to death so large a ratio of the human race.

Whether you live in New York, or Chicago or Cincinnati, or Savannah or Boston, or in any of the cities of this land, count up the saloons on that street, and see they are far out of proportion to the population. You people who are so precise and particular lest there should be some imprudence or rashness in attacking the rum traffic, will have your son some night pitched into your front door dead drunk, or your daughter will come home with her children because her husband has, by strong drink, been turned into a demoniac. The rum fiend has despoiled whole streets of good homes in all our cities. Fathers, brothers, sons on the funeral pyre of strong drink! Fasten tighter the victims! Stir up the flames! Pile on the corpses! More men, women, and children for the sacrifice! Let us have whole generations on fire of evil habit; and at the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer let all the people fall down and worship King Alcohol, or you shall be cast into the fiery furnace of the rum power.

CROSSING THE LINE.

THERE are men in mid life, or in early life, or in old age who so aggravatingly reject the Gospel that God lets them alone. They slam the door of the soul in God's face and tell him to begone. Eternal affront is given, and in the book from which no erasures are made their name is recorded among the doomed. Let a man cross the line which separates God's mercy from his indignation, let a man cross that line one inch, and he is as badly off as though he had gone ten thousand furlongs beyond. Oh, before the door is shut, enter! Before the ship sails, get on board! "The King's business requires haste—haste!" Beside that, this truth comes upon me with the greater force when I remember that our earthly stay is uncertain. How I was thrilled when a little piece of paper was handed to me one morning, announcing the departure of one who only a little while before had as much life and health as we have! We are all living on borrowed capital, and know not when it may be called in. There is no map of the great future into which we are traveling. No explorer has gone there and come back to tell us how it is. We feel our way along, knowing not when the lion may spring upon us from the jungle.

There are so many ways of getting out of life; by fall, by assassination, by overwork, by malaria, by insidious disease, by misplaced railroad-switch, by rotten bridge, by fractious horse, by falling wall. Suddenly the curtain falls and the lights are put out, and we go so quickly. Our passage from this life to the next is quicker than I could drop my handkerchief from one hand to the next. The clock ticks one moment and we are here. The clock ticks the next moment and we are in eternity. And what if we die not prepared? Can there be any sorrow greater than that? Who can imagine the horror of that undoing? If I have had—for I make it a personal matter with myself—if I have had twenty, thirty, forty years of opportunity for repentance, and have not genuinely repented, what then? There can be no rectification of blunders beyond the dead line.

POOR VALETUDINARIANS.

WE notice that many have a mania for talking of their ailments. One question about their health will tilt over on you the great reservoir of their complaints. They have told the story so often that they can slide through the whole scale from C above to C below. For thirty years their spine has been at a discount, and they never were any better of neuralgia, till they took the rheumatism. At first you feel sympathy for the invalid; but after awhile the story touches the ludicrous. They tell you that they feel so faint in the morning, and have such poor appetite at noon, and cannot sleep nights, and have twitches in their side, and lumbago in their back, and swellings in their feet, and ringing in their ears, and little dots floating before their eyes; and have taken ammoniacum, tincture of cantharides, hydragogue julep, anthelmintic powder, golden syrup of antimony, leaves of scordium, and, indeed, all hepatics, carminatives, antifebriles, antiscorbutics, splenetics, anthritics, stomachics, ophthalmics; they have gargled their throat with sal ammoniac, and bathed their back with saponaceous liniment, and worn discutient cataplasms. That very moment they are chewing chamomile flowers to settle their stomachs, and excuse themselves for a moment to take off a mustard-plaster that begins to blister. They come back to express the fear that the swelling on their arm will be an abscess, or their headache turn to brain fever. They shake out from their handkerchief delicate odors of valerian and assafœtida. They are the harvest of druggists, and the amazement of physicians, who no sooner clear the pain from one spot than it appears in another. If one joint loses the pang, another joint gets it, and, the patient having long ago resolved never again to be well, it is only a question between membrane and midriff.

At times we should talk over our distresses, and seek sympathy, but perpetual discourse on such themes wears out the patience of our friends. You always see the young people run from the groaning valetudinarian; and the minister fails in his condolence, for why speak of the patience of Job to one who says that boils are nothing to his distresses. The hobby he rides is wounded and scabbed and torn with all the diseases mentioned in farriery, glanders, bots, foot-rot, spavin, ring-bone, and "king's evil." Incurable nags are taken out on the commons and killed, but this poor hobby jogs on with no hope on the other side of the Red Sea of joining Pharaoh's horses. The more it limps, and the harder it breathes, the faster they ride it.

SMALL LIBRARIES.

WE never see a valuable book without wanting it. The most of us have been struck through with a passion for books. Town, city and State libraries to us are an enchantment. We hear of a private library of ten thousand volumes, and think what a heaven the owner must be living in. But the probability is that the man who has five hundred volumes is better off than the man who has five thousand. The large private libraries in uniform editions, and unbroken sets, and Russia covers, are, for the most part, the idlers of the day; while the small libraries, with broken-backed books, and turned-down leaves, and lead-pencil scribbles in the margin, are doing the chief work for the world and the church.

For the most part, the owners of large collections have their chief anxiety about the binding and the type. Take down the whole set of Walter Scott's novels, and find that only one of them has been read through. There are Motley's histories on that shelf; but get into conversation about the prince of Orange, and see that Motley has not been read. I never was more hungry than once while walking in a Charleston mill amid whole harvests of rice. One handful of that grain in a pudding would have been worth more to me than a thousand tierces uncooked. Great libraries are of but little value if unread, and amid great profusion of books the temptation is to read but little. If a man take up a book, and feel he will never have a chance to see it again, he says: "I must read it now or never," and before the day has past has devoured it. The owner of the large library says: "I have it for myself, and any time can refer to it."

What we can have any time we never have. I found a group of men living at the foot of Whiteface Mountain who had never been to the top, while I had come hundreds of miles to ascend it. They could go any time so easily. It is often the case that those who have plain copies of history are better acquainted with the past than those who have most highly adorned editions of Bancroft, Prescott, Josephus and Herodotus.

Use to the utmost what books you have, and do not waste your time in longing after a great library.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

HOW YOU LOOK AT IT.

I MEAN the problem of carrying the Gospel to every one alive, of this generation. It all depends upon how you view the case. A half dead and alive Christian will get the big end of the telescope to his eye, and see the thing so dimly, in the far distance that you can count on his doing nothing, except it be to vote for some resolution, or second some motion, or criticise some worker; then he will have to ride home in the horse-car, and get some one to pull off his boots. He keeps an alarm-clock, too.

A worker,—you can tell him by the cut of his conversation, will have but little to do with long drawn-out motions and resolutions, and every night when he sleeps, he knows that there is more light in this dark world than there was twenty-four hours ago; for he has been letting some in.

Wake up Cross.

I've been trying to do some "waking up" of late, and this is my experience. Some Christians, like some babies, wake up cross. I'd rather have a howling church, than a dead or sleeping church. The trouble is, some churches are dead from desk to door. If any stir is done, it must be by the devil or an angel; and as to the first named, he could not be persuaded to interfere with his own work being so well done; and whatever power an angel has, I've yet to discover one who undertook a job of this kind. Our only hope is, that God himself will resurrect some one therein, and he shake the rest till all awake. Some laughing, some crying; the very noise will result in good.

Reader, are you really awake? Noise does not always determine it, for some people snore.

Reformation Needed.

Talk about getting sinners converted, there is need to begin nearer at home. Some preachers could stand it, and some official church members, too. Here is a dose for you.

Not long since, at a meeting of Sunday School superintendents, in a city where rum has ruined tens of thousands, they had Roman punch served with their refreshments. Those men, and there were some preachers gathered in the throng, need a lesson on avoiding the appearance of evil, mixed with some straight truth on setting good examples. If you can serve Roman punch to the superintendents, why not add it to the bill-of-fare for teachers and scholars.

I thought most folks of the Protestant church at least, knew by this time, that rum and ruin go together.

Don't be a Fool.

I mean that for the preachers, and on this line. To get up in the desk and cry out in thunder tones against the rich and getting of riches, and then close with a begging match, smiling on those who, by frugality and work, are able to contribute large money. That, in my opinion, is playing the fool.

In the first place, there is no sin in getting wealth—some would think there is, by the prattle of certain prophets. I know lots of wealthy men, and they will tell you that the love for their money is not in them, but in a lot of others who would like to spend what they have neither brains nor muscle to make.

I'm no friend to a stingy rich man, nor am I to a growler at wealthy, good folk. Money has its place in this world, and millions couple it with mercy; and daily it is an angel, doing what kind words could never do. To the rich let me say—give. To the poor let me say—get.

Trust the People.

It is very seldom you find an audience that cannot be trusted. If you deal with them justly and frankly they will respond nine times out of ten.

They wont stand any tricks. Neither will they be deceived. An individual is not half so quick in detecting fault as an audience. Perfect honesty is necessary on the part of any speaker or leader who leads for any length of time a crowd. If he does not have this, he wont long have the crowd.

Because an audience fails sometimes to do what is expected is not always their fault. The leader may be to blame. I have known this to be true over and over again.

My brother, if you are a leader, let me say trust the people, put confidence in them, they like it. They will not betray you.

Of course there are exceptions. I too have known when an audience became worse than a balky horse.

Using a club won't make them go.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE CRISIS IN FRANCE.

FRENCH society has been shocked and public confidence disturbed by a scandal which affects the reputation of men high in office. It is openly charged that statesmen of the first rank who have sat in the cabinet and been at the head of the administrative departments of the Republic have accepted enormous bribes. Deputies occupying the position of our Representatives in Congress are also charged with the same offence. The first hint of exposure came with the collapse of the Panama Canal enterprise in which small investors all over France had risked their savings. The government had been to some extent sponsors of the enterprise and had to share in the responsibility. An investigation by a committee of the legislature was demanded, there being a suspicion that the funds intrusted to the Canal Company had not been legitimately used. The reluctance of the government to appoint the committee confirmed the suspicion and gave rise to a rumor that it wanted to shield some of its own members. The sudden death under suspicious circumstances of Baron Reinach who had held high office and the discovery that he had spent the evening before his death in burning private papers was another disturbing disclosure. Eventually M. Andrieux, who has been at the head of the Police department came to the front and made the direct charge that the Canal Company had bribed statesmen, members of the legislature and journalists in large numbers to assist in securing government support for the canal project, and he gave their names. The people were shocked and disgusted, and for a time it was thought that a revolution was imminent, which would not only sweep the besmirched men from office but overturn the Republic. The people were incited to rescue the country from a gang of corrupt swindlers and to place the government in the hands of the descendant of the old monarchy, by calling an Orleans prince to the throne. The fact, however, that no one had aspersed the President, M. Carnot, and that his integrity had not been questioned did much to restore confidence, though the situation is still critical and the danger of an upheaval is not yet passed. The investigation is now proceeding, and will doubtless be a thorough one. The noble families of France may now ask in the words of the prophet, "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly, he that despiseth the gain of oppressions and that shaketh his hand from the holding of bribes" (Isa. 33: 14.)

An Elephant on an Indiana Farm.

A FARMER living near Crawfordsville, Ind., was astonished a few days ago, on going out in the morning, to find his fences broken, the corncribs gutted and everything about the place flung about. The cause of the mischief was a mystery until night, when the farmer resolved to watch for the return of the intruder. Shortly before midnight he heard a noise which showed that a repetition of the previous night's devastation was in progress. The farmer sallied out to protect his property, but quickly returned when he saw a huge elephant in his yard. He watched the beast from an upper window and saw him satisfy his appetite on various kinds of provender, and then tear down a straw-stack and make a bed on which he lay down to sleep. The farmer feared to disturb him lest he should attack the house. He watched all night, wondering how long his unwieldy and unwelcome guest would stay with him and whether he had any friends who could pay his board. Early in the morning he was relieved by seeing a party of men who evidently came in search of the big brute. They tracked his footprints to the yard and then dexterously secured him with strong chains. It appeared that he had escaped from a circus which had been exhibiting at Waynetown. The circus-men were as glad to regain possession of the animal as the farmer was to be rid of him. He was a source of profit to them, while to the farmer he brought only loss. They knew how to control him while the farmer did not. If the farmer sees the same elephant in the circus he will probably be surprised at the docility of the animal; he would be still more surprised if he were to go to India, by seeing elephants engaged profitably in farm work. Vast strength may be made as useful as it may be destructive. It is so with human beings. The energy and force of character which may make a man a formidable foe to religion will make him, after he is converted, a more effective servant of Christ. Saul of Tarsus, who was "a chosen vessel" to God, was the man who "made havoc of the Church." (Acts 8: 3.)

A Timely Rescue.

A STEAM tug arrived at Vineyard Haven, Mass., on December 24th, having on board the captain and crew of the schooner Fish. The tug had been in the storm and was thickly coated with ice from the top of the pilot-house to the water-line. Her captain said that the gale on the previous night had been so fierce that he had been obliged to anchor at a point about three miles south of Nantucket Shoals. Early on the following morning he saw distress signals thrown up and went in the direction of them to see if he could render assistance. He found the Fish in a sinking condition. She was on her way to England with a cargo of coal from Perth Amboy, but had been blown out of her course. She had anchored, but in straining at her anchors under the stress of the hurricane, she had sprung a leak. For thirty-six hours the crew had been working at the pumps without doing more than keeping the water from increasing in the hold. They were utterly exhausted, but they knew that if they ceased working the ship would speedily fill and go down. They would have taken to the boats if the weather had permitted, but it was so cold that they knew they should perish in an open boat. When the tug arrived they were giving themselves up for lost. The captain and crew were speedily transferred to the tug, but before they were out of sight the Fish had settled until the deck was level with the sea and the waves washed over it. The crew were very glad to cease their weary work at the pumps when there was a refuge at hand. They did not act as some do, who, when they know they are in danger of perishing, persist in trying to save themselves instead of flying to Christ the Refuge provided for them. (Rom. 4: 5.)

President of the French Republic.

A Wedding Twice Deferred.

A PRESS dispatch from Norwich, Pa., describes a double disappointment which befell a party of wedding guests. They assembled on Dec. 7, at a farm-house near that town to witness the marriage of the farmer's daughter to a young man, to whom she had been engaged nearly five years. Punctually, the minister rose to begin the marriage service and the guests ranged themselves around. The bridegroom was in his place but the bride was absent. Her girl friends had seen her earlier in the evening and congratulated her. After waiting a few minutes, her mother went to her room to call her. She found the door locked and heard the sound of weeping within. To her mother's appeal the only answer she would give was, "I'm too nervous! I'm too nervous! I can't come! It must be put off." She would not unlock the door and when her father came up and told her that the guests and the minister and her future husband were all waiting, she gave him the same answer, adding as a message to the bridegroom that she would surely marry him in ten days. There was no resource but to inform the guests that the ceremony must be postponed. The bridegroom seemed greatly mortified but he begged that all would come on the day fixed by the bride. On that day the same party assembled and this time the bride was on hand, ready for the ceremony. But the bridegroom was absent, and at the last moment he sent a note excusing himself. The ceremony, he said, must be deferred indefinitely. "I am not nervous," he wrote, "but my nerves will not permit me to go on with this affair." So the guests were again dismissed without witnessing the wedding. The girl's humiliation, being so public, must have been extreme and if she really loved the man she must bitterly regret her conduct. So it will be with some who postpone their union with Christ on frivolous grounds. The time will come when he will not listen to them and will treat them as strangers. (Luke 13: 25-27.)

Ploughed up a Treasure.

A SINGULAR discovery has been made by the son of a farmer in Indiana. The farm is near Bedford and in rather a hilly neighborhood. The soil being poor, most of the two hundred acres of which it consists was used for pasturage. One of the farmer's sons, however, persuaded him to let him cultivate a small portion which seemed of better quality than the rest. On the first day of his ploughing he struck a snag. Before turning the plough aside he tried to work out the snag. By dint of considerable hard work he succeeded in dragging out a log which had covered a hole. Groping in the hole he found a quantity of coins, gold, silver and copper. Among them were rare old French coins, a number of Mexican dollars and some American dollars of the Revolutionary period. Their face value was about five hundred dollars, but as many of the pieces are very old and scarce, their market value will be many times that amount. It is supposed that they originally belonged to some settler who, dreading an attack by Indians, secreted his savings in the field, and was killed in some raid without having an opportunity of revealing the hiding-place. The farmer would not have been so reluctant as he was to have that field ploughed, if he had suspected that a treasure might be found there. It is so sometimes with the Church. Many a treasure which God will have in the day that he makes up his jewels has been found in a sphere that was not thought worth cultivating. (Mal. 3: 17.)

A Village in a Temple.

A CHRISTIAN gentleman who has just returned from a tour in Oriental lands gives a description of a strange sight he witnessed in a historic temple. He had read of the remarkable beauty of the ancient temple of Baal and determined to visit it that he might see how much of its ruins might still be standing. He found a huge wall seventy-five feet high enclosing a quadrangle 470 feet square. Part of the wall had fallen down but had been clumsily repaired with the old materials from the interior. Two sides, however, were perfect. Its pilasters were singularly beautiful and here and there was a fluted Corinthian column of rich, creamy-colored limestone, rising in stately grace with entablatures unbroken and capitals of exquisite moulding. But the strange feature of the scene was that the quadrangle was full of mud huts placed as close together as they could be crowded. They were full of Arabs living in squalor and filth. Looking up, the visitor saw the graceful columns and the walls adorned with sculpture; looking down he saw the wretched mud huts and the dirty Arabs of the village of Tadmor. The Arabs were using the place not because of any idea of sanctity about it, but because the walls afforded them shelter and were a protection from robbers, and they had not the grace to live cleanly there. There is reason to fear that many people are in the Christian Church from similarly interested motives. They are there for the advantages to be obtained by a religious connection and not because they desire to work for Christ and, like the Arabs, some of them do not lead cleanly lives. Christ foresaw that such a time would come. (Luke 13: 19.)

A Veteran Army Nurse Dead.

AN old lady died in Bellevue Hospital, New York, on Dec. 10, who had an eventful history. She was born in Ireland many years ago and was of a good family. She married an officer in the British army who, shortly after the birth of their child, was ordered with his regiment to the Crimea. He was wounded in one of the early battles of the war and his wife hearing that he was in a hospital, and likely to be a long time recovering, scraped together all the property they had and went out with her child to nurse him. In the first battle that occurred after the man was able to rejoin his regiment, he was killed. His wife volunteered as a hospital nurse and remained till the close of the war. The hospitals were horrible places and the fever broke out in them, killing many who would have otherwise recovered from their wounds. The nurse's child sickened with it and died. When at last the war was over and she returned to her native land, her loneliness and the suffering she had borne and witnessed preyed on her mind and she became melancholy. Eventually she came to America to seek a brother who was settled here. But she could not be happy in his home and left it to live in a wretched attic-room in a back street in New York. She had a small fortune made up of gifts from officers she had nursed in the Crimea and on this she managed to live. She was very morose and seldom went out of her room and never admitted any one to it. One day her landlord went up to collect her rent and found her at the point of death. She had been ill for two weeks without doctor or nurse or any one to attend to her wants. She was taken to Bellevue, where she died in a few hours. It was sad that she, who had soothed so many dying beds, should have passed away in loneliness and wretchedness, but it was the penalty of the isolation she had voluntarily sought. The good deeds of our past lives, like our evil deeds, may lose their effect by a reversal of the principles that have governed them. (Isa. 1: 16-18.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Presbyterian Mission Board issues a caution against giving to individuals who are soliciting money to pay for the education in this country of young men from Persia and representing that they are connected with the Oroomiah Presbyterian College.

The Protestant Episcopal City Mission in New York spent $65,203 during the past year in religious and philanthropic work among the homes and public institutions of the city. This is the sixty-first year of its history. Its work is "to preach the Gospel to the poor and to relieve the unfortunate."

A conference is being held this week in New York of representatives of the Presbyterian, Reformed and Collegiate Reformed Churches with the view of arranging a plan for practical co-operation in foreign mission work especially in Brazil and Corea. On Jan. 13, a conference is to be held to which representatives of all the Protestant foreign missionary societies will be invited for a like object.

Dr. Charles F. Deems, pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York, is seriously ill. On Dec. 17, while writing at his desk, his right hand suddenly became useless. On the following morning he was unable to preach and a friend occupied his pulpit. In the evening he preached sitting in a chair, being too weak to stand. His physicians have prescribed absolute rest for several weeks. Dr. Deems is in his 73d year.

Mr. J. P. Thompson, who is laboring among the Choctaws in the Indian Territory, writes that many of them who can read English have no religious reading of any kind. Copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which he has been able to distribute have been much appreciated and have done much good. He would be thankful to receive copies from any reader who does not preserve them for binding. His address is McAlester, Ind. Ter.

The State of Maine is taking the lead in the union of the denominations for aggressive Christian work. At a meeting held recently at Lewiston to formulate "a code of comity" and a plan of co-operation every evangelical denomination in the State was represented. Addresses were made by Dr. Paine, president of the Bangor Seminary; President Whitman, of Colby University; Dr. Summerbell, Freewill Baptist; Rev. J. M. Frost, Methodist; Rev. O. J. Hancock, Christian, and E. R. Stilson, agent of the Maine Bible Society.

A number of citizens of New York have signed a call for an Anti-Gambling mass-meeting to be held in Chickering Hall, January 8, 1893, when steps will be taken looking to the organization of a national society for the suppresssion of the gambling evil. This is the outcome of the agitation that has resulted from the Anti-Gambling crusade of John Philip Quinn, the converted gambler. In his railroad car, Roanoke, he has visited hundreds of places in different States during the last few months and addressed many audiences, with marked effect. A large number have signed the anti-gambling pledge. Mr. Quinn may be addressed at 21 Times Building, New York.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

AN IRRESISTIBLE MAJORITY.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, January 1st, 1893, by Dr. R. S. MacArthur.

"Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." II. Kings 6: 16.

We stand to-day on the threshold of a new year; and we would be more or less than human did not solemn thoughts fill our souls as we thus stand. We look backward with regret because of our many failures, but with gratitude to God because of his many mercies. We look forward with anxiety and yet with trust and hope. What of joy or sorrow has the year in store for us? God alone knows. Wisely does he hide the future from our gaze. The knowledge that either great sorrow or great joy was before us would unfit us for present duty. Strange forebodings will at times come upon us; dark shadows will at times fall upon our homes and our hearts. Doubtless some who begin the year with us will end it with God; but we shall not borrow trouble, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." With our hand in God's we humbly and joyously step over the boundary line between the old year and the new. In this spirit we listen to the echoes of the dying past, and we hear the notes of the living present and of the hopeful future. With high hopes beating in our hearts we stand a moment on the boundary to sing with the now glorified Tennyson:

> [illegible]
> The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
> [illegible]
> Ring in the Christ that is to be.

It has been my custom for some years, as many of you know, to select for the first Sunday of each year a passage of Scripture which may be a motto-text for the year. Sometimes this text has been a divine promise, sometimes a human resolution, and sometimes it has been a command from God, or a prayer to God. This year the passage selected is a union of a comforting command and

A Reassuring Promise.

The text is: "Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them."

Let us attend for a little to the historic connection. Benhadad, King of Syria, warred with Jehoram, King of Israel. We know not what was the cause of the war. The close proximity of the tribes, the ill-defined border of their countries, and the predatory habits of the people were sufficient reasons for hostilities at any time. It is possible that Naaman was dead; or if not dead, he may have lost part of his influence with his master because of his allegiance to the prophet and the God of Israel. The war progressed, but all Benhadad's plans resulted in defeat. His enemy anticipated and frustrated all his designs. Bendadad soon suspects a traitor in his camp. He hastily summons his officers; he imperiously demands a [illegible] of the facts. He is told that Elisha, [illegible], is the cause, and learns that the prophet is in Dothan. He takes immediate steps to arrest him; and for that purpose a host is sent in the night. Silently and unobservedly the soldiers take their places on the heights [illegible]. His servant goes out and gazes in dismay on the horses, chariots and hosts which surround the city. The young man exclaims, "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" The prophet, strong in his God, answers, "Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." How could this be? The youth sees the prophet defenceless, and he sees [illegible], and immediately his prayer is answered. The young man's eyes are opened; "And behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots [illegible]."

This material universe is but a small part of the resources of the Almighty. There are those who think that this world is all. They consider its interests as the only proper subjects of their study; its obligations the only ones to be met, and its rewards the only ones to be desired. These men rob themselves of the noblest elements of human life. They judge themselves to be unworthy of eternal life; they divorce themselves from spiritual life, from eternal realities, and from the life and love of God. They are willing to be merely animals of a higher order and finally to die as the beast dieth. Seeing only this world, they conclude that this world is all. They would measure the eternities with their pocket tapeline. They would banish God, and would rob the world of its beauty, and manhood of its glory. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision." "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." These are solemn words of holy Scripture. Only a fool would say "there is no God," and he says it in his heart, for the head of even a fool knows better. Like the prophet's servant many men now

Need to have their Eyes Opened.

There are, as the great dramatist said, more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in their philosophy. Believers, rejoice in the truth of the prophet's declaration. If there are hosts of enemies around your path, there is a God of hosts beside you. Heaven is nearer than you dream. The very air is filled with the messengers of Jehovah sent forth to protect his people. Fear not, however weak you are in yourselves; fear neither man nor devil. The Apostle Peter triumphantly asks, "Who is he that will harm you if ye be followers of that which is good?" No weapon formed against you shall prosper. Satan is strong; but Christ is stronger. Satan is mighty; but Christ is almighty. Heaven is above hell; the promise is that we shall bruise Satan under our feet shortly. Those on our side are more both in number and in power than those opposed to us. Let us consider the facts.

All God's people on earth and in heaven are on our side. We belong to "the noble army of martyrs;" we claim an interest in "the goodly fellowship of the prophets;" we are in a true sense the successors of "the glorious company of the apostles;" we have our share in the peerage of heaven, and our part in the elite of the earth. Some have crossed the flood; some are crossing now, but it is still one army of the living God. Over all floats the banner of our conquering Lord. Every noble man is our brother; every Christly woman is our sister. Wherever there beats a heart filled with Christ's love, there beats with our own. Every man who has been washed in the blood of Jesus, whatever his color, creed, or condition, is our blood relation. A bond of love stronger than death, more enduring than time, girdles the world. Heart responds to heart; every victory won by Christians anywhere and at any time is won for Christians everywhere and in all times. Was there ever such a companionship? See the "great cloud of witnesses" watching from the crystal battlements of heaven. Moses and David, Peter and Paul, James and John, Ambrose and Augustine, Clement and Chrysostom, Luther and Latimer, Bunyan and Baxter, Wesley and Whitefield—parts of the mighty host of the redeemed. There are the thousands who stained the Alpine snows with their blood, men and women of whom the world was not worthy. There are the thousands of Covenanters, who with weary feet trod the glens and climbed the hills of Scotland, and finally went up to glory and to God. Once they hid in dens and caves of the earth, now they walk in triumph the golden streets. Think of the thousands who went by fire and by sword into glory from Smithfield and the Grass Market; think of the thousands of brave Huguenots, who fell on St. Bartholomew's Day! Oh men and women, ours is a glorious fellowship; to-day the feeblest saint is in company worthy to rank with angels.

But think of the men and women who are still in the fight. They are the best men; they are the noblest women on God's footstool. It is an honor to associate with them; it is a glory to be one of them. They are the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; they are heirs of glory. Christ called his people the salt of the earth; the salt has not yet lost its savor. Christ called them the light of the world; that light has not gone out; it shall continue to shine more and more until the perfect day. Let Christ's friends be our friends.

The unfallen angels are on our side. The Scriptures always represent the angels as numerous and mighty; and not as the painters do, of meek, gentle, and benign appearance. The painters emphasize their beauty; the Scriptures their might. Their is no notice in the Bible of angelic appearances until after the call of Abraham. During the time of Moses and Joshua there is no account of the appearance of created angels, but they are often mentioned during the period of the Judges and the Captivity. These were periods of transition. The former period was destitute of prophetic guidance; and the latter period was a time of peculiar trial from heathen associations. It was thus of special importance that the people should have full and accurate information as to their Heavenly Helpers.

The coming of the Christ marks a new epoch in angelic ministration. The Master had come; the servants followed him. From the Word of God we know that the angels take a deep interest in man's redemption. Even in the Old Testament it is said, "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." The writer of the epistle to the Hebrew asks, "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Did not Christ himself say, "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth?" Of Christ's little ones it is said, "In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven." It was an angel that told Mary that she should be the mother of Christ; it was angels who sang, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men," as the stars silently looked down on the plains of Bethlehem on the night when our Lord was born. Angels came to minister to Christ when in the garden he sweat as it were great drops of blood, and when in the agony of spirit he took the cup which it was not possible for his Father to remove from his quivering lips. Angels sat in the sepulchre, one at the feet, and one at the head of the place where our Lord lay. Angels told the glad tidings of his resurrection to the weeping women; and angels told the lingering disciples as they gazed wonderingly and longingly up into the heavens that as he had been taken up from them into heaven, even so he would come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven.

Angelic Protection.

They also appeared in the earlier day from time to time for the defence and protection of God's people: "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him and delivereth them." Two came to hasten Lot from the cities of the plain, when God's wrath was poured out upon them in fire and brimstone. One opened the prison door for the apostle Peter. To-day they help us to resist temptation and to escape from the snares of the evil one. Evil spirits, we are told, roam at large seeking whom they may devour; good spirits, we may be sure, are seeking whom they may protect from the devourer. Man was tempted by a fallen angel; why may we not be helped by an unfallen angel? Angels bear the souls of the redeemed into paradise; Christ himself taught us that Lazarus was borne by angels to the bosom of Abraham. There is nothing absurd in the idea that angels help us. True, they are unseen, but so are many other benefactors. Day by day angelic beings are about us. Oftener than we think they are our deliverers. Let us rejoice in this truth, and go forth fearlessly and triumphantly into the untried scenes of this new year.

The triune God is for us. We may well triumphantly ask with Paul, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" In II. Chron. 32: 7, 8, we read:

"Be Strong and Courageous, be not afraid nor dismayed for the king of Assyria, nor for all the multitude that is with him; for there be more with us than with him. With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us and to fight our battles." The Psalmist in Psalm 55: 18, thus rejoices in his God: "He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me; for there were many with me."

Let us look for a little at the part each Person in the Trinity takes on our behalf. The Holy Spirit is our Guide and Helper. He is our Teacher and Inspirer. In the very dawn of revelation the Holy Spirit is revealed as co-operating in creation. He is the Source and Sustainer of life; he is the Author of skill and supernatural knowledge; and in prophetic times his presence is clearly marked as inspiring all prophetic utterances. In Christ's time His agency is everywhere recognized; and the ascension of Christ marked a new epoch in the history and manifestation of the Holy Spirit.

The Spirit Incarnate.

The new dispensation is especially his dispensation. It is his office to enter into and to dwell with every believer. Believers are the temples of the Holy Ghost. This is a marvelous thought. There is an incarnation of the third Person of the Trinity as truly as of the second. The third Person is incarnated in the bodies and hearts of true believers. This truth sublimely exalts the Christian life. The Spirit applies and completes the great work of redemption. His inspiration leads us into all truth, and gives us all true knowledge by taking the things of Christ and making them known to us. He unites all believers into one body. The Holy Spirit not only brings us into the light of truth now but by him God will bring us into life from the grave. It is he which strengthens, sanctifies and seals our souls unto the day of the complete redemption. The emblems by which he is represented in the Scripture are very suggestive. He is represented by water which cleanses, refreshes and fertilizes; by fire which purifies, enlightens and ennobles; by rain which comes from above and revives and beautifies; by dew which gently falls and richly blesses. The Spirit comes as a dove, timid, gentle, meek and innocent. He is represented as a voice which warns, guides, rebukes, teaches and comforts. He is the divine Paraclete who intercedes with us for God as Jesus Christ is the divine-human Advocate who intercedes with God for us. Let us beware how we quench this holy flame-like Spirit, how we grieve this dove-like messenger from heaven. Happy are they who are led by the Spirit; they and only they know that they are truly the children of God!

The Head of the New Race.

Jesus Christ is on our side. He is for us in his glorious and divine humanity. Christ was not a Jew, not a Roman, not a Greek, not a man, he was man. He was the head of a new race. In him was all the nobility of man, and all the sweetness of woman. He was the centre of a new humanity. In him the plant of humanity blossomed into a perfect flower. He was and is the sun of the moral universe. He belongs to no clime or civilization, because he belongs to all climes and civilizations. He was recognized as the ideal of humanity. He is still the ideal of humanity. The world cannot outgrow him; it still sits at his feet learning of him. He loved men in masses because he loved them singly. "He had compassion on the multitude," but he had a peculiar and discriminating compassion for doubting Thomas and for boastful Peter. He longed for all at Jericho; but he called Zaccheus, the publican, and Bartimeus, the beggar, to himself. His work of atonement was for us poor and lost sinners; for he came to seek and to save the lost. His prevailing intercession shows that he is still for us. The ascended Lord was tempted, and he knows how to succor those who are tempted. Oh, men and women never despair, never give up,

Take Fresh Heart To-day.

The Friend of publicans and sinners is now on the throne of the universe. The Christ who was as loving as a mother and is mighty as God, is for us. God gave him for us, and how shall he not with him freely give us all things? Lean harder on his mighty arm. Who can resist him? To him "the kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Seba and Sheba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him." Thank God, "His enemies shall lick the dust."

God the Father is for us. Then all is for us. The stars in their courses fought against Sisera, and God out of his infinite resources can still make all the forces of nature fight for his people and against his foes. O, child of God, you are safe. "A thousand shall fall at thy side and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee." God will gird his children with strength and garland them with glory.

We learn here the folly of limiting our faith to what we can see. Elisha did not pray that God's chariots and horses might surround the mount; they were there already. What the youth needed was that his eyes be opened. O men, you need not more evidence of God's power and love, of God's grace and of God's glory; but you need to have your eyes opened. You need eyes to see. In vain do I offer music to the deaf, or exhibit paintings to the blind; equally in vain is all God's mercy and loving-kindness to those who are blind and cannot see them. The scales of ignorance, prejudice, pride and self-righteousness must fall, then shall you see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; and, like Moses of old, be enabled to endure as seeing him who is invisible.

We see also the folly of opposing God. He who works against God works his own ruin. The man who strikes at God strikes in vain. Well has it been said, "If he takes a heavier hammer and tries to strike a harder blow the blow will rebound and fall with crushing force upon his own head." God is sovereign and he must reign until he has put all his enemies under his feet.

All true success is to be found in working with God. There can be no enduring, no honorable earthly fame when men oppose God. Some one has suggested that we can learn much if we "compare the measure and permanent results of the work of Pharaoh with that of Moses, of Celsus with that of Origen, of Voltaire with that of Luther, of Thomas Paine with that of William Carey, of Byron with that of Judson." Satan's cause is

A Lost Cause.

It is doomed. God's cause must stand. It is stated that "Gibbon, Voltaire and Chesterfield labored to overthrow Christianity, but God has overruled their purposes. In Gibbon's house at Lake Leman there is a room where Bibles are sold. The printing press from which Voltaire's infidel works were issued has been appropriated to printing the Word of God; and Chesterfield's parlor, formerly an infidel club room, echoing with profanity and gibes at the Christian religion, is now a vestry where the prayers of the penitent go up to God." Thomas Paine on his return from France, sitting in the City Hotel on Broadway boasted that in five years there would not be a Bible in America. How we smile to-day at such prophecies. The time will soon come when the boastful words of another infidel will provoke only a smile of pity or an expression of contempt. God lives and reigns, and his cause must triumph. It is a fearful thing for one to live in opposition to God. Is there one in this audience who Lives to Oppose God?

Did you so live during the year 1892? All through its months and days you were dependent on God's bounty, and living in disobedience to his command and in contempt of his love. How dare a man so live? In God we live, move and have our being; in his hand is our breath, and his are all our ways. And we dare to withhold from him the homage of our hearts and the consecration of our lives.

Hear the echoes of the last notes of 1892! They are bearing their record to the throne of God. The books are closing not to be opened until we stand before the great white throne. Send up the prayer now for pardon and cleansing through the precious blood of Christ. Carry not into this new year the burden of unforgiven sin, the blackness of an uncharitable heart, the mountain load of unbelief against God! Too long have you rejected the offers of mercy; too long turned a deaf ear to Christ on his cross and on his throne. Oh submit to the pleadings of his love to-day! My heart longs for your salvation. Give your heart to God now. In return for his "unspeakable gift" give him that poor heart to be cleansed and made fit for his dwelling-place. Then you shall sweetly learn in life and death "that they that be with us are more than they that be with them."

WORK IN INDIA.

IN a recent letter to the Baptist Missionary Magazine, the Rev. P. M. Johnson, who is laboring at Hanamaconda, in India, gives an encouraging report of the progress of the Gospel in that region. He says: I have had the joy of baptizing fourteen men since last Thursday. We made the first short tour of the season, visiting Nalgonda, a village about thirty miles from Hanamaconda. There we found considerable interest concerning Christianity, and five believers awaited our coming to be baptized. Many others in that part of the field declare their belief in Christ as the only true God and Saviour. The native preachers give most encouraging reports of many villages and hamlets, and we have strong reasons to hope for a great blessing about Nalgonda in the future.

On Friday we returned to Hanamaconda to make further preparations for more extensive touring. Sunday morning an unusually large number gathered into our Sunday School and a stronger manifestation of God's presence and power I have never seen in a native congregation in India. We turned the preaching service into prayer-meeting, at the close of which twelve newly converted souls joyfully confessed Christ and desired to be baptized at once. They were all gladly received by the Church, and then in our new baptistry, under the shade of two margosa trees, they were baptized.

HEAVEN'S GREATEST JOY.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

WHAT is the crowning bliss of heaven?
I ask a mourner whose sad eyes
Are wet with tears shed o'er the grave,
Where her heart's dearest treasure lies.
She answers, "Heaven will be sweet,
Because I know I there shall meet
The loved ones gone before."

What is the crowning bliss of heaven,
I ask the sick ones, racked with pain,
From whose pale cheeks the glow of health,
Has fled ne'er to return again.
And they reply with kindling eyes,
"In that fair land beyond the skies,
No sickness e'er can come."

What is the crowning bliss of heaven?
I ask my own immortal soul,
Are there no greater joys than these,
To bless us while the ages roll?
My soul responds "Heaven's greatest bliss
Will be to see Him as He is,
And worship at his feet.

—AMARANTH.

WAITING.

ART thou coming, my Beloved,
Art thou coming once again?
Not a man of tears and sorrows,
But a "King of kings" to reign.
And to rule in regal splendor
Where such sorrow pierced thy heart:
Can it be our best Beloved,
Coming never to depart?

Oh, the thought begets a transport
Of delight that buoys the soul,
As we watch and struggle onward
Past the darkness to the goal.
And when winds and waves chastise us,
Having drifted from the lee;
We must surely sink and perish,
But for hope of meeting thee.

The hope that makes the wilderness
To blossom as the rose;
The hope that make the desolate
Sincerely to repose;
The hope to see thee as thou art
And lean upon thy breast,
Has overcome my soul to-day
With deep unfathomed rest.

THE CLOSING DISPENSATION.

A Clue to the Time of the Consummation in the Mystery of the Body.

BY WARRAND HOUGHTON.

IF the readiness of a great many Christians is to be the criterion of the nearness of the Lord's coming for his Church, that event must be very far off just now. What desire there was a few years ago to look into these things was, perhaps, only limited to some four or five thousand souls, and to-day the estimate would be probably for below that figure.

To be dead to the world, alive in Christ, and waiting for his coming, are alike matters of doctrine, as of prophecy. But if, nevertheless, those who can see that certain predicted events are apparently on the point of taking place, and yet know from Scripture that they cannot do so until the Lord has come for his Church, it becomes an imperative duty to give great prominence to the Lord's coming in all teaching. The man of God must reprove, rebuke and exhort. It never was more needed than to-day. Awful things are coming upon the world. The world knows something of this; but many Christians are in dreamland.

It was when Israel was corrupt, rotten from the sole of the foot to the head, that God announced comfort to Jerusalem in the person of his servant, the Holy One of Israel. But just as in the days of Malachi, there were those who feared the name of the Lord and looked for the coming of the Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings, so now there are people hoping for his coming as the only remedy for the failures of the Church of Israel, of governments, of society. "My thoughts are not your thoughts neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." (Isa. 55: 8.)

Let us see, then, what thoughts God has revealed to us in regard to times of failure, and see if the present time in any way corresponds to dispensational changes spoken of in his Word. Let us turn to Matt. 24. There is a great dispensational break referred to in this chapter after verse 6. The Lord began his great prophetical discourse in Matt. 24. "Many shall come in my name, saying, I am the Christ; and shall lead many astray. And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars; see that ye be not troubled, for these things must needs come to pass; but the end is not yet." The false christs of the first two centuries, the wars and rumors of wars, nay, the destruction of Jerusalem itself, did not herald in any way the End of the Age. Thus the Lord tells his disciples, "The end is not yet."

Then, if the end was "not yet," what was to come in the interval? We must turn to later Scripture. The mystery of the One Body. That was committed to Paul only. It was some time after Pentecost that he received it, and even then it was fourteen years before he could get Peter, James, and John to accept it as from God. Of its nature, its origin, its purport, its value, its internal economy, we have no revelation whatever outside the epistles he addressed to the assemblies of believers dwelling in seven Gentile cities, and to their pastors. Were those epistles taken out of our Bibles, the remainder would stand as a consistent whole, and those epistles are complete in themselves. Nevertheless, there is a link; for, the Book of Acts shows us how Paul came on the scene, while the Epistle to the Romans is the counterpart, showing how the mystery of the One Body displays in all its completeness the righteousness of God in his dealings with man from Adam down to date.

But when the interval is over, and the work revealed to Paul completed, as regards its earthly aspect, by God bringing with Jesus those laid to sleep by him, and the living being changed, then will take place what the Lord Jesus, in our twenty-fourth of Matthew, is going on to describe from verse seven onward, in order that all Israel may be saved through the believing remnant, as represented by his disciples then with him on the Mount.

It is, in fact, clear that this Scripture stands out from the rest of the Word in such marked prominence, that even the most ignorant persons in the professing church know that such signs are to determine the last days of the times of the Gentiles.

There have always been wars and rumors of wars; but when, till now, have there been armed nations? When, till now, has it been possible for nation to rise up against nation? Nor can we help noticing the throes of Israel as exemplified in the revival of anti-Semitic feeling in northern and eastern Europe. Is not the eagle stirring up her nest? Speaking of the rising up of nation against nation, in connections with famines, pestilences and earthquakes, the Lord uttered these remarkable words: "These are the beginning of sorrows."

MR. MOODY'S MEDICAL HEARER.

AT one of Mr. Moody's meetings in Glasgow, a young physician, notorious for his profligacy, was present. His father, also a physician had mourned for years over his erring but brilliant son. All his appeals, however, had been unavailing. The young man scoffed at religion, ridiculed the idea of any life after this, and declared that he would have all the pleasure he could get while he was alive. It was evident that it would not be much, for his excesses and his heedlessness had undermined his constitution, and his own medical knowledge apprised him that a fatal disease was already making rapid progress in his system. The fact, however, did not solemnize him. He was still bent on spending the short time he had to live in dissipation. He went to Mr. Moody's meeting to see what it was that attracted so large a crowd and also to have some fun by ridiculing it to his associates afterward. Like many others met with during that time of blessed awakening, "he went to scoff, but remained to pray." As he listened to Mr. Moody's address, the wickedness of his life came before him, and under an overwhelming conviction of sin he was constrained to flee to the Cross, and there implore pardon. Leaving the building a saved man, he went forth determined for the remainder of his life to be a zealous soldier of Christ.

What joy there was in his father's house that the prodigal had returned! For the next three weeks, at every meeting to which he could get, the young doctor was present; but even when absent on his professional duties, he was utilizing his time for his Master's service. At the end of three weeks he went on a visit to his father. It was clear then that the sands of life were fast running out. But the father's grief over the loss of his son was not what it would have been a few weeks before; for now the lost was found for all eternity. He grew worse, and speedily realised that death was near, but was not alarmed. He tried to cheer those who stood around his bed, assuring them that though loth to leave his loved ones he was happy to go to Jesus, his only regret being that he has given him so little of his life; and his last words as his soul took its flight were, 'Oh, how happy I am, how glad I am that I took Jesus as my Saviour.'"

PROGRESS IN UGANDA.

THE African kingdom in which Alexander Mackay labored so long and which is hallowed by the blood of the martyred Hannington, is now the scene of an extensive outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The king M'Wanga is the same treacherous unprincipled man that he has always been, but his people are turning to God in large numbers. Bishop Tucker, who is Bishop Hannington's successor, writes: "How shall I find language to describe the wonderful work of God's grace which has been going on in this land? Truly the half was not told me. Exaggeration about the eagerness of the people here to be taught there has been none. No words can describe the emotion which filled my heart as, on a recent Sunday, I stood up to speak to fully 1,000 men and women who crowded the church of Uganda. It was a wonderful sight! There, close to me, was the Katikiro—the second man in the kingdom. There, on every hand, were chiefs of various degrees, all Christian men, and all in their demeanor devout and earnest to a degree. There was a second service in the afternoon, at which there must have been fully 800 present. The same earnest attention was apparent, and the same spirit of devotion."

GRANDMOTHER'S BIBLE

SO you've brought me this costly Bible,
With its covers so grand and gay;
You thought I must need a new one
On my eighty-first birthday, you say;
Yes, mine is a worn out volume;
Grown ragged and yellow with age,
With finger prints thick on the margin—
But there's never a missing page.

And the finger prints call back my wee ones,
Just learning a verse to repeat;
And again, in the twilight their faces
[illegible]
It has pencil marks pointing in silence
To words I have hid in my heart;
And the lessons so hard in the learning,
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] of gold.
[illegible]
I shall keep it till death; but the old—
[illegible]
And I'll read a sweet psalm from its pages

THE SOURCE OF STRENGTH.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 15, 1893. Haggai 2: 4; Colossians 1: 9-11.

WEAKNESS is so common in spiritual matters that no revelation could be more welcome than that of a source of supernatural strength available for men. In business and in worldly society, the Christian, especially the young Christian, is in a position very similar to that of the feeble band of Jews who were striving to rebuild their fallen temple. They were opposed and scoffed at by the people around them and their spirit was depressed by a long captivity. It seemed too great an undertaking for them, as the effort to lead a consistent Christian life among scoffers has often seemed to a young convert. To him, as to them, what an inspiring word is that which God utters, "Be strong, for I am with you!" It is also an inspiration to Christian effort. The vice and squalor and misery of the cities are so huge and the indifference of the professing church so depressing, that individual effort seems impotent. What can one, or a score, do against such odds? "Be strong, for I am with you!" The strength of omnipotence is pledged to the support of those who work for God. "Patience and long-suffering with joyfulness," are the results which the Apostle looks for from a knowledge of the fact. And, truly, they are a natural result.

He who is assured of ultimate triumph can afford to be patient as well as joyful. The assurance nerved Moses to confront Pharaoh, David to meet Goliath, the three captives in Babylon to brave the furnace seven times heated, the early Christians to speak before rulers and kings, the martyrs of the Reformation era to go to the stake, and all, though consciously weak, were strong in the strength that came from the sense of God's support. None knew better than Paul himself what that strength could do. It had borne him up in the Ephesian arena, had helped him to bear the lash, had kept him firm under stoning and supported him under aspersion, jealousy and opposition. "Patience, long-suffering with joyfulness," were words he had a right to use and he makes no secret of the source of his strength. And the promise is still in force. The most obscure and the weakest Christian, wherever he may be, can draw upon that inexhaustible store for the performance of his daily duty and according to his faith will be the measure granted to him.

THE GERMAN EPWORTH LEAGUE.

THE German speaking members of the Methodist Episcopal Church have taken as heartily to the Epworth League as their English speaking brethren. But they have made modification in its constitution to adapt it to their own needs. The Epworth Herald thus describes the League as it exists among them:

The first organization was effected at the Lakeside (Ohio) Assembly two and a half years ago, and a general rally has taken place at the same place each summer since. The officers are: Rev. Henry Liebhart, D.D., president; H. A. Schroetter, secretary; Louis Busch, treasurer. There are now nearly three hundred chapters. Most of the presiding-elders' districts are already organized. The local constitution differs somewhat from that in use among the English speaking Chapters. There are three departments, instead of six, viz.: 1. Spiritual life and missionary work. 2. Literary work. 3. Social life. The officers of the Chapter are a president, one vice-president, a secretary, and a treasurer. Haus und Herd, the German Methodist magazine, has a League department of several pages, and is the organ of the German branch. A series of booklets is being published which makes an excellent reading course. The little volumes are clearly printed, strongly bound in heavy paper covers, and are sold at ten cents per copy. Those so far issued are: "History of the United States," "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "My Bible," "The Life of Jesus," "Popular Astronomy," and "A Book of Declamations." They are attractive, both in matter and mechanical appearance, and are already proving very popular.

Dr. Liebhart, the President, was born in Germany 58 years ago. He came to the United States in 1854. His conversion was brought about by a little Sunday School girl who handed him an invitation to attend church. He went to church, and was awakened by the sermon of a local preacher. Some time was spent in preparation for the ministry, and subsequently he united with the New York conference. When Haus und Herd was established he became editor. That magazine has been conducted with marked ability. It has a circulation of nine thousand, or one to each seven members of the German Methodist Church. The doctor has a vigorous mind, is a fluent speaker, a popular writer, and a most genial companion. He has rendered valuable service as a member of the League Board of Control, and is now a member of the General Cabinet.

ONE OF THE C. E. PIONEERS.

AN honored name in Christian Endeavor circles is that of Mr. Eli Manchester, of New Haven, Conn., whose portrait by the courtesy of the Golden Rule appears on this page. It is a comparatively easy matter in these days when the value of young people's societies has come to general recognition to stand in the front of the movement, but it was different ten years ago when the movement was in its infancy. Mr. Manchester was at the front then. The Christian work that he was doing prepared him to perceive and appreciate the possibilities of usefulness contained in the Christian Endeavor idea. He was assistant superintendent of a large Sunday School and an active worker in the Young Men's Christian Association, and so was brought into constant touch with young people. He became one of a committee which organized the first Christian Endeavor Society in New Haven in 1883, and became its secretary and afterwards its president. At the Lowell Convention of 1884, Mr. Manchester was the sole delegate from Connecticut. As the number of the Societies grew, he suggested a State Union, and under his management the organization was effected. In this matter, Connecticut was the pioneer State, its Union of Socteties being the first on record. Mr. Manchester was its first Secretary, and he held office for four years. He has never wavered in his confidence in the value of the movement. In a recent letter he declares, "Whatever I may have been able to do in church, Sunday School, or Endeavor work, is due largely to the help and training received in the Christian Endeavor Society. I consider it the very best of training-schools for young Christians."

THE INDIANA B. Y. P. UNION.

AN enthusiastic convention of the Baptist Young People's Unions of Indiana has been holding its sessions at Huntington, Ind. The following report of its proceedings which was sent to the Young People's Union indicates that the Union in Indiana is in vigorous health and activity.

Rev. G. L. Conley, Huntington, welcomed the delegates and response was made by Rev. B. F. Cavins, D. D., Peru. The Sunrise Prayer Meeting Friday morning, was led by Hattie Severance, Huntington. The first session was opened with a paper on "The Necessity of the Spirit of Self Sacrifice in Our Young People," by Miss Tillie Potter, Fort Wayne. An animated address was given on "The Centennial Year," by Rev. H. H. Smith, Decatur. He said we live in a "grand and awful time." "Grand," because we have such great opportunities for doing good. "Awful," because of that which might happen if we did not embrace these opportunities. An address on "The Outlook of Missions," was given by Mr. Hicks. He noted the fact that it was a matter for thankfulness to God that although Congress passed laws against Chinese immigration China continued to let American missionaries enter its country. "An Appeal to our Young People for more Consecration," was the subject of an earnest paper read by Miss Hattie Severance, Huntington.

During the afternoon the Junior Question was discussed. "The Committees and Their Work," by Miss Anna Philley, Fort Wayne, was a very interesting and instructive paper. At four o'clock the Question Box was conducted by Mr. J. H. Scott of Chicago.

The organization of the District Union then followed. The officers who were elected were: President, Rev. G. L. Conley, Huntington; Vice-President, Miss Emma Moro, Warsaw; Secretary, Mr. Wm. W. Gunter, Oswego; Treasurer, Miss Norris, Eel River Church, Whitley.

In the evening after Scripture Reading and Prayer, a paper entitled "The Future of our Young People and the Church," was read by Miss Lydia J. Meredith, Rochester, after which followed an address on "The Local Society," by J. H. Scott, Chicago. The Consecration Meeting led by Miss Philley was very impressive and solemn and many renewed their vows to their Lord and Master.

THE membership of the Young Men's Christian Association at Cape Town, South Africa, is shown by the last annual report to be 580. The Association is in an excellent financial condition, and is, we learn, doing an extensive work.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Liverpool, England, holds a public meeting every Saturday afternoon, at which there is good music, entertaining speeches, recitations, readings from poets and novelists and other cheerful occupations. The object is to attract men from the saloons and vicious resorts to which they have been in the habit of going, having a half-holiday on Saturday with their week's wages in their pockets.

The report of the Dublin Young Women's Christian Association and its Institute and Home shows that during the year, 347 members and friends have been staying in the Home: the Bible classes have increased in numbers and power—over 300 attending. The educational classes go on well. The interest in missions has increased. The Bible class members support two Bible-women in Foochow, and altogether the work of the branch is in a flourishing condition.

SMYRNA, TURKEY, has an active Circle of King's Daughters busily engaged in practical charitable work. By sewing, embroidering, scrubbing floors, blackening shoes, or any work for which money would be paid, they have distributed rice and coal among the poor, visited the sick, educated children, provided medicines, paid rents, and done other similar acts of charity. On holidays they divide into committees for the purpose of decorating the rooms where poor families live and providing small remembrances for the children.

THE half-yearly meeting of the English National Council, of Young Men's Christian Associations, held at Exeter Hall on Dec. 2, celebrated the close of ten years' work. The first meeting of the Council was held at Birmingham, in December, 1882, when there were 188 associations in England, Ireland and Wales, and 316 including Scotland. Now in the English union, which comprises Ireland and Wales, there are over 400 associations, and the work is represented at over 500 centres. This is very largely the result of the direct operations of the Council, through their agents traveling over the entire country, developing the work in new centres, and bringing about generally a greatly improved organization.

The Family and Home Circle

ROYALTY AT HOME.

A Glimpse at the Family Circle of the Czar —The Czarina and Her Children.

SO MUCH has been said and written of late regarding the ruler of the Russian Empire, and so many diverse opinions are formed concerning his character and habits, that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be interested in knowing how the "Autocrat of all the Russias" looks and acts when at home with his own immediate family. Rev. Dr. Talmage has presented a very pleasing picture of the home life of the imperial family, and we are assured by others, who have had extensive opportunities for observation that the domestic surroundings of the Czar are very different from what many persons seem to imagine. Notably this view is corroborated by the experience of Mr. Lathrop while United States Minister to Russia, and by individuals who have been attached to the royal household in important capacities, whose duties brought them into constant contact with all the members of the home.

Alexander III. is in the best sense a man of domestic tastes. He loves his family and devotes to them all the time he can spare from the duties of government. None of his predecessors have been above reproach, morally, while he has led a life remarkably free from the faults that usually characterize men in his position. The Czarina, who was formely the Princess Dagmar of Denmark, is an amiable, sweet-natured woman, devoted to her children, Nicholas, the heir-apparent, George, Xenia and Michael, to whose education in its early stages, she gave personal supervision. The Princess Xenia, though not a beautiful girl, is bright and witty and a general favorite. She is something of an artist, and is her father's favorite, while Nicolas is his mother's. The younger folks have governesses and can write and converse in English, French and Russian with almost equal fluency, and know something of Danish, their mother's native tongue. Both parents share the sports of their children, riding, walking, shooting and playing tennis with them, just as any American parents might do. When they were quite young, the Czarina used to go to the nursery, evenings, and read Danish stories to them from the same books she used when a child. She even made their baby hats and dresses with her own hands, although she had a dozen or more dressmakers at command. At different times she has made vestments for the Metropolitan; the head of the Russian Church. Seldom is the father separated from his household, even for a day. In all the Czar's outings some of the children accompany him.

Their home in St. Petersburg, is not much larger than the White House, and is rather plain, architecturally, than otherwise. It contains a good library, drawing-rooms and the usual suites of apartments, including a specially cosy and home-like sitting-room for the Empress. The palace is, as a whole, much more home-like than most palaces in Russia or elsewhere.

Our illustration (which is engraved from a photograph brought from Russia by Rev. Dr. Talmage), shows the view to be seen from the windows of the imperial palace at Peterhof, looking toward the Gulf of Finland. It is a scene of marvelous beauty. The shining canal or basin that leads from the palace steps to the open waters of the gulf beyond; the famous Samson fountain in the immediate foreground, where from the lion's mouth a broad stream of water rises fifty feet in the air and falls in glistening pearls into the basin below; the marble embankment on each side of the canal, rich with costly sculpture and enlivened with fountains shooting up from bowls of spotless Sicilian marble, the whole bordered by pine trees, beneath whose branches wind inviting paths and drives. At the further end of the canal, in the Gulf, lies the royal steam yacht, in which the Editor and Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were conveyed from the Capital to Peterhof on the occasion of their visit last summer. There are few places in the world for which art has done more than it has accomplished here, transferring a bleak place into a veritable fairyland. Yet the location of Peterhof is superior to that of Tsarskoe-Selo, as it has at least the advantage of a fine marine prospect.

Since the death of his father, it is said, the present Czar has not entered the palace at Tsarskoe-Selo, so sad are the memories that surround it. He prefers Gatschina or Peterhof. The Czar has strong religious views and scrupulously attends church. He does more work than most of his ministers and is an early riser. Toward his enemies he is said to be more lenient than the police and has often shown his generosity in this respect. He does not know fear and is probably happier in his home relations and less apprehensive of trouble than many of the high officials around him.

A Home Secret.

THE ideal home is where a firm father, a loving mother, brave boys and gentle girls blend together in one harmonious whole. A home with cosy rooms, and dainty nooks and corners. Every object on which the eye rests, breathes of home. A workbasket with mother's knitting, a table with shaded lamp for father's books and papers; an open piano, with scattered sheets of music and a brother and sister uniting their voices in a simple ballad, while father and mother rest and enjoy it all. Love and discipline go hand in hand. Love breathes in every glance of the eye and in every tone of the voice. The father takes into his hands the Holy Bible; he reads, and then giving utterance to the feelings of the little group, with uplifted hands he prays that the home circle may be bound together in love to serve God by living their lives to his glory. That prayer, that hope, that love, constitute the secret of the ideal home.

Loyalty in the Family Circle.

LOYALTY in the home circle is not as often considered as it ought to be; it should be held as part of the family honor never to speak slightingly of any member of the household to outsiders. The old and somewhat vulgar proverb, "Wash all your soiled linen at home," contains the gist of an obvious truth. Parents should impress this family loyalty upon their children, and teach them that it means dignity and strength and happiness to be the guardians of their own hearth, as it were, the staunch defenders of the honor of each and every member of the family.

Brothers and sisters should never allow themselves to say anything derogatory of each other to their acquaintances, whatever may be their private differences. Husbands and wives would do well to remember that "nagging" at each other, or even what is called "running each other in public," is not only disloyal to the family dignity, but is in very bad taste, and is, moreover, exceedingly tiresome to any one who may be with them. Mothers—even good, loving mothers—have an unwise way sometimes of bringing every trivial fault to the surface before anyone who happens to be present.

HOW LITTLE IT COSTS.

HOW little it costs, if we give it a thought,
To make happy some heart each day!
Just one kind word, or a tender smile,
As we go on our daily way.
Perchance a look will suffice to clear
The cloud from a neighbor's face,
And the press of a hand in sympathy
A sorrowful tear efface.

One walks in sunlight, another goes
All wearily in the shade;
One treads a path that is fair and smooth,
Another must pray for aid.
It costs so little! I wonder why
We give it so little thought;
A smile—kind words—a glance—a touch!
What magic with them is wrought!

BABY FAITH'S FINGER.

BABY Faith came to me with a little sore on her finger, and wanted me to kiss it and "make it well," as I am in the habit of soothing her griefs in this way, writes Carrie Judd Montgomery. I kissed it, but it did not seem to have the desired effect, so she returned every few minutes to have the kiss repeated, each time making a pitiful little sound as though she were sympathizing with herself. Finally, I said, not half thinking that she would understand me,

"Baby, ask God to make the finger well."

Then I put my hand to my eyes, and she did the same, while I asked God in simplest words to make Baby well. But as soon as I had finished, she ran to a chair, laid her little head down upon it, and with all the earnestness of a grown person, she said, "God! God! God!"

She can scarcely speak the word plain, but the tone of pleading and the spirit of real prayerfulness with which she did this, made me realize that it was a real petition which ascended to the throne. A friend was in the room with me, and we looked at each other in great astonishment. Surely, God has hid these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them unto babes. She is not yet eighteen months old, and yet God has taught this tiny child to reveal a real need to him in prayer.

A Wee Girl Led Them.

REV. A. C. MCMAIN, of Mattoon, Wis., sends us the following beautiful incident:

"Recently in a meeting conducted by Rev. Myron M. Gable the following anecdote was related which did our soul good, and I trust that it may help the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Among the people gathered for worship one evening was a little girl of not more than seven summers. Yet she was destined to be the leader in that meeting. When it seemed as though no one wanted to speak, sing or pray, the little girl arose to to her feet, and with one little sentence she broke the spell that bound us by simply repeating these words, 'I love Jesus.' It was enough. We had testimony after testimony, song after song and prayer after prayer, until the very windows of heaven were opened and the Lord came down. It beautifully illustrates the fact that we are to become as little children, if we would enter into the kingdom."

No Need to be Gloomy.

IT is worth every man's while to study the important art of living happily. Even the poorest man may by this means extract an increased amount of joy and blessing from life. The world need not be a "vale of tears" unless we ourselves will it so. We have the command, to a great extent, over our own lot. At all events, our mind is our own possession; we can regulate and control our tempers and dispositions to a considerable extent. We can educate ourselves, and transmit the blessings of a faithful example to our successors.

Dora becomes acquainted with Pierce Denham, a man several years her senior and marries him in spite of her uncle's opposition. She discovers, within a few days of the marriage, that Denham is a professional burglar; and determines to take the first opportunity [illegible] his power. She [illegible] him at a hotel and takes refuge with an uncle named David Rupert living at Buffalo. He and his wife Lois, with their son Richard and his wife, Margaret, receive her kindly and she becomes a member of their household. She obtains employment as governess with the family of John Cardiff, a contractor, who has several children, the eldest of whom is Philippa, a girl of ten. Dora's elder sister, Eloise Maple, becomes infatuated with Cecil Grafton a teacher of elocution, and marries him. While in Buffalo, where she has gone after her marriage to see Dora, she discovers that her husband's real name is Russel and that he has a wife and two sons living. She and the wife confront the bigamist and he makes his escape to avoid arrest. Eloise becomes a friend to the wife and children of the man by whom she had been deceived. Other characters in the story are Edgar Sayce, a nephew of John Cardiff, who has married Nora, a light frivolous woman, whose neglect of domestic and maternal duties is a source of trouble to him. An accident renders Nora an invalid and Dora manages his house for a time, until he can secure a regular housekeeper. Another family is that of Jean Marot and his wife who keep the hotel at which Dora and her husband were staying when Dora escaped from him, and at which the Cardiffs were also boarding at the time.

CHAPTER X.

BACK TO THE MOUNTAIN.

ANOTHER summer had come, and the chief proposed to take his family up to Hotel Marot for the season.

"You will have no society there," said one of Mrs. Cardiff's friends.

"It is better for the children to be by themselves, and run wild," said John Cardiff. "We shall take the house for ourselves and the Ruperts. Miss Maple is going with us."

"But Philippa is past twelve. She is too old to run wild like a boy."

"It is healthy for her to be like a boy, if you mean by that running and climbing about. Why should she not have the full use of all her muscles? I don't mind her being like a boy."

"It is all right, if it don't last too long," said the friend.

"I don't see any too long about it. We shall have a delightful summer company. Uncle David and Aunt Lois Rupert, full of wisdom, genial as they are venerable, mines of rich information gained from experience. Margaret and Richard Rupert will set before my young people the model young couple, beautiful examples of the conjugal and parental relation. Dora will relieve Mrs. Cardiff of some of that higher care of the children which the nurse cannot take, and our new baby has a right to its share of country life. Hotel Marot will give me more chance to be with my family than most other places. But don't recommend it to other folks; we are a close corporation there."

"And your two private clerks are going with you?"

"Tim MacGregor and young Frick? Yes. I feel that I owe my young men domestic as well as scientific and business instruction. The case of our young men is becoming desperate in these evil days. I wonder where we shall find decent husbands and fathers for the next generation! MacGregor and Frick are [illegible] clean fellows, and I mean to keep them [illegible]."

"Papa," interposed Philippa, "in speaking of our model company at Hotel Marot, what will you do with Mr. Marot and Madame? What kind of teaching are they to give?"

"We'll use them for light-houses, warnings of the reefs and quicksands, where matrimonial [illegible]."

"Pshaw Mr. Cardiff. Very few indeed make such a match as those Marots. She just walked in and ordered him to marry her because she thought it looked better to be Mrs. than [illegible]."

"And he married her, because she ordered him to, and he had not grit to say no. Many women marry in that way; and many people marry for a home, or a support, or a nurse, or a housekeeper, or for money, or because someone else does. Until people cease to marry on false grounds, there will be unhappy marriages, divorces, separations. And the very worst and lowest of all motives is animal passion."

"Some people uphold that motive, out of Scripture," interrupted Dr. Grant who was sitting by."

"Oh, Book of God!" cried John Cardiff, smiting with his hand the Bible lying near him on the table, "how many enormities are advocated, in thy most holy name!"

"Mr. Cardiff," said his wife, "I am truly thankful that Philippa and Rodney have left the room."

"Do not let us be afraid of truth," said Dr. Grant. "What is the proper ground for marriage? God taught Adam that it was not good for him to be alone, by giving him a chance to get lonely. He found himself the only intellectual animal with an articulate speech. There were capacities in him for something far higher then could be reached by the brute creation about him; he looked not down but up. He needed a nature matched to his, alike yet different, to supplement his lack, and in the union of the two, present one nature rounded to its fulness, and highest possible. To make humanity its best and highest; to continue humanity nobly and not recklessly; to crown creation with God's human servant in his loftiest estate, is the true reason of marriage. The human being has a triple nature, body, brain, soul, and not one, but all of these are to be met in marriage, and when a man talks of what he sacrifices of ease and enjoyment, in taking upon himself the duties and responsibilities of the head of a family, he talks like an egotist, who has no true idea of his best estate in life."

"You are right, doctor," said John Cardiff, "and until this idea of companionship, of supplementing in both men and women what is lacked by each, is given its full weight; and woman is expected to have morally, physically, intellectually, in every direction, equal rights with men, and an equal development of her individuality, then the true ideal of marriage cannot be met. When we get a generation or two, trained rightly in that way, then we shall have an end of hearing of divorces demanded on grounds of incompatibility, neglect, desertion, and so on, and so on."

John Cardiff was always glad to meet some one of his way of thinking on this subject. But if he could not do so, he was quite capable of going his way alone.

Preceded by a load of sundries to supply the most crying needs in Hotel Marot, the Cardiff and Rupert families, on a glorious June day took possession of the hotel, which since their former occupancy had had scarcely any other inhabitants than Jean Marot and Madame and Peg and Bet. The two girls looked leaner and more discouraged, Jean was smaller and more cowed, and madame more shrewish than ever. Dora peeped with a shudder into the square room where she had left Peirce Denham asleep on the patch-work covered bed, when she fled away out of the window. What a horrible day that had been! She could scarcely realize that she was the girl who had been capable of committing the enormous folly of eloping with a stranger. And Margaret had told her, Uncle David and John Cardiff also, that that man was her husband, and she was as firmly bound to him as if he were the truest and most congenial man on earth! "That seemed hard—cruel," she told Margaret.

"But," said Margaret, "what would become of the home or the state, if the marriage bond were less rigid? The car that carries others safely, has run over you, my poor Dora, because you put yourself under, and not over the wheels."

"I'm sure," said Dora, "that no word in the language is so hateful to me as that word 'marriage.' I wish I could never hear it mentioned, nor see a man as long as I live! I'd like to live in a country, or a world, peopled entirely by women. I think we would have a much nicer time in it!"

"I think I should object to a world without Richard in it," smiled Margaret, "and my little David. And we could ill spare such men as David Rupert, and John Cardiff."

"Yes; we might like to have them in our world," said Dora, "but there are few like them. At least three women have had enough of marriage and want to be free of it forever, myself, Eloise and Anne Russel."

But the world about Hotel Marot was so beautiful that it banished care. The quaint garden luxuriant in its old-fashioned bloom; the riot of roses, honeysuckles and clematis, the orchard full of fruit, and of birds that feasted on the fruit, and left plenty for wingless bipeds, the dark grand woods that skirted the mountain, and went down, down, to the bank of the glorious river not then desecrated by a railroad running along its brink.

Over the woods sprang the tall light Marot Tower, foolishly built as an attraction for guests who were not attracted away from the gaieties and glories of the falls.

Upon the top of the tower was a square room, overlooking miles of country. In the window were fitted slides of glass of various colors, and great was the joy of the children, when having climbed the long ascent, they could at will produce a landscape buried in snow, or brilliant in vegetation, golden, crimson, blue or purple.

The young folks were up in the tower one evening when looking far along the road, they saw Jean Marot and his mare. Jean seemed in a great state of excitement, throwing his hat up in the air, and when he saw the group on the top of the tower at the open slides, he guessed whom it might be, and wildly waved his handkerchief. Jean had been gone for a fortnight, and it was understood that he was off at some races where he hoped to win money by the bay mare.

The year before he had won a very little, and had hidden it in some recondite fashion from Mrs. Marot, so that he might have the means to go to these other races this year. Mrs. Marot had been heard to say what she should do with the money, if Jean brought any home this year.

Seeing Jean returning jubilant the party at the top of the tower swarmed down the stairs, and met him at the gate. The next instant Rodney rushed in exultant—"Hurrah for us. Jean's mare won a thousand dollars! What luck."

"Bad luck," said the chief, "Jean will never be willing to do a day's honest work again, and he was lazy enough before."

At Rodney's proclamation, Mistress Marot came out of her room all eagerness, and Peggy and Betty left their cooking, a gleam of hope in their eyes.

"Did you win a thousand dollars, Jean?" cried Mrs. Marot.

"I did that."

"Where is the money?"

"Where you won't get it," said Jean doggedly.

"Then its where it will be wasted, for I'm the only one who knows how to take care of money, in this house."

"Well, you won't take care of this," said Jean, aggressively.

"We'll see," said madame, resistless and remorseless as fate.

That evening the voices of Jean and his wife were heard late. Then Jean retired to the barn and courted sleep alongside the stall of the mare.

The next day there were some furtive interviews between Jean and his nieces. Finally, at four o'clock the mare was harnessed to a small spring wagon. Jean put therein a portmantau containing all his earthly possessions, and Betty and Peggy appeared in their poor, shabby "good clothes"—Betty carrying a geranium growing in a pot, and Peggy a brindle cat and a white hen. They said, "Uncle Jean, we couldn't get our trunk downstairs. Come and help us," and put geranium, cat and hen in the wagon.

Jean went back to the house with them, and when they were gone, Mrs. Marot, also in her best, came out, mounted to the front seat and took whip and reins.

"Jean," said Mrs. Marot, when her husband, the girls and the trunk appeared, "where shall I drive?"

"What are you in here for? Where are you going?" cried Jean.

"To share your fortunes, Jean, as I have a right to do, and as I said I would."

"But you can't leave the boarders!"

"Do you think I'll let you and the girls flourish off on that thousand dollars?" said madame firmly. "Not for any boarders!"

"It's a case of we're a flittin'," whispered Phillippa to Tom.

"Yes: he might as well stay. He can't get rid of his Brownie." But now John Cardiff appeared [illegible] Jean's prize. "Naboth

"Mrs. Marot, you surely cannot abandon this house with eighteen boarders in it. Why, who will cook for us?" "I don't know; but I can't do it alone."

"That is true; but with Jean, Peggy and Betty to do their share, you can get on nicely. Now, see here, girls: your aunt has kept a home over your heads this three years, and you have neither frozen nor starved. She has not given you much, but she has not much to give. It is better than the poor-house, and not worse than going out to service. Jean, your wife has kept your house neat, your clothes mended, and something to fill your mouth, since you were married. You could not have got on without her."

"I can get on now; I have a thousand dollars," said Jean.

"You think that will last forever. By the time you have clothed and boarded yourself and the girls, and boarded the mare, and bought ice cream and candy every night, and gone to every circus and minstrel show that comes along for three months, you will find yourself without a cent. Then what will you do?"

"Three months!" cried Jean scornfully, "gone in three months!"

"It won't last him two. I know him," said Madam.

"I'll tell you what will happen," continued the Chief. "In three months Jean, you'll have used up your money, the mare will be held for your debts, the girls will be taking places as slaveys in some hotel kitchen, to do the drudgery they complain of here, and ten times as much of it. You'll be on the streets without a coat to your back or a crust to eat. Mistress Marot is rather sharp on you all, but she keeps you together in a decent home. She is your wife, and she has a right to share in your good fortune, whatever it is."

"The long and short of it is, that if he don't stay, why I am going with him. He shan't go gallivanting off with them silly girls, to devastate that money like a lot of children," said Madam.

"You'd better give in, Jean," said Tom. "Madam has the right of it, and she is the stronger party and will get the best of you."

"And let her have all the money?" cried Jean.

"Better that, than to throw it away, as you will," said Tom.

"See here," said John Cardiff, "let me invest that money for you, then you will always have something sure."

"And she'll get all the interest, and me and the girls never see a dime of it."

"Well, see here," said the Chief, "you and the girls do look pretty shabby. Suppose you take a hundred to fit yourselves out with, and let me invest the rest, so you can't spend it."

"I'll agree to that," said Madam; "but as to letting you go off alone and all that money, mark my words, I won't do it!"

"If the case of a man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry," said Frick aside to Tom MacGregor.

"Come now," said the Chief, "all of you go in and get supper, and to-morrow morning I will take you all in my carriage to the Falls, and you can do your shopping, and have the rest of the cash invested. You'd better take Mrs. Marot along to do the shopping, Jean. She'll get five times as much out of the money for you, as you will. Madame is a good hand at a bargain."

The idea of new clothes consoled the girls, they wiped their eyes, returned geranium, cat and hen to the house, took their trunk, and set about getting supper.

"Confound that trunk," growled Jean, "if it hadn't been for that we'd have got off without you."

"No, Jean," said Madam tranquilly, "you would not. I'd have seen to it."

The next day with the Chief for driver, the entire Marot family went off in the highest spirits. The boarders agreed to take their dinner en pic-nic, in the orchard. The Marots came home at evening loaded with parcels. The Chief had treated them all to ice cream and soda water, and Jean had given them dinner in a restaurant. They all had new clothes including a grand dress and gown for Mistress Marot, and each of the girls had a silver dollar, and Jean had a new five dollar bill. The rest of the money was invested, and Mrs. Marot was in possession of the securities.

The prediction of the Chief was fulfilled, Jean Marot never did another day of fair work—he perferred to race horses, but—the bay mare died that winter, and Jean Marot never won another thousand dollars.

"I don't see how Jean Marot can get along with the Madam," said Tom MacGregor to Dora, "and I don't see how the helpless creature could get along without her."

A Subscriber, Buffalo Gap, Texas, writes: "My dear father, the oldest minister in the Buffalo Gap Presbytery, died December 3d. He was a great admirer of your paper, and rejoiced at the good work it was doing for the unsaved. I told him two days before he died, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had come. He said: 'Daughter, write to Dr. Talmage and tell him I read his paper with much pleasure, but that ere another number comes, I'll be reading the news of heaven, and shall expect to meet him there.'"

Mrs. Annie Reeve, Louisville, Ky. Who was the first Gentile?

The word Gentile (a people) was employed by the Hebrews to designate any other nation or people than themselves. The original term used was goyim or barbarian, implying that all others were more or less barbarous. It is impossible to tell to whom the term was first applied.

A Catholic pastor writes us from Dodgeville, Wis.:

Your beautiful Bible received and I must thank you very much for it. As a Catholic, of course, I shall have to go by our own Bible, although the difference between the two don't seem to me so very great. But the additional part of your Teachers' Bible I like very much and no doubt it will prove quite valuable and useful to me. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have got several times already. It is in my judgment a very good Christian paper, which to read would not hurt any priest or even Bishop, and which I have already repeatedly praised before both Catholics and Protestants.

Maud McKenney, La Salle, Col. How did the custom of using Christmas trees originate?

Their origin dates before the Christian era, to a time when trees, gayly lighted and decorated, were used in religious festivals in Germany and elsewhere. Many of these ancient usages passed over from heathenism to Christianity. The first Christmas-trees in the Christian era were called Christ-trees.

G. W. E. Why does the church continue to administer baptism and the Lord's Supper when Christ gave no authority to the disciples to endow their converts with the right to administer those sacraments?

Are your sure of the fact? Christ's injunction to his disciples just prior to his ascension appears to cover the case. They were to teach all nations "to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." The Apostle Paul states explicitly (1. Cor. 11: 23-26), that he had received a revelation from the Lord, a part of which was that the celebration of the Lord's Supper was to be a commemoration of his death, "till he come." Beside this, when Christ said, "This do in remembrance of me," all who love him gladly do it in compliance with what was practically a dying request.

Sid J. Hare. What passages in the Bible give authority for changing the Sabbath of the Fourth commandment from Saturday to Sunday?

There are no passages explicitly authorizing the change. The practice of holding religious assemblies on the first day of the week commenced in the early Church and you will find several references to it in the New Testament. If we were Jews, living under the law, we should still observe the seventh day, making it a Sabbath—a day of rest, as commanded. Being Christians, we observe the first day, making it a day of spiritual activity and calling it "The Lord's Day." We thereby celebrate not the rest of creation, nor the Exodus from Egypt, but an event which lies at the basis of the Christian religion—the resurrection of the Lord, which occurred on that day.

A LETTER

From the most eloquent Preacher, the Late

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon

That will be Read with Great Interest by all who are at Death's Door.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE:—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

HOW AN ISLAND WAS NAMED.*

Philip men came aboard, and they drifted down the stream. At the north of the Rappahannock there were many shoals, and the tide being out, their barge grounded on one of them.

"Here we must abide until the next tide comes to float us," said Smith to his companions. As Smith gazed into the shallow water, he spied fishes swimming among the reeds, and he and Philip began spearing them with their swords. All the crew followed their example.

"Look, captain!" cried Philip. "What a curiously shaped fish!" He pointed to a long fish resembling a thorn-back, with a tail like a riding-whip.

"Pierce it with your sword, Philip," said Captain Smith.

Philip made a thrust, but missed. Dr. Russel next made an effort to capture the fish, but it escaped him, and ran directly under Smith, who sent the keen point of his sword into its side, and pulled it wriggling and writhing into the boat. As he went to pull the fish from the point of his sword, it suddenly wrapped its tail about his left wrist, and stuck its poisonous sting an inch and a half into his flesh. Though no blood issued, the pain was intense, and, dropping the fish into the bottom of the boat, he gave utterance to a groan. Dr. Russel examined the wound, but only a blue spot could be seen; but in three or four hours his arm and shoulder were so swollen that his life was despaired of, though Dr. Russel continued to apply his remedies.

"It is useless, doctor," said Smith calmly. "You have done what you could to save my life, but I must die. Take me to the island and dig my grave." Smith was carried by his sorrowing companions and laid upon some robes under a tree, while his companions proceeded to dig his grave. Dr. Russel and Philip Stevens remained at his side. The moon rose slowly and looked sadly upon the scene. The doctor, not wholly despairing, still applied remedies to his patient, and when the grave was finished, he was still alive. The captain fell into a fitful slumber, which after a while became more quiet, and all supposed it would result in death. At midnight the doctor reported the welcome news that the swelling had begun to subside.

"Are you quite sure, doctor?" Philip asked.

"I am.

"And is the danger over?"

"No; but it grows less."

Smith slept until morning, when he was able to rise and walk about. He expressed his regret that he had given his friends the trouble to dig his grave. Next day they were able to leave the island, which they named Sting-ray Island, after the fish which had nearly caused the death of Captain Smith. That name it bears to this day.

EASTERN AMULETS.†

THE charms which were worn in ancient times by all peoples and also by the Jews are called in the Talmud, Qameoth. We shall see further on how the word originated and how it was used by the authors of the Talmud. Since the amulet had to be worn exposed to view, in order that the spirits should see their inscriptions and keep away from the wearer, they in the course of time developed into ornaments. The rich made them of gold, silver, bronze, and precious stones, while the poor contented themselves with parchment, pieces of linen or woolen cloth, lace or embroidered fillets made by the women to embellish their qumeah (amulet), for women also wore charms for protection as well as for ornament. Not only did the materials vary, but there was also exhibited a multiplicity of shapes. Some were in the form of plates worn on the fore[illegible] were round like a ball; while others had the form of small square cases with their outside faces covered with inscriptions. That the fillets also had a variety of designs may easily be [illegible] for the frontlets were fastened by [illegible] the forehead to the occiput, and the [illegible] were fastened by means of a fillet encircling the head, making a knot at the occiput and falling down over both shoulders upon the breast. The Hindoos and the Persians call these charms, talismans; the latter also hamalete. The Romans called them amulets (amuleta), the Mesopotamians teraphim, the Basilians abraxas, and the Greeks phylacteria or "stoicheja." The Egyptians and the ancient Hebrews also totaphoth, and the Chaldees (seruche) tephulim. The shapes and inscriptions varied with the different nations and religions, also with the taste of the wearer; but the belief in their efficacy for warding off evil spirits and for breaking their spell was common to all nations.

Besides the above qualities their wearers ascribed to them the power of bringing them success in their undertakings and of preserving them from various diseases. Special amulets existed for use in time of epidemics, and such are found even to-day among the lower classes. The Hebrews also, like many other nations, believed them to be conducive to the prolongation of human life.

A STRANGE PLEDGE.*

I was in my church at a joyous festal occasion. Flowers, beauty and bright faces made the hour one of surpassing delight. I was summoned to a side room by the bustling sexton. "A couple to be married, dominie," he whispered with a smile. As he introduced me he said: "The dominie is enjoying a welcome reception from his church. He is in a capital state of mind to marry people. You've hit him at the right time." When we were alone the man said: "We are not here to get married; we are married. I have brought you my wife to have her sign the pledge." I looked at her in surprise. She was a comely young woman, neatly, although very poorly dressed. She returned my glance with defiance as she turned upon her husband, saying, "If I sign the pledge you've got to promise you'll not beat me. You taught me to drink and now beat me because I won't stop." Sullenly the man told his story. He had been intemperate. He had abused his wife, until in desperation she had taken to drink. When he learned that his wife, too, was a drunkard he had reformed, but had tried in vain to induce her to give up the drink. She had been arrested a score of times. She had been to Blackwell's Island twice.

"We were at your church last night and determined to try and begin a new life. Will you not write a pledge for both of us?"

I drew up a pledge; they signed it. We prayed together, and they passed out. I looked at the signatures. I read, "Harry and Maud ———." The next day I called at the address given me. They had moved, no one knew where.

Changing Diseases.

In that delightful book, "Rudder Grange," the husband of Pomona gives as his reason for not removing from a malarial neighborhood, that it don't do for a man at his time of life to go about changing his diseases, and adding, that there are diseases incident to almost every locality, and he likes a disease he is used to.

Now, in case of malarial diseases, aside from the unwillingness of patients to "change diseases," it is generally not convenient to change their residences. If this were done in every case, some of our most thriving communities would be depopulated.

Nothing is left to do therefore but to fortify oneself against malarial influences. For this purpose Drs. The Best for Jesus.

BY REV. ISAAC HYATT.

DO we think of it as often as we ought, and act upon it as we should, that the best we have should be given to Jesus, our Lord? The best of our time, our faculties, our possessions—in short, the best of everything we have—should be laid at his feet, to be used as he directs.

This should be done, not to secure his favor, but to show our love for the favors he has shown us. Christianity is a living, active principle; it arouses man to action, and sets on fire the noblest faculties of the mind and the purest emotions of the heart. It manifests itself in kind and benevolent acts and falling tears, which ever carry with them a power that awakens and strengthens the best within us. Therefore, to carry out its design, whatever we do for its Author, should be our best endeavor, and whatever we give in his name ought to be our choicest treasures.

There is not half the pleasure in giving what we do not want, as in giving what we prize most highly. Jesus gave the best he had for us. We ought to esteem it a favor to give the best we have for him. When we place our offering in the contribution box let it be the best we have.

If it be a cent, select the newest and brightest we have.

If it be a nickel, let it be our cleanest.

A clerk in a grocery store, who is also treasurer in a good-sized city Sabbath School, says, that in the six days he is at work in the store he does not begin to receive the amount of mutilated money he does during the forenoon in Sunday School. All this currency that is considered by tradesmen as doubtful is contributed to pass for its face value for Christ!

Let us think before we do any such thing again. For if we bestow our alms as we ought, we worship God. And to lie in acts of worship, is the worst kind of lying.

Jesus will make his abode with the poorest, and cheerfully shares the best he has with them; but he will never enter the kitchen of the rich, unless he can have a hearty welcome in their parlor also. A sincere desire to please God in our thoughts, words and acts will bring to the front the best we have as an offering to Jesus, our Best Friend.

Take my love; my God I pour
At thy feet its treasured store:
Take myself, and I will be Ever, only, all for thee

LOOKING BACKWARD

THE journal of a missionary society whose work has been chiefly in the South Seas presents a brief summary of results of the labors of fifty years. It says: When James Calvert went to the Fiji Islands, his first duty was to bury the skulls, hands, and feet of eighty different persons who had been sacrificed at a cannibal feast. He lived to see the very people who had taken part in that atrocity gather about the Lord's table, celebrating his death. In 1885 there were 1,300 churches in the Fiji group alone, and out of a population of 110,000, 104,000 were habitual attendants at places of worship. When Dr. Geddie landed in Aneityum in 1848, there were no Christians; when he left in 1872, there were no heathens. Take the twenty-two years of John Williams, from 1817 to 1839, when he fell as a martyr at Erromanga. Hear him, when he wrote in 1834, five years before his death, that the Gospel had been carried over a radius of two thousand miles in every direction from the island of Tahiti, and not only had every considerable group of islands been evangelized, but every considerable island in the groups, and the people had turned from idols and brought them to the missionaries, while the balustrades of pulpits were composed of the spears that had been used in their former warfare, and Ore, the great war-god, was used as a wooden prop to sustain the roofs of the out-houses.

THE RESULTS OF TRANSLATION

A GERMAN missionary in St. Petersburg was engaged in translating the New Testament into the language of the Tartar tribes on the Chinese border. His acquaintance with the language being small, the work made slow progress. At last he heard that some Tartar chiefs were in St. Petersburg studying the Russian language and the civilization of the capital. He succeeded in persuading them to help him in translating. As they went on with their work, they often asked the missionary questions about Jesus the Saviour, and the truths which he taught. When the translation was finished the two chiefs seemed unwilling to leave the missionary. "Have you any questions to ask, my friends?" said the missionary. "None," was the answer; "but we wish to tell you that we are converted to the religion of that book," pointing to the New Testament. "We have lived in ignorance, and been led by blind guides. We have read those books which tell us about the religion of our country, but the more we read them the less we understand them, and the more empty our hearts remained. But in reading what that book tells us about Jesus, it is very different. The more we read the words of Jesus the better we understand them. It seems as if he himself were talking to us. Now we know how to get our sins pardoned."

ENGLAND SPEAKS.

THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT FACT cannot be too frequently impressed upon the minds of suffering humanity, that Mr. Gould, E. B. P., of England is giving the Hop Prescription for Bitters to all applicants who send a two cent stamp for postage. Anyone in possession of this valuable prescription can for 25 cents make a quart of this marvelous medicine. It may be interesting to learn that with this prescription all kinds of hopeless cases have been treated with success, when all other remedies have absolutely failed; for the simple reason that under its influence the food begins to digest, the Appetite increase, Langour and Drowsiness depart, Swelling after meals is no more felt, Constipation is remedied, and by a gentle stimulation of the Liver and Kidneys removes Nervousness and General Debility which frequently accompany the same; and by correcting the principal organs of the system arouses into action the main Springs of Life. Thousands of letters of thanks have been received, and thousands are blessing the day the Hop Compound for Bitters fell across their path; and the prescription is given absolutely free of charge to all people, rich or poor, who send a two cent stamp for postage of the same. Or I will mail a packet of the ingredients and the prescription for 25 cents in stamps or postal note. A mode of Self Treatment at home has been a long-felt want by all well regulated minds, and will be found exceedingly advantageous to sensible people who desire to see and know what they are swallowing. "THE TRAVELERS' CLUB."

A Unique Feature of the Christian Work of the Eighth Avenue Mission, New York—Idle and Homeless Men Fed, Sheltered and Helped to Better Lives.

ONE of the most novel features of Christian work that has ever been undertaken in this country is that in connection with "The Travelers' Club," which was organized only a few months ago by the veteran preacher and philanthropist, Rev. Stephen Merritt, founder of the Eighth Avenue Mission, New York. Mr. Merritt, who has already devoted the greater part of a lifetime to works of charity and helpfulness, and who is widely known and loved throughout the Union, was deeply impressed by the wretchedness of the great army of the homeless unemployed in the metropolis, and cast about to find new ways of aiding them. The result was the Travelers' Club, whose members he unfailingly greets every morning before 6 o'clock, and to whom he talks with a view to their spiritual and material encouragement, while they eat the welcome breakfast of steaming coffee and bread. In these talks, Mr. Merritt is in his brightest vein; indeed, he strives to help the members of the Club to begin the day cheerfully and to carry with them, in their wanderings around the city, a pleasant recollection of the shelter and hospitality there afforded. It is needless to explain that the membership of the Travelers' Club is composed of the very poorest, lowest and most wretched of unfortunates—men who have drank misery's cup to the dregs and who have almost lost all hope in life. To this class the helping hand extended by the Club, the warm nutritious food, the comfortable rooms, and above all, the kind words of welcome and God-speed, come like a benison from heaven itself. In its founder they recognize their good angel, sent to point them back to paths of purity and happiness and to relieve their immediate distresses. In the article below, Rev. Mr. Merritt himself tells the story of this remarkable Club, with a simple directness and freedom from ostentation that will arouse a responsive feeling in every true Christian heart.

HOW THE TRAVELERS' CLUB WAS FORMED.

BY STEPHEN MERRITT.

THERE was no other time that I could possibly give to the work of the Eighth Avenue Mission connectedly except, between the hours of 5 and 7 A. M., all my other time being fully occupied. So, at the beginning of the cool weather this year, without any notice being given, I commenced to preach at 6 o'clock mornings and at the same time to give coffee and bread to the homeless wanderers who gathered in the Mission Hall to listen. Before the week was out, the place was crowded and we formed ourselves into a Travelers' Club. No name could be more appropriate in view of the fact that almost all who came there were unemployed and without food or shelter.

This Club is comprised of men of all nationalities, creeds, colors; homeless, friendless, penniless; who meet together every morning to breakfast with each other, to pray, to read God's Word, and to talk over matters pertaining to the life that now is and that which is to come. We have perfect order, unselfish decorum; everyone esteeming the other better than himself, and all pleasant and harmonious. We have plenty of good, fragrant coffee and wholesome bread, and two days in the week, meat, all of the very best.

Where there is so much good feeling and pleasant brotherliness, it might naturally be expected that the members of the Traveler's Club would feel like raising their voices in a joyful hymn; but we are not permitted to sing. That would be breaking the law, and we live in constant fear that the police will make a raid on us and scatter our beloved Club: for where thousands of tramps gather in one neighborhood in the early hours of the morning, most people would regard it as a menace and a nuisance. The members of our Club are continually being scattered, by securing employment and returning to their friends. The work of salvation is going on unceasingly, among us, not obtrusively, but silently and sweetly. We are not on exhibition, and as our hours are rather unseemly, we are left very much to ourselves.

REV. STEPHEN MERRITT.
FOUNDER OF THE EIGHTH AVENUE MISSION AND "THE TRAVELERS' CLUB."

Our club-room has every convenience—closets, bath, kitchen, meeting-room and dining-room; well lighted, well warmed, well ventilated. There is no club-room in New York more homelike than ours. Everything is cheerful; there is no cant, no sanctimoniousness, no hypocrisy. Every man is esteemed as a man, and no one is coarsely spoken to, or allowed to have his feelings hurt. This tender respect for others is characteristic of every member of our Club.

There is no written law for the government of the Travelers' Club, but we have usages that amount to law, one being that no member is expected to wash before breakfast, and another that all treating should cease, and still another that a helping hand should be given to any one in distress. The great unwritten law of the Club, however, is that we should pray for and love one another.

There is no president of the Club; Stephen Merritt is the caterer, and all the waiters and cooks and, even the chef himself, are members of the Travelers' Club. We do not stand on the formalities that are usually found in other clubs, and everyone is invited to sleep at any time he pleases during club hours, and to retire whenever he wishes to do so.

Many of the members of the Club are well-read men; not a few are college graduates, and quite a number are able to read the Word of God in the original tongue. The intellectuality of the Travelers' Club will measure up with that of any club in New York. There has never been any unpleasantness through inebriety, and not a member of the Club has ever been brought up on charges, or expelled from membership. A mellowness of feeling runs through all the Club's sessions, and real, pure, sweet and undefiled religion has the right of way. The men see things in a new light. They are rising out of bondage to light and liberty and joy. It is, indeed, a unique gathering. None say: "I am holier than thou;" but fifty, of a morning, will rise and say: "God be merciful to me, a sinner!" The presence of Him who had not where to lay his head, and who had to perform a miracle to pay his taxes, is continually among us, to cheer and comfort and strengthen. Much good of marked permanency has been the result of the first forty day's experience of the Club.

It takes from $15 to $20 a day to supply the commissariat of the Travelers' Club. It is a plain but substantial and satisfactory commissariat, and the members learn to like it and to rejoice and be content, even without the use of wine and tobacco. On this line we compare favorably with our sister clubs on the other avenues. If our members come here with a headache or a heartache, they go away without either; while the members of the other clubs carry with them hearts that throb with anxiety, and shame, and pain. The tendency of the Travelers' Club is uplifting, whatever may be the tendency of other clubs.

Our Club is not without its patronage, and among the godly men who frequently give it the light of their presence and countenance are Anderson Fowler, Richard Grant and Dr. Lowry. They preach and teach and give liberally and continuously. As compared with the churches, the work of the Club in the salvation of its members is in the ratio of ten to one in its favor, and the permanency of the spiritual change in those it brings into the fold, compared with those who unite with the church, is at least equal.

This is not Travelers' Club Number One: it is The Travelers' Club, the "Tramps' Paradise." But there is room for a hundred like it in New York, and for dozens in every other city in the Union. There are 75,000 homeless men who walk the streets every night, subject to the club of the policeman, and all they want—for they are our brothers and fellow-citizens—is a kind word of cheer, a gentle look of affection, a bite of something to eat and a mouthful to drink.

Oh, the good we all can do,
As the days are going by!

The day is passing when men will gather and leave their millions without accomplishing any good for the bodies or souls of their fellowmen, and the great question among the successful men to-day is: "How can I best employ my money for the glory of God and the good of mankind?" There is an increasing interest and

GOD AMONG THE BIRDS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon on "The Ornithology of the Bible, or God among the Birds." Text: Matthew 6:26: "Behold the fowls of the air."

THERE is silence now in all our January forests, except as the winds whistle through the bare branches. Our Northern woods are deserted concert-halls. The organ-lofts in the temple of nature are hymnless. Trees which were full of carol and chirp and chant are now waiting for the coming back of rich plumes and warbling voices, solos, duets, quartets, cantatas, and Te Deums. But the Bible is full of birds at all seasons, and prophets and patriarchs and apostles and evangelists and Christ himself employ them for moral and religious purposes. My text is an extract from the Sermon on the Mount, and perhaps it was at a moment when a flock of birds flew past that Christ waved his hand toward them, and said: "Behold the fowls of the air." And so, in this course of sermons on God Everywhere, I preach to you this third sermon concerning the Ornithology of the Bible, or God among the Birds.

Most of the other sciences you may study or not study as you please. Use your own judgment, exercise your own taste. But about this science of ornithology we have no option. The divine command is positive when it says in my text, "Behold the fowls of the air!" That is, study their habits. Examine their colors. Notice their speed. See the hand of God in their construction. It is easy for me to obey the command of the text for I was brought up among this race of wings and from boyhood heard their matins at sunrise, and their vespers at sunset. Their nests have been to me a fascination, and my satisfaction is that I never robbed one of them, any more than I would steal a child from a cradle, for a bird is a child of the sky, and its nest is the cradle. They are almost human for they have their loves and hates, affinities, and antipathies, understand joy and grief, have conjugal and maternal instinct, wage wars, and entertain jealousies, have a language of their own, and powers of association. Thank God for birds and skies full of them. It is useless to expect to understand the Bible unless we study natural history. Five hundred and ninety-three times does the Bible allude to the facts of natural history, and I do not wonder that it makes so many allusions ornithological. The skies and the caverns of Palestine are friendly to the winged creatures, and so many fly, and roost, and nest and hatch in that region that inspired writers do not have far to go to get ornithological illustration of divine truth. There are over forty species of birds recognized in the Scriptures. Oh, what a variety of wings in Palestine! The dove, the robin, the eagle, the cormorant, or plunging bird, hurling itself from sky to wave and with long beak clutching its prey, the thrush which especially dislikes a crowd, the partridge, the hawk, bold and ruthless, hovering head to windward, while watching for prey, the swan, at home among the marshes and with feet so constructed it can walk on the leaves of water plants, the raven, the lapwing, malodorous and in the Bible denounced as inedible, though it has extraordinary headdress, the stork, the ossifrage, that always had a habit of dropping on a stone the turtle it had lifted and so killing it for food, and on one occasion mistook the bald head of Æschylus, the Greek poet, for a white stone and dropped a turtle upon it, killing the famous Greek, the cuckoo, with crested head and crimson throat and wings snow-tipped, but too lazy to build its own nest and so having the habit of depositing its eggs in nests belonging to other birds, the blue jay, the grouse, the plover, the magpie, the kingfisher, the pelican, which is the caricature of all the feathered creation, the owl, the goldfinch, the bittern, the harrier, the bulbul, the osprey, the vulture, that king of scavengers, with neck covered with repulsive down instead of attractive feathers, the quarrelsome starling, the swallow flying a mile a minute, and sometimes ten hours in succession, the heron, the quail, the peacock, the ostrich, the lark, the crow, the kite, the bat, the blackbird and many others with all colors, all sounds, all styles of flight, all habits, all architecture of nests, leaving nothing wanting in suggestiveness. They were at the creation placed all around on the rocks and in the trees and on the ground to serenade Adam's arrival. They took their places on Friday as the first man was made on Saturday. Whatever else he had or did not have, he should have music. The first sound that struck the human ear was a bird's voice.

Yea, Christian geology (for you know there is a Christian geology as well as an infidel geology), Christian geology comes in and helps the Bible show what we owe to the bird creation. Before the human race came into this world, the world was occupied by reptiles, and by all styles of destructive monsters, millions of creatures loathesome and hideous. God sent huge birds to clear the earth of these creatures before Adam and Eve were created. The remains of these birds have been found imbedded in the rocks. The skeleton of one eagle has been found twenty feet in height, and fifty feet from tip of wing to tip of wing. Many armies of beaks and claws were necessary to clear the earth of creatures that would have destroyed the human race with one clip. I like to find this harmony of revelation and science, and to have demonstrated that the God who made the world made the Bible.

Moses, the greatest lawyer of all time and a great man for facts, had enough sentiment and poetry and musical taste to welcome the illumined wings and the voices divinely drilled into the first chapter of Genesis. How should Noah, the old ship carpenter, six hundred years of age, find out when the world was fit again for human residence after the universal freshet? A bird will tell and nothing else can. No man can come down from the mountain to invite Noah and his family out to terra firma, for the mountains were submerged. As a bird first heralded the human race into the world, now a bird will help the human race back to the world that had shipped a sea that whelmed everything. Noah stands on Sunday morning at the window of the Ark, in his hand a cooing dove, so gentle, so innocent, so affectionate, and he said: "Now, my little dove, fly away over these waters, explore, and come back and tell us whether it is safe to land." After a long flight it returned hungry and weary and wet, and by its looks and manners said to Noah and his family: "The world is not fit for you to disembark." Noah waited a week, and next Sunday morning he let the dove fly again for a second exploration, and Sunday evening it came back with a leaf that had the sign of just having been plucked from a living fruit tree, and the bird reported the world would do tolerably well for a bird to live in, but not yet sufficiently recovered for human residence. Noah waited another week, and next Sunday morning he sent out the dove on the third exploration, but it returned not, for it found the world so attractive now it did not want to be caged again, and then the emigrants from the ante-diluvian world landed. It was a bird that told them when to take possession of the resuscitated planet. So the human race were saved by a bird's wing: for attempting to land too soon, they would have perished.

Aye, here come a whole flock of doves—rock-doves, ring-doves, stock-doves—and they make Isaiah think of great revivals and great awakenings when souls fly for shelter like a flock of pigeons swooping to the openings of a pigeon coop, and he cries out: "Who are these that fly as doves to their windows?" David, with Saul after him, and flying from cavern to cavern, compares himself to a desert partridge, a bird which especially haunts rocky places, and boys and hunters to this day take after it with sticks, for the partridge runs rather than flies. David, chased and clubbed and harried of pursuers, says: "I am hunted as a partridge on the mountains." Speaking of his forlorn condition, he says: "I am like a pelican of the wilderness." Describing his loneliness, he says: "I am a swallow alone on a housetop." Hezekiah, in the emaciation of his sickness, compares himself to a crane, thin and wasted. Job had so much trouble he could not sleep nights, and he describes his insomnia by saying: "I am a companion to owls." Isaiah compares the desolations of banished Israel to an owl and bittern and cormorant among a city's ruins. Jeremiah describing the cruelty of parents toward children, compares them to the ostrich, who leaves its eggs in the sand uncared for, crying: "The daughter of my people is become like the ostriches of the wilderness." Among the provisions piled on Solomon's bountiful table, the Bible speaks of "fatted fowl." The Israelites in the desert got tired of manna and they had quails—quails for breakfast, quails for dinner, quails for supper, and they died of quails. The Bible refers to the migratory habits of the birds, and says: "The stork knoweth her appointed time and the turtle and the crane and the swallow the time of their going, but my people know not the judgments of the Lord." Would the prophet illustrate the fate of fraud, he points to a failure at incubation, and says: "As a partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches and not by right shall leave them in the midst of his days and at his end shall be a fool." The partridge, the most careless of all birds in choice of its place of nest, building it on the ground and often near a frequented road, or in a slight depression of ground, without reference to safety, and soon a hoof or a scythe or a cartwheel ends all. So says the prophet, a man who gathers under him dishonest dollars will hatch out of them no peace, no satisfaction, no happiness, no security. What vivid similitude! The quickest way to amass a fortune is by iniquity, but the trouble is about keeping it. Every hour of every day some such partridge is driven off the nest. Panics are only a flutter of partridges. It is too tedious work to become rich in the old-fashioned way, and if a man can by one lie school make as much as by ten years of hard labor, why not tell it, and if one counterfeit check will bring the dollars as easily as a genuine issue, why not make it? One year's fraud will be equal to a half a lifetime's sweat. Why not live solely by one's wits? A fortune thus built will be firm and everlasting. Will it? Ha! build your house on a volcano's crater; go to sleep on the bosom of an avalanche. The volcano will blaze and the avalanche will thunder. There are estates which have been coming together from age to age. Many years ago that estate started in a husband's industry and a wife's economy. It grew from generation to generation by good habits and high-minded enterprise. Old-fashioned industry was the mine from which that gold was dug, and God will keep the deeds of such an estate in his buckler. Foreclose your mortgage, spring your snap judgments, plot with acutest intrigue against a family property like that, and you cannot do it a permanent damage. Better than warantee deed, and better than fire insurance is the defence which God's own hand will give it.

But here is a man, to-day as poor as Job, after he was robbed by Satan of everything but his boils; yet, suddenly, to-morrow he is a rich man. There is no accounting for his sudden affluence. He has not yet failed often enough to become wealthy. No one pretends to account for his princely wardrobe, or the chased silver, or the full-curbed steeds that rear and neigh like Bucephalus in the grasp of his coachman. Did he come to a sudden inheritance? No. Did he make a fortune on purchase and sale? No. Everybody asks where did that partridge hatch? The devil suddenly threw him up and the devil will suddenly let him come down. That hidden scheme God saw from the first conception of the plot. That partridge, swift disaster will shoot it down, and the higher it flies the harder it falls. The prophet saw, as you and I have often seen, the awful mistake of partridges.

But from the top of a Bible fir tree I hear the shrill cry of the stork. Job, Ezekiel, Jeremiah speak of it. David cries out: "As for the stork, the fir tree is her house." This large white Bible bird is supposed without alighting sometimes to wing its way from the region of the Rhine to Africa. As winter comes all the storks fly to warmer climes, and the last one of their number that arrives at the spot to which they migrate is killed by them. What havoc it would make in our species if those men were killed who are always behind. In oriental cities, the stork is domesticated and walks about on the street, and will follow its keeper. In the city of Ephesus I saw a long row of pillars, on the top of each pillar a stork's nest. But the word "stork" ordinarily means mercy and affection, from the fact that this bird was distinguished for its great love to its parents. It never forsakes them, and even after they become feeble, protects and provides for them. In migrating, the old storks lean their necks on the young storks, and when the old ones give out, the young ones carry them on their back. God forbid that a dumb stork should have more heart than we. Blessed is that table at which an old father and mother sit. Blessed that altar at which an old father and mother kneel. What it is to have a mother they know best who have lost her. God only knows the agony she suffered for us, the times she wept over our cradle and the anxious sighs her bosom heaved as we lay upon it, the sick nights when she watched us long after everyone was tired out but God and herself. Her life blood beats in our heart and her image lives in our face. That man is graceless as a cannibal who ill-treats his parents, and he who begrudges them daily bread and clothes them but shabbily, may God have patience with him; I cannot. I heard a man once say:

"I now have my old mother on my hands." Ye storks on your way with food to your aged parents, shame him!

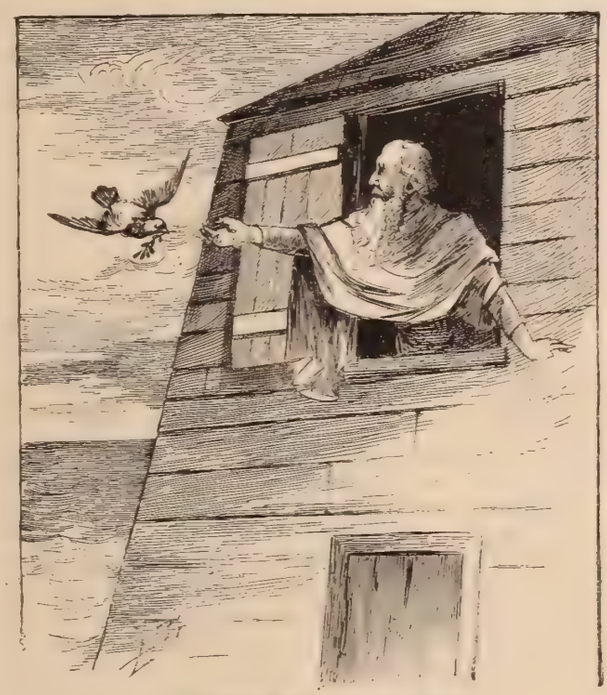
But yonder in this Bible sky flies a bird that is speckled. The prophet describing the church cries out: "Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird, the birds round about are against her." So it was then; so it is now. Holiness picked at. Consecration picked at. Benevolence picked at. Usefulness picked at. A speckled bird is a peculiar bird, and that arouses the antipathy of all the beaks of the forest. The Church of God is a peculiar institution, and that is enough to evoke attack of the world, for it is a speckled bird to be picked at. The inconsistencies of Christians are a banquet on which multitudes get fat. They ascribe everything you do to wrong motives. Put a dollar in the poor box, and they will say that he dropped it there only that he might hear it ring. Invite them to Christ and they will call you a fanatic. Let there be contention among Christians, and they will say "Hurrah! the church is in decadence." Christ intended that his church should always remain a speckled bird. Let birds of another feather pick at her, but they cannot rob her of a single plume. Like the albatross she can sleep on the bosom of a tempest. She has gone through the fires of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace and not got burned, through the waters of the Red Sea and not been drowned, through the shipwreck on the breakers of Melita and not been foundered. Let all earth and hell try to hunt down this speckled bird, but far above human scorn and infernal assault, it shall sing over every mountain-top and fly over every nation, and her triumphant song shall be, "The Church of God! The pillar and ground of the truth. The gates of hell shall not prevail against her."

But we cannot stop here. From a tall cliff, hanging over the sea, I hear the eagle calling unto the tempest and lifting its wing to smite the whirlwind. Moses, Jeremiah, Hosea and Habakkuk, at times in their writings take their pen from the eagle's wing. It is a bird with fierceness in its eye, its feet armed with claws of iron, and its head with a dreadful beak. Two or three of them can fill the heavens with clangor. But generally this monster of the air is alone and unaccompanied, for the reason that its habits are so predaceous it requires five or ten miles of aerial or earthly dominion all for itself. The black-brown of its back, and the white of its lower feathers, and the fire of its eye, and the long flap of its wing make one glimpse of it as it swings down into the valley to pick up a rabbit or a lamb or a child and then swings back to its throne on the rock, something never to be forgotten. Scattered about its eyrie of altitudinous solitude are the bones of its conquests. But while the beak and the claws of the eagle are the terror of all the travelers of the air, the mother eagle is most kind and gentle to her young. God compares his treatment of his people to the eagle's care of the eaglets. Deuteronomy 32 : 11 : "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreading abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings, so the Lord alone did lead." The old eagle first shoves the young one out of the nest in order to make it fly, and then takes it on her back and flies with it, and shakes it off in the air, and if it seems like falling, quickly flies under it and takes it on her wing again. So God does with us. Disaster, failure in business, disappointment, bereavement, is only God's way of shaking us out of our comfortable nest in order that we may learn how to fly. You who are complaining that you have no faith or courage or Christian zeal, have had it too easy. You never will learn to fly in that comfortable nest. Like an eagle, Christ has carried us on his back. At times we have been shaken off, and when we were about to fall, he came under us again and brought us out of the gloomy valley to the sunny mountain. Never an eagle brooded with such love and care over her young as God's wings have been over us. Across what oceans of trouble we have gone in safety upon the Almighty wings. From what mountains of sin we have been carried and at times have been borne up far above the gunshot of the world and the arrow of the devil. When our time on earth is closed, on these great wings of God, we shall speed with infinite quickness from earth's mountains to heaven's hills, and as from the eagle's circuit under the sun, men on the ground seem small and insignificant as lizards on a rock, so all earthly things shall dwindle into a speck and the raging river of death so far beneath will seem smooth and glassy as a Swiss lake.

It was thought in ancient times that an eagle could not only moult his feathers in old age, but that after arriving to great age, it would renew its strength and become entirely young again. To this Isaiah alludes, when he says: "They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings of eagles." Even so the Christian in old age will renew his spiritual strength. He shall be young in ardor and enthusiasm for Christ, and as the body fails the soul will grow in elasticity, till at death it will spring up like a gladdened child into the bosom of God. Yea, in this ornithological study, I see that Job says: "His days fly as an eagle that hasteth to its prey." The speed of a hungry eagle when it saw its prey a score of miles distant was unimaginable. It went like a thunderbolt for speed and power. So fly our days. Sixty minutes, each worth a heaven, since we assembled in this place, have shot like lightning into eternity. The old earth is rent and cracked under the swift rush of days and months and years and ages. "Swift as an eagle that hasteth to its prey." Behold the fowls of the air. Have you considered that they have as you and I have not the power to change their eyes so that one minute they may be telescopic and the next miroscopic. Now seeing something a mile away, and by telescopic eyesight, and then dropping to its food on the ground, able to see it close by, and with microscopic eyesight.

But what a senseless passage of Scripture that is, until you know the fact, which says "The sparrow hath found a house and the swallow a rest for herself where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts my King and my God." What has the swallow to do with the altars of the temple at Jerusalem? Ah! you know that swallows are all the world over very tame, and in summer time they used to fly into the windows and doors of the temple at Jerusalem, and build a nest on the altar where the priests were offering sacrifices. These swallows brought leaves and sticks and fashioned nests on the altars of the temple, and hatched the young sparrows in those nests, and David had seen the young birds picking their way out of the shell while the old swallows watched, and no one in the temple was cruel enough to disturb either the old swallows, or the young swallows, and David bursts out in rhapsody saying: "The swallow hath found a nest for herself where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God!"

Yes, in this ornithology of the Bible I find that God is determined to impress upon us the architecture of a bird's-nest and the anatomy of a bird's-wing. Twenty times does the Bible refer to a bird's-nest: "Where the birds make their nest." "As a bird that wandereth from her nest." "Though thou set thy nest among the stars." "The birds of the air have their nests," and so on. Nests in the trees, nests on the rocks, nests on the altars. Why does God call us so frequently to consider the bird's nest? Because it is one of the most wondrous of all styles of architecture, and a lesson of Providential care which is the most important lesson that Christ in my text conveys. Why, just look at the bird's nest, and see what is the prospect that God is going to take care of you. Here is the blue-bird's nest under the eaves of the house. Here is the brown-thrasher's nest in a bush. Here is the blue-jay's nest in the orchard. Here is the gross-beak's nest on a tree-branch hanging over the water, so as to be free from attack. Chickadee's nest in the stump of an old tree. Oh, the goodness of God in showing the birds how to build their nest. What carpenters, what masons, what weavers, what spinners the birds are! Out of what small resources they make what an exquisite home, curved, pillared, wreathed. Out of mosses, out of sticks, out of lichens, out of horsehair, out of spiders' web, out of threads swept from the door by the housewife, out of the wool of the sheep in the pasture field. Upholstered by leaves actually sewed together by its own sharp bill. Cushioned with feathers from its own breast. Mortared together with the gum of trees and the saliva of its own tiny bill. Such symmetry, such adaptation, such convenience, such geometry of structure.



THE RETURN OF THE DOVE TO THE ARK.

Surely these nests were built by some plan. They did not just happen so. Who draughted the plan for the bird's nest? God! And do you not think that if he plans such a house for a chaffinch, for an oriole, for a bobolink, for a sparrow, he will see to it that you always have a home? "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." Whatever else surrounds you, you can have what the Bible calls "the feathers of the Almighty." Just think of a nest like that, the warmth of it, the softness of it, the safety of it—"the feathers of the Almighty." No flamingo outflashing the tropical sunset, ever had such brilliancy of pinion: no robin red-breast ever had plumage dashed with such crimson, and purple and orange and gold—"the feathers of the Almighty." Do you not feel the touch of them now on forehead and cheek, and spirit, and was there ever such tenderness of brooding—"the feathers of the Almighty." So also in this ornithology of the Bible God keeps impressing us with the anatomy of a bird's wing. Over fifty times does the old Book allude to the wing, "Wings of a dove," "Wings of the morning," "Wings of the wind," "Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings," "Wings of the Almighty," "All fowl of every wing." What does it all mean? It suggests uplifting. It tells you of flight upward. It means to remind you that you, yourself, have wings. David cried out, "Oh that I had wings like a dove that I might fly away and be at rest." Thank God that you have better wings than any dove of longest or swiftest flight. Caged now in bars of flesh are those wings, but the day comes when they will be liberated. Get ready for ascension. Take the words of the old hymn, and to the tune unto which that hymn is married, sing:

Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wing,
Thy better portion trace.

Up out of these lowlands into the heavens of higher experience, and wider prospect. But how shall we rise? Only as God's Holy Spirit gives us strength. But that is coming now. Not as a condor from a Chimborazo peak, swooping upon the affrighted valley, but as a dove like that which put its soft brown wings over the wet locks of Christ at the baptism in the Jordan. Dove of gentleness! Dove of peace!

Come Holy Spirit, heavenly dove,
With all thy quickening powers,
Come shed abroad a Saviour's love
And that shall kindle ours.

A CONVERTED FAKIR.

IN a letter from Hoshyarpore, India, to the Church at Home and Abroad, the Rev. K. C. Chatterjee, a native Presbyterian evangelist, says: "Inquirers have daily come to me for instruction and advice. One of these named Ramgir, I baptized. He was a Rajput Hindu and left his home and family twelve years ago and became a Fakir in quest of peace and true happiness. For these he vainly sought in the ascetic practices of the country. He was at last persuaded to look for them in Christianity and visited me for this purpose. After reading one of the Gospels his mind was satisfied and he found that peace which Jesus alone can give and which the world can neither give nor take away. He looks happy and continues to study the Word of God."

"IT IS I."

WILD winds of Galilee
Sweep o'er the restless sea
Responsive to the gale;
Wild wave of the deep sea
Toss each quiv'ring sail.

Dark night in angry sky;
And frightened clouds flit by,
Pursued by furious storm;
And Death is hovering nigh
In grim and shadowy form.

But lo! a strange scene thrills
The dark lake of the hills:
A wondrous footstep braves,
A Voice of power stills,
The rage of winds and waves

To many a bitter cry
Of fear and agony,
Amid the storms of life,
He answers, "It is I,"
And stills the awful strife.

Wonderful rest and calm
When Jesus pours the balm
Of peace into the soul:
Love sings her noblest psalm,
And finds her highest goal.

JOSHUA, THE HIGH PRIEST.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 22, 1893. Zechariah 3. Golden Text, Heb. 4: 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE working of the Holy Spirit by his chosen instruments in the Old Testament dispensation was as diverse as the gifts of the Spirit to his people in the New Testament. "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of "ministries" (marg.), but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations ("workings," R. V.), but it is the same God which worketh all in all." The prophets Haggai and Zechariah were very dissimilar and Joshua or Jeshua, the son of Jozadak the high priest was again unlike the two prophets. Each had his several ministry, and each was a helper to the other in of reinstating the worship of, and witness to, their God in Jerusalem. Joshua and his fellows were equally "men wondered at" (or "men which are a sign," R.V.), just as Isaiah and his children were for signs and wonders (Isa. 8 : 18), and Ezekiel was "a sign" (Ezek. 4:3; 24:24, 27). The Old Dispensation was always foreshadowing the New, every sacrifice, every miracle, all the making of the tabernacle and building of the Temple, and all the Psalms of David also, pictured or sounded out the coming Messiah. And thus the rebuilding of the temple could not but point over to and prefigure the "spiritual house" built of living stones (1. Peter 2 : 5), Christ's inheritance in his saints. Like Enoch, Zechariah foresaw the coming of the Lord, he had more opportunity than Enoch to study the Scriptures, while Enoch's walk with God gave him the advantage of getting at the Lord's mind before the Scriptures were written. Doubtless Zechariah was one of those of whom it is written: "Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you; searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when he testified beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follows."

Pastor Stockmayer remarks, "What a shame and reproach it is to us, on whom the ends of the world are come that these old prophets should have been so diligent in Scripture study, searching the Scriptures,

Not for Themselves, but for us

while many, even converted people in the present day, do not know the Scriptures which concern the Lord's coming as well as these saints of old knew them, who had only half our Bible." Daniel and Zechariah, more than any other Old Testament prophets saw the coming of the Lord, of course, very specially, in relation to their own people, the Jews: Do we see the coming of our Lord in his call to his Bride the Church, the subject of which the angels desire to look into?

Joshua the high priest, was an intimate friend of the prophet Zechariah. But a man who is full of the Spirit of God, sees all men and all things in the light of God, and in his friend and companion the high priesthood of [illegible] anointed and prophetic eye of the man of God. God was revealing his secrets to his [illegible]nt the prophet through an angel which talked to him. O how few there are whom [illegible]n! Even Paul was in danger of [illegible]ved by them. (II. Cor. 12: 7.) This [illegible] priest, standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him (or to be his adversary.) Heaven and hell, the powers of light and the powers of darkness, were being opened to the prophet's eye. He no longer saw the children of Israel and their enemies in conflict, the battle ground had changed, it was a warfare in the invisible world, and also another High Priest than Joshua stood before him in his vision. How [illegible] Priesthood of Christ, it is difficult to say. Perhaps only gleams of light broke through upon his mind of Christ's priesthood after the order of Melchisidek, an unchangeable priesthood, "not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." (Heb. 7:15,16.)

Zechariah was still; the angel had commanded: "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord; for he is raised up out of his holy habitation;" and he could hear the "still small voice" saying: "The Lord rebuke thee O Satan; even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee: is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" "Now Joshua was and stood before the angel." What can this mean? The sacramental garments of Aaron were of the purest white linen, his very girdle was to be of white linen, or he could not minister within the veil, he must be without blemish, and his garments without spot. Unless the heart of Zechariah had been very fully fixed to listen to the Lord, unless his mind had been fully open to receive all he would say to him, his Jewish prejudices would have got the better of him, and he would have refused to recognize the high priest under the filthy garments. But God was leading his attentive prophet within the veil, to see in the coming Messiah One on whom should be laid the iniquity of us all. Up to this time, Zechariah, in common with all others save the high priest, had been excluded from the holy of holies, none but the high priest might enter there, and he himself might not enter without blood, because of sin. But the filthy garments? Could a Jew understand how Christ should redeem us from the curse of the law, "being made a curse for us?" Could he see that the filthy garments were the taking upon him of a character which he knew not, that he clad himself with the ruined character and lost reputation of sinful man that in that character he might bear our sins in his own body on the tree. O what a revelation of grace to this man of God! What should Satan the accuser say? "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Yes; he did die, the just for the unjust, bearing the filthy garments in Gethsemane, and upon the Cross, until his Father's face was hidden. But as he stood before the court from which there is no appeal, the command went forth: "Take away the filthy garments from him." He is "a Priest forever after the order of Melchisidek," let him have his priestly garments. But how? "I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment."

Only the Most High could speak thus. In this vision, the prophet did not yet see the death of Christ. Later on, he saw glimpses of a suffering Messiah, the lowliness of Christ's entrance into Jerusalem, riding upon the ass (Zech. 9: 9, 10), sold for thirty pieces of silver (11: 12, 13), the Messiah as one "whom they have pierced" (12: 10), and afterwards he sees "a fountain open for sin and uncleanness" (Zech. 13:1), and the sword of Jehovah awaking against his Shepherd, the Man who is his Fellow. (13: 7.) And the reign of Christ, his second coming, was the consummation of all things to this Old Testament man, whose long sight penetrated the new Covenant. He sees Jerusalem answering God's thought regarding her, "city of truth, a holy mountain," because God dwells in the midst of her, and God's ancient people no longer a curse, but a blessing (Zech. 8: 1–3, 13), the dominion of Christ universal (9: 10), and in the later chapters he sees the coming troubles of Israel, and the ultimate glory under the headship of the Lord Jesus, their Messiah.

Turning back to chapter three, we see how in all things God deals with his people in the High Priest The angel of the Lord protested with Joshua, saying: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts: If thou wilt walk in my ways, and if thou wilt keep my charge, then thou also shalt judge my house, and shalt also keep my courts, and I will give thee places to walk among these that stand by." O how many an one who has been brought to know Christ as his Saviour has felt: My life is impossible, I know I ought to be different, but there is no probability, I cannot go against all my family, I cannot run the risk of injuring my business, I cannot go counter to all the customs of society; there seems no place to walk, if I would follow Jesus truly. If you are in this difficulty, know that provision is made for you. "Places to walk" are guaranteed to your High Priest and Shepherd, and wherever he can tread, it is broad enough for you to tread with him, only be firm in taking no single step which he could not tread, only "walk in his ways," and he will make the most impossible things possible. Our glorious High Priest is at the right hand of God, ever living to make intercession for us. He has a will about every detail of our lives. It is his glory to extricate us in difficult moments. Trials are the greatest gains to us, because they are such opportunities for his intervention. Joshua, the earthly high priest, needed this assurance for himself, that he might walk in wisdom in the rebuilt temple, and reorganize aright the worship of Jehovah. We who are looking for the coming of the Lord, have the greatest need to have every step shown us and guaranteed by our Lord, because we are of the kingdom which is not of this world. Every step we take in following our Lord is in a current just the reverse of the world around us, we have nothin common with those among whom we live as "strangers and pilgrims." (1. Pet. 2: 11.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THIS chapter so enigmatical and unmeaning to us was full of instruction to the people who first listened to it. Imagine their circumstances. They had been exiles in the magnificent city of Babylon. Most of them had been born there and knew nothing of Palestine, but from the reports of their fathers who had told them of its fertility and the glories of its capital. They return when the king gives them permission. They find everywhere heaps of ruins. They begin to build the temple, but the work is vast; they are few and unskilled. Around them are the heathen mocking them. There are difficulties with the government, and they grow discouraged, discontinue the work and go back to their places and build their own houses. They are disappointed in their harvests year after year. Troubles of all kinds come upon them, and they wonder why God brought them back and then apparently deserted them. Perhaps he is not pleased at their leaving off building his temple. After fifteen years they resume the work. But it is weary and discouraging labor. Haggai encouraged them as we saw in last week's lesson. After they had worked a month Zechariah, a younger man than Haggai, but a prophet like him, comes to see them at their work. He tells them that he has had a series of visions. Then it seems God has not forgotten them, and they listen eagerly. He tells them that in his dream he saw their high-priest standing before the angel. Satan was also there resisting him. It is like a prisoner, dirty and ragged in one of our police-courts, with a clever lawyer there prosecuting him. It looks as if it would go hard with the accused, but the prophet sees God looking kindly on him, recalling that this was a brand he had plucked out of the fire, and clothing and purifying this representative of the people, and giving him cheering messages of what should be done for them if they would quit their sins and walk in his way, and the promise of the branch, that stem out of Jesse's rod which is Jesus Christ.

He showed me Joshua. The name of Joshua, means the Lord, the Saviour. To show the world Jesus is to show the way to peace and happiness. The Scriptures are full of him. He is represented there in many forms according to the offices he fills, saving, cleansing, loving and blessing men. No one can be lost who trusts in him. A traveler, following his guide amid the awful Alpine heights, reached a place where the path was narrowed by a jutting rock on one side and a terrible precipice on the other. The guide holding on to the rock with one hand, extended his hand over the precipice for the traveler to step upon and pass around the jutting rock. He hesitated, but the guide said: "That hand never lost a man." He stepped upon the hand and passed on safely. The child of God who takes the Saviour as his guide in this world of darkness and danger has the help of an untiring hand.

Satan standing to resist him. He does not wish souls to be saved and he has a variety of means to prevent it. Sometimes he attacks those who are trying to save others and brings discredit on them. Dr. Guthrie said: Some years ago, I went to see the light-house, which, standing on Dunnet Head—the Cape Orcas of the Romans—guards the mouth of the Pentland Firth. On ascending the tower, I observed the thick plate glass windows of the lanthorn cracked—starred in a number of places. I turned to the keeper for an explanation. It appears that it is done by stones flung up by the sea. The wave, on being thrown forward against the cliff, strikes it with such tremendous force as to hurl the loose stones at its base right up to the height of 300 feet. So are the great light-bearers, by the exposure of their position, and in spite of the elevation of their characters, liable to be cracked and starred by the violence of the world.

A brand plucked out of the fire. Nearly destroyed but not quite. Having had a narrow escape is in need of special care. A dissipated man who was reclaimed under the preaching of the Gospel was urged by one of his old companions to join in some festivity. "No," he said, "I am a brand plucked from the fire." "What do you mean?" asked the tempter. He replied: "Why, there's a great difference between a brand and a green stick. If a spark falls on a green stick there's no great danger; but if it falls on a brand that has been partly burned, it is very likely to flame up again. I'm a brand and I won't go where there are sparks of temptation flying as there will be at that saloon."

Clothed with filthy garments. It was so that the prodigal son returned to his father. If he had waited until he was able to get clean new clothing and take off the dirty clothes smelling of the swine and dirty with his horrible associations he might never have got back at all. Cowley tells the story of a gentleman who was fighting for King Charles I. and was in a camp that was surprised by the enemy. Opportunity was given for escape, a house being near at hand where loyalists would be safe. The soldiers ran immediately, but this gentleman looked at his clothes and saw that they were muddy and torn. He stayed to put on a better suit but while he was making the change the enemy took him prisoner and he was put to death. Christ wants sinners to come to him just as they are. He will have the filthy clothes removed and has the pure clothes of his righteousness ready to put on the sinner.

I will remove thy iniquity. When we think how many sins we commit this is a great promise. A minister was trying to convince an old woman of his church that God would keep his promise; but she shook her head despairingly, and pointing to a pan of sea sand at her feet, she said: "Ah, sir, my sins are like that, they cannot be numbered." "Where did you get the sand?" the minister asked. "At the Beacon." "Go back, then, to the Beacon and take a spade with you. Dig, dig and raise a great mound; shovel it up as high as ever you can, then leave it there. Take your stand by the sea shore, and watch the effect of the waves upon the heap of sand." "Ah, sir," she exclaimed, "I see what you mean. The blood of Christ! that would wash it all away."

If thou wilt walk in my ways. The way of God which leads to all the blessings here enumerated is the way of obedience. Everyone can walk in that way whatever his station, whether he be shoeblack or a millionaire. It is said of Henry of Bavaria that at one time becoming weary of court life he determined to enter a monastery. When he presented himself to Prior Richard, the faithful monk gave him the strict rules of the order. The king listened eagerly enthusiastically expressed pleasure at the prospect of such complete consecration. Then the prior insisted that obedience, implicit and uninquisitive, was the first requisite of sainthood. The monarch promised to follow his will in every detail. "Then go back to your throne and do your duty in the station God assigned you," was the prior's word to him. The king took up his sceptre again and from then until he died his people said of him, "King Henry has learned to govern by learning to obey."

Places to walk in. Sometimes the way of a person trying to do right seems closed up. He does not how to act or what to do. Every course open to him seems to involve trouble to himself or others. Gosse, in his "Romance of Natural History," tells us of certain animals which inhabit the coral reefs. So long as they keep the passage to the surface clear, they are safe; but this neglected, the animal finds the coral has grown around it, and enclosed it in a living tomb. And so it is with the life of the soul of man here upon earth. The world is around us everywhere; the danger is when we let it grow between our souls and God.

NEW YORK'S NEW CATHEDRAL.

The Ceremony of Laying the Corner-Stone of the Magnificent Edifice, the Cathedral of St John the Divine.

A CEREMONY that will be ever memorable in the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church took place in New York on Dec. 27. It was the laying of the corner-stone of the great cathedral of St. John the Divine. The day in the ecclesiastical calendar is marked as St. John's day and was therefore the most appropriate that could have been chosen for the ceremony. For more than twenty years the bishop and clergy of New York have been looking forward to the time when the erection of this magnificent edifice for the worship of God should be commenced. In spite of the wealth and consecration of the United States, no great Protestant cathedral has yet been built in the country. Beautiful and noble churches may be found in all our large cities, but no edifice in any of them corresponding to the imposing structures which are the glory of the cities of the old world. New York has taken the ititiative in this matter and has commenced the great work which, when completed, will stand as a monument to all future generations of the devotion and munificence of her people. It has been said that men do not build cathedrals in these days because they have become too materialistic in their disposition and too sceptical in their minds to undertake a work so costly and so elaborate. But this beautiful temple will be a concrete refutation of the reproach. It will prove that there are still among us men who, like the man after God's own heart, are not content that their own dwellings should surpass in splendor and architectural beauty any pile reared as a house of God.

RT. REV. H. C POTTER,

So far back as 1873, a charter was granted for "the establishment, erection and management of a cathedral church and its appurtenances in the city of New York, in accordance with the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church together with such incidental cathedral foundations, schools, faculties, and other religious or charitable works as may be properly connected therewith in and for the said diocese." A site was selected and several large subscriptions were promised at once; but the business panic and subsequent commercial depression which ensued caused the enterprise to fall into abeyance. Bishop Horatio Potter wisely decided that to press so large a project at the time on the attention of the people would be injudicious and might divert their gifts from objects more urgently in need of help. The site selected at Sixth Avenue and fifty-eight Street was allowed to pass into other hands and the idea of the cathedral slumbered for twelve years. But it was not dead. In 1886, the aged bishop who originated the project lay sick and near to death. He begged that a meeting of the surviving trustees might be held at his bedside. Only eight of the original seventeen were living, but they were sought and assembled round the death bed of the venerable prelate. Then he solemnly charged them to labor unfalteringly for the realization of the project which had so long been near his heart. He received their assurance of fidelity and soon afterward died in peace, confident that his cherished hopes would be fulfilled.

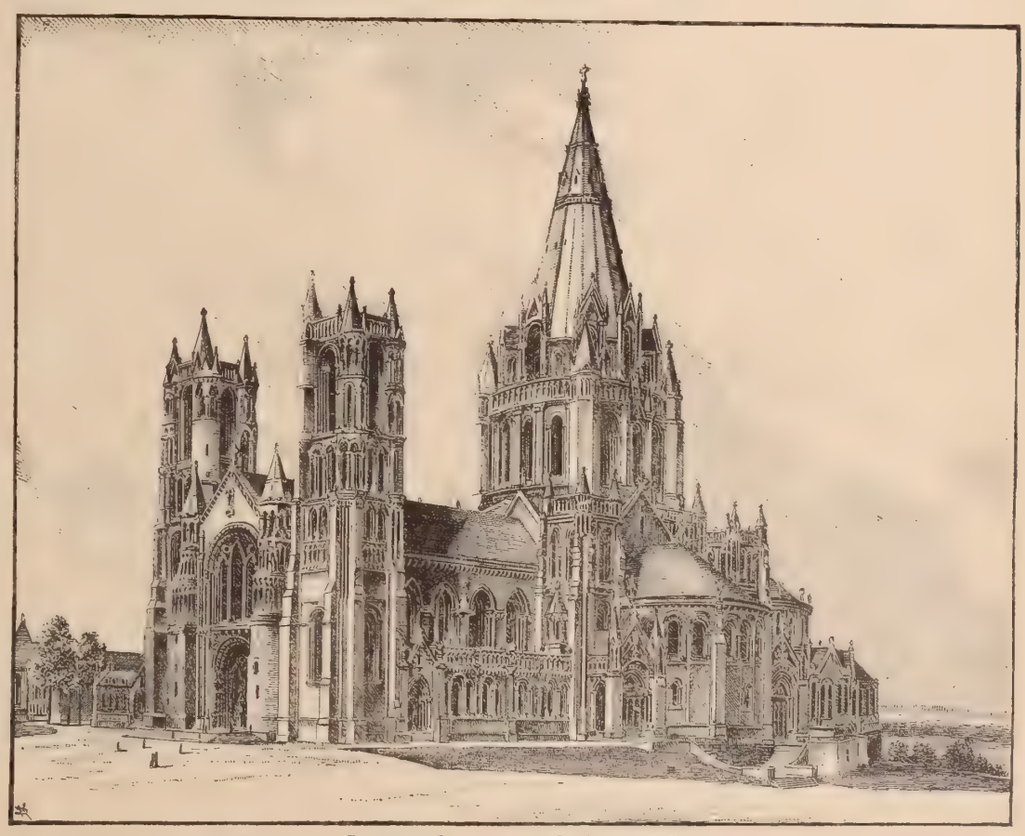
His nephew, Dr. Henry C. Potter, the present bishop succeeded him and early the following year he recalled public attention to the project, and suggested that there could be no better memorial of the exemplary life and unwearied labors of the late Bishop than would be the completion of the undertaking in which he had taken so much interest. The board of trustees was reconvened and an eloquent appeal for funds was issued to the public. In this appeal, Bishop Henry C. Potter presented his conception of what the cathedral should be, and how it would promote the religious life of the whole diocese.

It should, he said, be "the people's church, in which no rights can be bought, hired, or held on any pretext whatever. It will be the rightful centre of practical philanthropies, having foundations or endowments for the mission work of a great city, and especially for the education of skilled teachers and workers in intelligent as well as emotional sympathy with our grave social problems. It will have a pulpit in which the best preachers within its command from all parts of the land, and of various schools of thought, may have a place and opportunity, thus bringing the people of the great metropolis into touch with the strongest and most helpful minds of the age, and affording presentations of truth wider, deeper, and larger than those of any individual teacher. It will be the fitting shrine of memorials ot our honored dead, the heroes, leaders, and helpers whose names have adorned the annals of our country, and whose monuments will vividly recall their virtues and services." It would be the symbol of those great religious ideas in which the foundations of the Republic were laid and of which our open Bible, our family life, our language, and our best literature are the expression.

In some way the idea had become prevalent that a Cathedral was an un-American institution. Bishop Potter effectually combated that notion. He argued that there was nothing more un-democratic or exclusive among us than the ordinary church with its rented pews. It is, he contended, a clear departure from the teaching of Christ to reserve places in the house of God for those who can afford to pay for them. "If we are to teach the great lesson of brotherhood," he said, "of the absolute equality of all men before their Father who is in heaven, how more expressively can we teach and affirm it, than by rearing a sanctuary in which nowhere and under no conditions shall there be any reserved rights, any locked pews, any hired sittings, any proscription on the one hand, or any favoritism on the other?" In proof of his contention the Bishop referred to the congregations to be found in the great cathedrals of Europe where from five to six thousand workingmen often gathered and were free to take the best places, to hear the best preaching and unite in the most sublime service in the country.

The bishop could have taken no better way of commending the project to the American people. He was, it is true, urging the erection of a magnificent building, but it was magnificence accessible to and enjoyable by the poorest citizen. Subscriptions began to pour in. Large gifts came from the Astors, the Vanderbilts and other millionaires, and one gift of half a million dollars was sent by an unknown donor. The amount of the fund soon justified the trustees in again selecting a site and the block north of One Hundred and Tenth street and Ninth avenue was chosen. It is a commanding eminence and in a district eminently suitable for the imposing building. The price of the block was $850,000, and as nearly the whole of this sum was in hand, the work was at once commenced. Since the purchase was made, other large donations have been received which suffice not only for the completion of the payment, but leave a substantial sum for the work of construction, which, it is estimated, will not fall below ten millions. It is proposed to build first those parts of the cathedral known as the choir and ambulatory, and for those portions $1,425,000 are still required, less the amount contributed at the ceremony of laying the corner-ttone. That the required sum will be promptly furnished there is little doubt. The many gifts which have come from persons not belonging to the Episcopal Church shows that the project appeals to civic spirit and that there is a common desire that the city should have a religious building worthy of its wealth and influence. It was not Episcopalians alone who were pained by the reflection publicly uttered by a famous European agnostic, who remarked on his return from a visit to New York, that there was at least one great city which spent its money on commercial edifices and not on ecclesiastical buildings and arguing from the fact that there was little religious life in the city.

The plan of the magnificent edifice as at present determined is that shown in the illustration on this page, though the trustees have reserved the right to make changes and modifications as the work proceeds if it is found desirable. Many firms of architects competed for the honor of designing the structure but the prize fell to two young and comparatively little known men, whose plans harmonized more fully with the ideas of the trustees and committee of experts than those of their competitors. The design is a compromise between the two great styles of Gothic and Byzantine architecture. It will be of the enormous length of 520 feet and its central tower will rise to a height of 445 feet. The interior of the dome will be 253 feet from the pavement, the width of the nave 92 feet and the length of the transepts 296 feet. These figures show that the architects have departed from European models with the effect of providing a much larger space for preaching purposes than is usually to be found in the old cathedrals. Seven chapels to be known as "the Chapels of Tongues" are included in the design. They will be devoted to services in the seven different languages which the Protestant Episcopal Church uses in our cosmopolitan city. When they are built, citizens of seven different nationalities will be able every Sunday to join in the service and hear a sermon in their respective languages. The choir, which is to be the first portion of the vast structure to be erected will have a seating accommodation for 1,500 persons and the entire Cathedral if erected according to the present plans will hold 10,000.



THE PROPOSED CATHEDRAL OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE.

The services on Dec. 27, at the laying of the corner-stone were of an imposing character. Bishop Potter, whose portrait appears on this page, was naturally the most prominent figure and he was supported by eight other bishops and a large number of distinguished laymen. The President of the United States was unable to attend on account of recent bereavements but Chief Justice Fuller of the Supreme Court was present and took part in the exercises. Gen. Tracy, Secretary of the Navy, was also there with other well-known men, beside more than three hundred clergymen. An interesting feature of the ceremonies was the depositing in the cavity of the stone of a number of articles which, should they ever again see the light of day, will furnish the finder with accurate and exhaustive information of the religious situation in New York at this period. A copy of the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, the hymnal, various minutes of conventions, sermons and addresses relating to the Cathedral, the religious and secular newspapers of New York and the ecclesiastical almanacs of the year and a set of coins were all laid in the cavity. With them was deposited a single relic. It was a fragment of Spanish brick from the ruins of the first Christian Church ever erected on this continent—the church built by Columbus in 1493 on the Island of Hispaniola. These deposited in their resting place, the upper stone was lowered over them, Bishop Potter uttering the words as he struck it with the mallet, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ." The proceedings of the day closed with an eloquent address by Bishop Doane of Albany, in the course of which he said: "It is like a dream and a vision to look on to the coming day when with the old college which recalls the days of the Revolution and the names of the patriot scholars of those times, and with the hospital that enshrines the sweet name of Muhlenburg, the cathedral, the material seed of Bishop Potter's episcopate, shall lift its beauty from corner stone to cross topped spire, and with Christian science and philosophy and Christian works of healing and of mercy; with a Christian ministry of prayer and praise shall help on even the fulfilment of the splendid prophecy of the dear Lord's kingship when he reigned from the tree, 'I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me.' I believe the stone laid this day is a stone of witness that we set here and a magnet of mighty attraction.

"And still more this building shall be the bond of unity among Christian people of this city. Already there has been marked evidence of the fact in this that one of the greatest and most generous of the gifts which made possible this beginning comes from one belonging to another Christian body. I am glad to say there is some good Presbyterian money in my own cathedral; not so much as here, because there is not so much money in the whole; but it is a most hopeful sign of the recognition of what this church may come to be."

PLUMB-LINE RECTITUDE.

THE solid masonry of the world has to me a fascination. Walk about some of the triumphal arches and the cathedrals, four or six hundred years old, and see them stand as erect as when they were builded, walls of great height, for centuries not bending a quarter of an inch this way or that. So greatly honored were the masons who builded these walls that they were free from taxation and called "free" masons. The trowel gets most of the credit for these buildings, and its clear ringing on stone and brick has sounded across the ages. But there is another implement of just as much importance. Bricklayers and stonemasons, and carpenters, in the building of walls, use an instrument made of cord, at the end of which a lump of lead is fastened. They drop it over the side of the wall, and, as the plummet naturally seeks the centre of gravity in the earth, the workman discovers where the wall recedes, and where it bulges out, and just what is the perpendicular. God is represented as standing on the wall of character, which the Israelites had built, and, in that way, testing it. What the world wants is a straight up-and-down religion. Much of the so-called piety of the day bends this way and that, to suit the times. It is horizontal, with a low state of sentiment and morals. We have all been building a wall of character, and it is glaringly imperfect, and needs reconstruction. How shall it be brought into perpendicular? Only by divine measurement.

The whole tendency of the times is to make us act by the standard of what others do. If they play cards, we play cards. If they dance, we dance. If they read certain styles of book, we read them. We throw over the wall of our character the tangled plumb-line of other lives and reject the infallible test. The divine plumb-line needs to be thrown over all merchandise. Nothing would make times so good, and the earning of a livelihood so easy, as the universal adoption of the law of right. Suspicion strikes through all bargain-making. Men who sell know not whether they will ever get the money. Purchasers know not whether the goods shipped will be according to the sample. And what with the large number of clerks who are making false entries and then absconding to Canada, and the explosion of firms that fail for millions of dollars, honest men are at their wits' end to make a living. He who stands up amid all the pressure and does right is accomplishing something toward the establishment of a high commercial prosperity. I have deep sympathy for the laboring classes who toil with hand and foot. But we must not forget the business men, who, without any complaint or bannered processions through the street, often endure a stress of circumstances terrific.

To feel right and to do right under all this pressure requires martyr grace, requires divine support, requires celestial reinforcement. But you will be wise to preserve your equilibrium and your honesty and your faith, and throw over all the counters and shelves and casks, the measuring line of divine light. The question for me should not be what I think is right, but what God thinks is right. This perpetual reference to the behavior of others, as though it decided anything but human fallibility, is a mistake as wide as the world. There are ten thousand plumb-lines in use, but only one is true and exact, and that is the line of God's eternal right.

THE FEAR OF DEATH.

WITH many of us it is a bright, sunshiny day of prosperity. There is not a cloud in the sky, not a leaf rustling in the forest. No chill in the air. But we cannot expect all this to last. He is not an intelligent man who expects perpetual daylight of joy. The sun will after a while near the horizon. The shadows will lengthen. While I write, many of us stand in the very hour described in the verse, "For it is toward evening."

Oh, then, for Jesus to abide with us! He sweetens the cup. He extracts the thorn. He wipes the tear. He hushes the tempest. He soothes the soul that flies to him for shelter. Let the night swoop and the euroclydon toss the sea. Let the thunders roar—soon all will be well. Christ in the ship to soothe his friends. Christ on the sea to stop its tumult. Christ in the grave to scatter the darkness. Christ in the heavens to lead the way. Blessed all such. His arms will enclose them. His grace comfort them, his light cheer them, his sacrifice free them, his glory enchant them. If earthly estate take wings, he will be an incorruptible treasure. If friends die, he will be their resurrection. Standing with us in the morning of our joy and in the noonday of our prosperity, he will not forsake us when the lustre has faded and it is toward evening.

The words quoted are pertinent to us, from the fact that we are nearing the evening of death. I have heard it said that we ought to live as though each moment were to be our last. I do not believe that theory. As far as preparation is concerned, we ought always to be ready; but we cannot always be thinking of death, for we have duties in life that demand our attention. When a man is selling goods, it is his business to think of the bargain he is making. When a man is pleading in the courts it is his duty to think of the interests of his clients. When a clerk is adding up accounts it is his duty to keep his mind upon the column of figures. He who fills up his life with thoughts of death is far from being the highest style of Christian. But there are times when we can and ought to give ourselves to the contemplation of that solemn moment when to the soul time ends and eternity begins. This ought not to be a depressing theme.

On earth with many of you the evening is the happiest part of the twenty-four hours. You gather about the hearth. You talk and laugh and sing. You recount the day. You plan for the morrow. You have games and repartees. Amid all the toil of the day, that is the goal for which you run, and as you take out your watch or look at the descending sun, you thrill with the thought that it is toward evening. So death comes to the disciple! What if the sun of life is about to set? Jesus is the day-spring from on high; the perpetual morning of every ransomed spirit. What if the darkness comes? Jesus is the light of the world and of heaven. What though this earthly house does crumble? Jesus has prepared a house of many mansions. Jesus is the anchor that always holds. Jesus is the light that is never eclipsed. Jesus is the fountain that is never exhausted. Jesus is the evening star, hung up amid the gloom of the gathering night.

TIRED PEOPLE.

THE world is full of tired people, merchants tired of business, farmers tired of tilling crops, mechanics tired of building houses, housekeepers tired of preparing food, operatives tired of the rushing wheels. Pass along the road or street and see how tired three-fourths of the people look. How shall they get rested? Some say "By fewer hours of work!" But some of them have no work at all. Others might prescribe easy sofas, and more arm-chairs and soft beds. But some of the people who have the weariest look, have plenty of good furniture and luxurious upholstery. Now we offer a pillow not curtained with golden tapestry, nor stuffed with the down of angel's wings.

But a man who puts his head on it gets rid of his cares, and aches and anxieties. It is a pillow stuffed with the promises, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

It is astonishing how much is accomplished by some persons physically disadvantaged. When the right kind of religion takes hold of a man, it seems to give him additional eyes, additional ears, additional feet, additional hands, or to provide a substitute for having no eyes, or ears, or hands, or feet at all. There are great hulks of health floating about unserviceable, either to Church or State, while others with gout, or partial paralysis, or dim eyesight that can only distinguish between light and darkness, or limping by the aid of two crutches, who are every day making a subtraction from human sorrow and an addition to human comfort. It is a shame to have hands or feet or eyes and not employ them for good service. It was evidently intended that the race should average for each man two eyes, two ears, two feet, and two hands. But as through causalty so many lose one or more of these organs, the plain suggestion is that those who have full equipment of limbs should make them do a surplus of work for three who lack. So if there should be a small community of these persons, and one of them should be blind and feetless, the two with complete faculties must each take the work of three eyes and three feet in order to supply the defect of the unfortunate. In a word, the burdens of life must be divided, less weight put upon the invalid and more on the athlete. If this were done there would be no use of almshouses and orphan asylums, and the world would be set on many leagues toward the millennial day.

WOMAN'S CHARITY.

THERE is a kind of work that men cannot do for the poor. Here comes a group of little barefoot children to the door of the Dorcas Society. They need to be clothed and provided for. Which of these directors of banks would know how many yards it would take to make that little girl a dress! Which of these masculine hands could fit a hat to that little girl's head? Which of the wise men would know how to tie on that new pair of shoes? O Christian young woman, if you would make yourself happy and win the blessing of Christ, go out among the destitute! A loaf of bread or a bundle of socks may make a homely load to carry; but the angels of God will come out to watch, and the Lord Almighty will give his messenger hosts a charge, saying, "Look after the woman; canopy her with your wings and shelter her from all harm."

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

IT WILL COME.

YOU ask what? Why, the pulling of my ears; for I'm going to hammer away at these lazy, good-for-nothing, so-called Christian workers. They are no more fit to bear the name, than a pig is fit for a pet. "Work!" They don't know what the word means, let alone the fact. To call going to the weekly prayer-meeting, and making a prayer, or saying a verse, or speaking a moment, to call that Christian work, is like calling a day's work done, by the wagging of one's jaws to eat breakfast. Pshaw! Why not see the incongruity at once, and rate Christian work the same as other work. Where the element of toil and service and sacrifice enters; where by strength expended, something is accomplished. Let me give you a bit of Christian work:

1st. Take some things out of your pantry to the poor.

2d. Visit some sick person; take some fruit and cheer them with Scripture and prayer.

3d. Ask your pastor for seven names of folks who have not been to church lately, and go see them and help them.

4th. Call on some stranger in town and invite him over to your house to tea.

5th. Think of some one who may be in trouble, and go and relieve him.

6th. Raise the wages of men who are worth more than you are now paying them.

7th. Think out some good thing, that well digested and given to the people at prayer-meeting, will help them.

8th. If it's hard work to be brief in your prayers and addresses—be brief—that will tell mightily.

9th. See the church is cleaned up, if you have to sweep yourself.

10th. Learn by heart Psalm 91. There is work that will tell big.

Illustrate Your Truth.

I want to put in a big plea that teachers, preachers and evangelists illustrate their truth more. I get this from a close study of the methods of Jesus. He constantly enforced his teachings by illustrations so apt that to this day, in repeating them, you can see how full of life and power they were. To study the thirteenth chapter of Matthew or the fifteenth chapter of Luke will reveal what I mean.

I don't believe one can be guided by the Holy Spirit and not use illustrations to some degree at least in their work. I find all through the Bible God-led men are forever appearing to men in that way.

I believe in this theme is the secret of filling empty pews and getting more converted than we are now doing.

Hunt for good illustrations like a hunter seeks for game.

A Nice Family.

It's so good to meet a nice family. I found one not long since. It was Mr. and Mrs. Pulwell. They live on Content avenue; Have a number of children; one of them, Grace, as fine a girl as ever was born, and her sister Ruth is the delight of everybody.

I noticed this: they all pulled one way Mrs. Pulwell seemed to think her duty in life was to be a home-maker; and he, that is Mr. Pulwell, thought so, too, and he helped, and she helped, and they all helped together till, I declare, you could not find a cross thing in the house. Even the stone pipes in the cellar took a graceful turn, instead of swinging suddenly off at right angles. I noticed the kitchen girl, as well as the upstairs maid, wore contented looks, as though things pulled straight with them, too. You ought to know that family.

Where to Go.

There is a little fellow who was neglected, or forgotten at Christmas, and I want my friends of the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to look him up quick and care for him.

It won't be a pleasant visit from outward surrounding, and you will need to fill up with grace before you start, and fill your pockets, too. When you find him, he will be so uncouth and ragged that it will take all there is of you, to get out smiles and cheery words and faith, to believe your visit will do any good; but it will—just be your true, Christian self in the visit: let yourself out. And when you are in heaven, a hundred years from now, he will be there likely, to surprise you with the change. He lives in your town, and his name is Tommy Dirt, of Tangle Foot Alley.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE UMBRIA'S MISHAP.

DELAY in the arrival of the Steamship Umbria of the Cunard line caused much anxiety and alarm to a large number of people during the Christmas week. She was expected to arrive at New York from Liverpool on Christmas day, but not until December 28th did any news of her reach land. It was then learned that she was disabled at sea. A passing ship had seen her lying helpless on the waves, and understanding from her signals that she was not in need of assistance had gone on her course bringing the news. It was not until December 30th that the big vessel reached port. Her captain reported that on December 23d, when one hundred and twenty-five miles from Sable Island a flaw had been discovered in the shaft of the propeller. But for the early discovery the shaft might have broken and damaged the hull of the ship as happened recently to the steamer Spree. The engines were immediately stopped and the engineers began the work of repairs. During the day, the Bohemia of the Hamburg-America line was sighted and undertook to tow the disabled vessel to port. A heavy steel hawser was passed to her, and with this the work of pulling the Cunarder commenced. A furious storm was raging, and the strain of pulling the great ship through the sea in the teeth of the wind and snow was enormous. In a short time the hawser parted, the Bohemia passed out of sight and the Umbria was left alone. On the evening of December 25th the Gallia of the Cunard line was sighted on her voyage from New York to Liverpool. She rendered no assistance and excused herself from waiting by signalling that she was carrying mails. It is probable, however, that she misunderstood the Umbria's signals. Meantime the engineers on the Umbria had succeeded in patching the flaw in the shaft and the voyage was contined at less than half speed. When the end of the hawser which had attached the Bohemia to the disabled ship was examined, it was noticed that one of the wires looked as if it had been cut. It appeared to indicate that the officers of the Bohemia finding that the ship herself was in danger with so heavy a burden in tow, had cut a wire in the hawser and so weakened the hawser that the strain soon parted it. The Umbria's officers do not blame them for doing it, as it may have been necessary for self-preservation. They recognize that self-preservation must be the first consideration in such circumstances. Nearly every one acts on that principle in the affairs of life; but it is the glory of Christ that he reversed it and yielded himself as a sacrifice that the world might be saved. (Matt. 27: 42.)

A Noble Prisoner.

A REMARKABLE man was released from prison at Memphis, Tenn., on December 28th. He was convicted seven months ago of stealing a watch and was sentenced to five-years' imprisonment. One of his companions was under suspicion, but there was no direct evidence against him. The other man had pawned the watch after the theft, so the case against him was strong. He altogether refused to implicate his companion, and though he pleaded "not guilty" at his trial he made a feeble defence, and would not say even to his lawyer how the watch came into his possession. People who knew the two men believed that he was innocent and was shielding his companion who was guilty. There was no evidence to support the opinion and the man went to prison in due course of law. Six months ago news reached the prisoner that his companion was dead. Then he told his story. It was as the neighbors had said. He had pawned the watch for his friend not suspecting that it was stolen and when the fact of the theft came out and he was arrested, he held his peace, because, while he was a single man, his friend had a wife and a young family dependent on him. He said he should have maintained silence to the end of his term, if the other had lived, but now that he was beyond reach of the law, no harm could come of telling the truth. A petition for his pardon was drawn up and signed by the judge who tried the case and by other influential men and the Governor on hearing the facts, granted him a pardon. Few men, even for a very dear friend, would have been willing thus to sacrifice their good name and their liberty. It is not surprising to learn that he has the respect and admiration of all who know him. But it is surprising that men hear without emotion of that infinitely greater sacrifice in which they are directly interested. "God commendeth his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." (Rom. 5: 8.)

The Birds' Instinct.

AT the recent meeting in Pittsburg, Pa., of the State Ornithological Association, Dr. Hazzard reported a remarkable instance of the intelligence of American song-birds. He said that about seventeen years ago the Allegheny Park Commissioners imported a number of English sparrows. These multiplied fast, but their pugnacity resulted in driving the song-birds from their old haunts. Orioles, blue-birds, robins and other birds esteemed for their plumage or song, fled precipitately to save their lives from the foreign savage aggressor. Soon, there was not a bird's nest left in the park, and the sparrow reigned undisturbed. Last fall, however, the Professor noticed a number of the song-birds in the park, and they were followed by others. He feared they would soon be driven away, but they have remained and built nests. The peculiarity of their proceeding is, that whereas they usually build near the ground these birds have built in the loftiest perches of the trees. It is supposed that they made the discovery that their enemies never made high flights and made a practical use of it by building their nests above his reach. However it may be, they have changed their habit and are holding their own. So will the Christian survive who is beset by enemies, and trials and temptations from the great enemy of souls, if he makes his refuge in the Most High and lives above the clamor and strife of the world. (Psalm 91: 9-10.)

Where Lightning Strikes.

A COLLECTION of statistics as to the trees that are struck by lightning has been made by Dr. D. Jonesco, the results of which he sends to a scientific journal. He finds that certain kinds of trees are more liable than others to suffer from an electrical discharge. In a dense forest where trees of various kinds grow near together the lightning will strike a particular one and leave the others unscathed. Among the sufferers the most frequent is the oak, while the tree most seldom struck is the laurel. The professor has arrived at the conclusion from his study that the more oil a tree contains the more it is protected from lightning. The laurel contains much oil while the oak has scarcely any. The rule holds, the professor says, in every case he has investigated. In every group of trees in which one has been blasted, he has found that the injured tree contained less oil than any other member of the group. It is not explained why the electric fluid avoids trees impregnated with oil, but doubtless a scientific reason will be found. A spiritual counterpart of the phenomenon, however, is easily understood. When Satan's shafts are hurled against the Church in the shape of false doctrine, worldliness, or temptation in any form, those who fall are always they who have least of the oil of the Holy Spirit in their hearts. (1. John 2 : 27.)

An Abandoned Vessel Saved.

A VALUABLE little schooner was brought to New York on Dec. 31, by three daring sailors who will make a little fortune by their effort. It was the schooner Neva from Jamaica bound for Providence, R.I., with a cargo of logwood. When she was near Nantucket Shoals on Dec. 24 it was discovered that the severe storms she had encountered since leaving Jamaica had strained her timbers and the hold was filled with water. The pumps were immediately set going, but one of them was choked with the cargo and the handle of the other broke off short. The captain and crew were in despair and sent up distress signals. The American bark Redman saw them and went to the rescue. The Neva's captain and crew reported the vessel sinking and asked to be taken off. A storm was raging and it was difficult to get them transferred, but eventually it was successfully accomplished. When the captain told his story, the mate of the Redman asked permission to go to the abandoned ship and see if he could save her. Both captains tried to dissuade him, assuring him that the risk was too great and he would in all probability lose his life. The mate, however, persisted and at last, permission being reluctantly given, he, with two sailors, went on board the Neva and they were left to their fate. The three men soon had the pumps in working order and the hold was cleared of water. The buoyancy of the cargo helped them and they finally succeeded in reaching New York. The schooner and cargo will sell for $12,000 which the three brave men will divide between them. It is much to be wished that the reward God promises to those who will go to the rescue of the lost and outcast whom the world and the church have abandoned to their fate, would encourage more Christians to engage in the work of bringing them safely into the haven of God's love. (James 5 : 20.)

Writing on the Clouds.

THE opinion of electrical experts in New York has recently been sought on the feasibility of a novel system of advertising. Some experiments recently made by a French electrician suggested the possibility of throwing a reflection on the clouds, and the practical American mind perceived the use to which such an achievement, if practicable, could be put. Prof. F. B. Crocker, of Columbia College, when asked for his opinion, said that he believed it would be quite possible under certain circumstances to throw an image or words on a cloud, so that the picture or the writing would be perfectly clear to spectators over an area of several miles. It could, however, only be done when the clouds were not too far away. A powerful search light can throw a clear illumination on an object a mile away, and it would be easy, by making the light pass through a slide, on which a picture or some writing was traced on a dark surface, to reproduce the object which is on the slide in enlarged characters on a cloud. It was merely the magic-lantern on a large scale, with the clouds for a sheet. Other experts said that with a light sufficiently strong and lenses properly focussed, there would be no difficulty in having dissolving pictures on the clouds, if they were near enough to the earth to be reached by the search light. If the idea is executed, it will doubtless surprise many people, who will not know how it is done, to see such appearances in the heavens. They will soon see, however, by the character of the announcements that will appear, that it is a money-making device and not a revelation from heaven. If the same test had been applied to other utterances which people believed came from heaven, neither the Pope, nor the founder of Mormonism nor the spiritualists would have had many dupes. The Apostle recommended just such a test. (1. John 4: 1-3.)

A Clergyman's Dilemma.

THE complaint of a lady at Knoxville, Ia., is causing a clergyman there considerable embarrassment. For about a year he has manifested a marked preference for her society and his church fully expected to hear in course of time that a wedding was in prospect. They did get the news, but, to the general surprise, they learned that the clergyman's bride-elect was not the young lady with whom his name had been coupled for twelve months past. The latter lady lost no time in presenting her complaint, averring that the pastor had proposed marriage to her and had been accepted. The pastor met the assertion with a categorical denial. He declared at the church trial, which ensued, that she was a most untruthful person and called witnesses to prove that she was not suitable for a clergyman's wife. Now the pastor's opponents are urging that if his statement is true, he ought to be tried for associating on intimate terms with an untruthful young lady. He seems to have landed on a dilemma, either horn of which will impale him. Though the charge which he denies is the graver one, the other implies conduct explicitly forbidden in the Bible. Unhappily the fact is too often forgotten by professing Christians, that when they are often seen in worldly society, the world is apt to conclude that they find it congenial and are of the same spirit. (II. Thess. 3: 6.)

A Musical Receiver.

A SCIENTIFIC journal reports on the authority of Prof. Tyndall the remarkable result of an experiment in the transmission of musical sounds. A piano stood on the first floor of a building of which the third floor was the professor's lecture hall. The music of the piano could not be heard in the hall. A wooden rod was connected with the sounding-board of the piano and extended to the platform of the hall. Still the music could not be head by the professor's audience. A violin was then placed upon the end of the rod, and instantly the music of the piano was given out in the lecture room. A guitar and harp were substituted for the violin, and with the same result. The vibrations of the piano strings were communicated to the sounding-board, they traversed the long rod, were reproduced by the resonant bodies, the air was carved into waves, and the whole musical composition was delivered to the listening audience. So it has sometimes appeared in the church. Sensitive and sanctified natures have given utterance to thoughts and words not their own, but communicated to them from heaven. (1. Cor. 2: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has commenced a series of daily noon Prayer-mettings in the Union Square Theatre, New York.

Gen. T. J. Morgan, who has held the office of Indian Commissioner in this administration has been elected Secretary of the Baptist Home Missionary Society.

The total number of Protestant Christians in India, according to the last census (omitting Burmah and Ceylon), is 540,000. The number of communicants is now about 175,000.

A Cape Town colporteur writes: "During four months I have sold about 800 Bibles and Testaments for the sum of $400. I have generally received a hearty welcome in going from house to house. The natives flock round you like a flock of bees, and spend their last sixpence in purchasing a Bible."

Dr. Edwin E. Bliss, who has been laboring at Constantinople under the auspices of the American Board for nearly forty years, is dead. Dr. Bliss was appointed in 1743, and was stationed first at Trebizond, than at Morsovan, and lastly in Constinople where he has done much important pulpit and literary work.

Rev. F. E. Smiley is holding meetings at Marion, Ind., after which he will go to East Liverpool, O., Wasington and Kittaning. He expects to spend the Spring in Jacksonville and other Florida cities. His second Evangelistic tour of Southern churches just concluded has been a continuous season of blessing.

Prof. Charles A. Briggs was acquitted on Dec. 30th by the Presbytery of New York on all the six charges of heresy made against him. The presbytery voted on each charge separately. The majority varied from seven on the first charge to twenty-one on the fifth. It is expected that the prosecution will now appeal to the General Assembly.

Rev. Thomas Harrison opened his revival campaign at Jane Street Church, New York, on the night of Dec. 31, with a watch-night service commencing at eight o'clock and continued till after midnight. At the first invitation to seekers persons arose in all parts of the house many hastened to the altar and several happy conversions took place. At every service thus far held there have been marked manifestations of the Spirit's power. The outlook is now very bright for a great harvest of souls.

Among the communications from foreign lands which were presented to the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society at its recent meeting were letters from Mr. Penzotti and Mr. Norwood relating to plans for a journey to Central America; from Dr. Wood, giving a detailed statement of the burning of Bibles at Ayacucho, in Peru, and from Mr. Loomis, announcing the publication of the entire Japanese Bible in the Roman letter and speaking of progress made in Korea in Bible translation.

Dr. Charles F. Deems has suffered another attack of paralysis. On Dec. 27 a stroke deprived him of his power of speech. He was about to go to a sanitarium for rest and treatment for his first attack, when the second seized him. The journey was given up and he was taken to the home of his daughter, Mrs. Marion J. Verdery, in Ninety-fifth street, New York. His mind continued perfectly clear and at last reports the doctors gave hope that he would soon be able to articulate, but they insist on a long period of immediate and absolute rest.

Writing of the results of the visit of Rev. B. Fay Mills to Omaha, the Rev. A. R. Thain of that city says: The number of cards signed was 4,320, but the benefit which our city has received cannot be stated in arithmetical terms. On the last day of his stay, fully 7,000 different persons heard him speak. There were four preaching services, at each of which the hall was thronged, and during each of which there was greater manifestation of interest than anything that had gone before. It was evident to all the pastors present that the work would not close with the departure of Mr. Mills, but that for weeks and months to come every Christian worker in all of our churches will find ample and profitable employment in leading forward to the point of decision many persons whose hearts have been made tender by these union services, but who have not yet accepted Christ as their personal Savior.

THE SAVIOUR'S TEARS OVER THE SINNER'S LOSS.

Sermon Preached in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Mass., by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D.

"And when he was come near, he beheld the city and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes." Luke 19: 41, 42

REV. A. J. GORDON, D.D.

TWICE and twice only in our Lord's earthly ministry do we read of his weeping; and in neither instance was it because of a personal affliction. The Man of Sorrows borrowed his grief, even as he borrowed his sin from the world which he had come to save. Therein the Son of Man differed from all the sons of men, that while they shed their bitterest tears over their own griefs, he shed his only tears over the griefs of others. He wept at the grave of Lazarus because he stood face to face with the greatest woe of the world, that of death; he wept over Jerusalem because he was contemplating the greatest sin of the world—the rejection of the Son of God. And because this last sorrow is clearly related to our day and destiny, I ask you to consider it this morning. 1. Christ's tears over our Forfeited Opportunity.

"If thou hadst known in this thy day." Do you not remember the singular answer which Jesus gave his disciples when they warned him of the Jews' intention to stone him? "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" he replied. "If a man walk in the day he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world." As though he had said: "My opportunity is sacred and secure. Nothing can harm me while the time allotted me by my Father lasts; but if I let the time slip by unimproved, then I have no assurance of safety. "If a man walketh in the night, he stumbleth."

In another saying of Jesus recorded by John, he expounds this parable about the day, and applies it to himself. "Yet a little while is the Light with you," he says. "Walk in the light while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you; for he that walketh in darkness knowest not whither he goeth. While ye have the light believe in the light that ye may be the children of light." You see from this that it was the presence and ministry of Christ that constituted the day of the Jews. For three years and a half he stretched forth his hands unto them with offers of grace. His importunity was their opportunity; his open arms was their open door; his shepherd call, "Come unto me" was their salvation chance; "and ye shall find rest to your souls." But because they knew not the time of their visitation, they rejected and put to death the only One who could have brooded them under his wings, and the Roman eagles whom his prophetic eye saw poised above them ere long swooped down in awful doom upon them and their devoted city.

The Fountain of Youth.

And because Christ is in the world acting in grace toward men by his Holy Spirit, the present is our day, just as that was Israel's day. "Now is the accepted time," cries the Scripture; and I contend that the teaching of human consciousness harmonizes upon this point with that of the Word. Whence originated that enchanting dream of the Fountain of Youth? And whence the impulse which has led men to make distant voyages over sea and land in hope of discovering this fountain? Faithful Christians and fruitful saints look forward, not backward; they seek not the fountain, but for the ocean, longing for the day when they shall come into the harbor of Jerusalem the Golden. But there are so many who have idled through life's spring-time, without sowing any good seed for eternity, that they are almost frantic over their loss. They long to turn back the wheel of the rolling seasons; they want to unravel the web of life that they may pick up the dropped stitches; they thirst to drink once more of the Fountain of Youth, that they may retrieve their squandered opportunity. But, have you learned that any one has discovered the Fountain of Youth? Tell me if you have, and I will bring him scores of for a drink. No! But here is the Fountain of Life; and here is Jesus standing by and calling: If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." Our life's journey is taking us rapidly past this fountain, and I cannot promise you that there is any second probation; any renewed opportunity of grace for those who have lost their chance here. Our "Now" is the bulb of time from which our Eternity is to blossom; and if it be a "Now" of faith and self-denial, it will bear an eternity of blessed fruition. Our present tense will determine our future state.

The Closing Days

But I do not speak of opportunities of grace alone, but of opportunity for service. We are wont to say that man's extremity is God's opportunity. What if we invert the saying, and say reverently that God's extremity is man's opportunity? And such is the day in which we are living. God's affairs have reached a crisis, and the consummation of the ages is upon us. Has not speed quickened a hundred fold in our century? Let the telegraph and the lightning express answer. And think you that God does not keep up with men? That he alone is willing to move slowly while all the world is making haste? I profess to know something of what is going on in the religious world, and I venture to say that there was never a time since the Christian era dawned, when the chariot of the Lord moved with such speed as now. It moves rapidly because it is getting near the end of its course. Well has a wise man said: "Opportunity is but another name for the nineteenth century."

"And about the eleventh hour," i. e., near sunset, says Jesus, the husbandman "went out and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, 'why stand ye here all the day idle?" They say, 'because no man hath hired us.' He saith unto them, 'go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right ye shall receive.'" Who were these Eleventh-hour Workmen?

We are accustomed to them as idlers, who were so slow in getting around, that they only reached the vineyard at the last moment. But this is not said. "No man has hired us" is their story. But now at sundown they are set to work. What a picture of the eventide of the time in which we are living. The Lord is hiring in those who before have not been set to work. Laymen and laywomen, mechanics and ploughmen, converted drunkards and pugilists, Salvation Army lads and lasses, unlettered gospelers, and plain Bible readers. We do hear them speak in their own tongue the wonderful Gospel of the Son of God. The church has been slow to employ such, but in the hurry of the final ingathering, the Lord has set them to work. It is because the crisis of the battle is coming on, that God is calling out the recruits.

So my word to you is that of Scripture: "Brethren the time is short." Therefore responsibility presses a hundred pounds to the square inch, where formerly it pressed one. The heart must beat faster for Christ to-day than ever before; the blood must bound quicker. It is now heart-throbs for a perishing world, or it is spiritual apoplexy. The veins and arteries of the church cannot stand the pressure of the stagnant blood of religious inertia much longer. She must do or die. I speak the truth and lie not. Ecclesiastical corpses lie all about us. The caskets in which they repose are lined with satin; they are decorated with solid silver handles and abundant flowers; and like other caskets, they are just large enough for their occupants, with no room for strangers. These of respectability and been embalmed in self-complacency. If by the grace of God, this church is alive, be warned to use your opportunity, or the feet of them that buried thy sisters will be at the door, and will carry thee out. "If thou hadst known." Do you know your opportunity, my brother? Oh, if you would only open your eyes to see what your Lord sees! You would crowd about him asking, "Lord, what will thou have me to do?" For myself, my daily cry to heaven is, O Lord, give what thou wilt, or withhold what thou wilt; but do not suffer me to be blind to my "day," and so people my grave with the haunting spectres of forfeited opportunity.

II. Christ's tears over our forfeited peace. "Oh, that thou hadst known . . . the things that belong to thy peace." "Duty done is the soul's fireside," says Joseph Cook. The quiet rest, the homelike contentment which come from the sense of having been faithful to our opportunity, is beyond all price. "What did you get for your trouble?" asked a companion of George Whitefield, after the latter had risen one night at an inn, to rebuke a profane swearer, against the advice of his friend. "What did you get for your trouble?" "A soft pillow for my head to-night," replied the great preacher. An approving conscience makes known. Those who depend upon the upholstery of luxury and self-indulgence to make them an easy couch, never find it. The self-loving, the worldly, the luxurious, the pampered sons of fashion — thousands of them sleep on hard beds, beds mattressed with discontent and self-condemnation. Be faithful to the claims of God and the monitions of conscience, if you would be at peace with yourself. How then can we miss the peace which is appointed for us?

By not knowing our duty when we might have known it. I shall meet you again in the life beyond, my brother, and then you will say, "Why did you not tell me?" And I shall reply, "I did tell you." The hearer becomes deadened by constant hearing; his ear-drum is turned into a wall of defence instead of a means of communication; so that having ears, he hears not. You are a Christian, and that means that you are to be a man of prayer, a man of charity, a man of the Cross. It will not do for you to be just as worldly, just as devoted to pleasure, and just as covetous as your next door neighbor who makes no claim to be a Christian. If you are, the Lord will say to you, "I never knew you," when the time of reckoning comes. And in the surprise of a sudden waking to your condition, you will say, "Why did you not tell me so?" I did, a hundred times, and you heard it, and yet did not hear it. "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life," says Jesus. And when you stand before the judgment-seat, and are sent away into outer darkness, you will say, "Why did you not tell me so?" I did, a thousand times, in a thousand sermons, but

You would not Hear.

I saw a pilgrim journeying through an unknown country, in search of a city, the name whereof is "Peace." And as he traveled on, I saw one come out and warn him saying: "This is the way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death;" and he thanked his informant with a smile, and kept on. A little farther another stopped him and said: "Turn back, turn back, for this is the way whose steps take hold on death," and again he thanked him and said: "Your words are eloquent, and charm me, as a very lovely song, of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument," and so he journeyed on as before. A hundred times he was thus accosted, and a hundred times he bowed politely and pursued his way. And at last when he came into the land of darkness and despair, he looked around with astonishment, and asked, "Why did no one tell me?" And as though from a thousand voices breaking forth all the way along, I heard the reply: "He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be cut off, and that without remedy." Not to know when you have been told a multitude of times, —this is the sorest of all condemnations.

Our Not-Doings.

By knowing and not doing we may miss the peace which has been provided for us. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not to him it is sin." Photographs are made by means of negatives; and so our wrong-doings are produced by means of our not-doings. Men have invented a distinction between sins, dividing them into "sins of omission" and "sins of commission." But God has made no such fine distinction. "Sin is the transgression of the law," is his definition. What difference is there in his sight, whether when he says "thou shalt not," I answer "I will," or when he says "thou shalt," I say "I will not." In either case there is disobedience, and by disobedience is condemnation. But you reply: "I have never said I will not." But you have acted it. And action is the loudest and most emphatic form of utterance. Not to believe is to believe not; not to obey the Gospel is to disobey it.

What wonder that our Lord should grieve over our forfeiture of peace? To lose our peace is to lose our power; to lose our peace is to lose our privilege of blessing the world. It is a great thing surely to be in harmony with God, to be assured that the quarrel of sin has been settled, and that "being justified by faith we have peace with God." But how great the honor of being peace-makers with men on God's behalf; to carry joy and comfort and hope to a lost world! What wonder that the prospect of losing such an opportunity should draw tears from the Redeemer's eyes. His sigh is but an echo of one that was heard very anciently: "Oh, that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! Then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea;" like a river which purifies and sweetens the towns and cities along which it flows, which makes green and fertile all the banks which it waters; and which takes up the great ships upon its bosom, and bears them out upon the deep. True picture is this of a Christian reconciled to God, and reconciling men to God—enriching, blessing, and beautifying a lost world. What wonder we ask again that our Lord should sigh over the possibility of our losing such a peace and all the gracious opportunities of blessing flowing out from it.

III. Christ's tears over our Self-inflicted Blindness.

He said: "But now they are hid from thine eyes." Sight becomes quenched through long disuse. As the eyeless fishes in Mammoth Cave are believed to have had organs of sight originally, and to have lost them by dwelling in perpetual darkness, so our faculty of spiritual discernment may be destroyed through want of exercise. This is one of the most unquestionable facts of human experience. Therefore let us remember that the excuse, "I did not know," will be absolutely worthless at the judgment seat, if it be merely the expression of wilful ignorance. Better be a pagan at the last day, who can say, "I did not know because I could not know," than a Christian who must say, "I did not know because I would not know."

My appeal to you is: know what you may before it be too late. "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace." To know God is the surest and only way of knowing yourself. In his holiness you discover your sins; in his truth you discover your error; in his commandments you discern your duty. But if you neglect to obey God, you will become more and more insensible of his claims upon you.

How Christ sorrows over blind sinners, whose blindness is self-inflicted! The sublime vision of glory, honor, immortality and eternal life, which is ever before his eyes, is utterly unknown to them, because their eyes are holden of unbelief and disobedience.

My hearers, let the tears of Jesus fall upon your sightless eyes this morning! Call upon him now, "Lord that I may receive my sight!" Believe on the Son of God; accept him now as your Saviour and Lord, that hereafter you may see him as the "King in his beauty."

A BAPTISM IN BURMAH.

THE baptism of the first convert won from among the heathen of Meiktila in Burmah is reported by Dr. J. Packer, who is laboring in that Burmese city. The event occurred on the Sunday previous to the despatch of his letter to the Baptist Missionary. A pretty cove with grassy sloping shore and sheltered by a beautiful copse of shrubs and wild, flowering vines, with here and there a good-sized tree, forming a part of the northern boundary of our grounds, furnished as perfect a baptistery as one could wish. The few believing hearts present were filled with thankfulness for this first trophy of redeeming grace from Meiktila, none more so than the candidate himself, whose face beamed with sober joy. Only Mrs. Packer and one or two inmates of the household witnessed the interesting ceremony. "Of others," says Dr. Packer, "not a neighbor, friend, or relative, not even wife or child, was there to show by their presence their interest or good will toward him. Their absence, indeed, was only too significant of that ill will and bitter opposition they had already made him feel on hearing his intention to be baptized, one and all having declared their intention that they would have nothing to do with him, either in a business or social way, if he did so; so that it was for him a literal forsaking of the world for Christ.

His wife, a strong-minded woman, though no longer having any confidence in Buddhism, and who some time before had professed to desire his baptism much, now when his mind was made up strenuously opposed him, for worldly considerations doubtless, being, like so many Burmah women of her class, a small bazaar trader, and so fearing her business, on which the support of the family depended, would suffer thereby, a very natural feeling under the circumstances, we must allow, especially as the husband's health is not good. The knowledge of this gave the occasion not only a pathetic but also a solemn judicial import, illustrating and enforcing, as it did, Christ's own extreme test of fitness for discipleship. "If any man come unto me and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sister, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

Gospel Needs in New Mexico.

A Correspondent Writes of the Spiritual Wants of the Mining Districts.

FROM the heart of New Mexico, the following letter, descriptive of the progress of Church work in that distant part of the continent, has been received. The writer, Mr. John Bennett, is a warm friend and old-time subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

KINGSTON, SIERRA CO., N. MEX., Dec. 10, '92.

In renewing my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I send three other yearly subscribers, and I take advantage of putting down a few thoughts, for your paper. Ours is a wonderful camp in many respects. The former home of the Apache, full of game and rich deposits of mineral, which the Indians carefully guarded until the death of Nana and Victoria, the old chiefs, the camp's history is very interesting.

Church-work has not been a success in the camp—all mining towns are called camps in the Western country. But in this respect it differs little from other work; not, however, because the field is not a good one.

In going or coming to town for mail and supplies, I cross a spur of the Black Range, one of the highest mountain ranges in New Mexico, which juts out from the great Continental Divide. We live in the heart of one of the finest mineral and pastoral sections in the world. To the west is Silver City, some twenty miles away—a well-built little town nestled in a beautiful valley at the foot of the Continental Divide surrounded with millions in the shape of mineral, on every side. Hillsboro is a gold camp, and is the older town. Kingston is mostly silver, and is the larger by about 1,000 inhabitants. It started with a boom in 1880, and millions in silver and gold were almost literally shovelled out of prospect holes into wagons and hauled off to mills, reduction-works, and smelters, without hoisting-works or getting below the water level.

The ore has to be removed and refined. As to gold the miner often puts it into his pocket in the daytime, and spends it at night. Yet more poor men have struck fortunes in this camp than probably in any silver camp ever found. But when water was struck and hoisting became expensive, and silver was legislated down, our camp became dull.

Often as I ride across home, and look back toward the valley, and see the now abandoned ruins, dismantled machinery and smokeless chimneys, I am reminded how the Church often does her work — especially in this Western country. Some young, or weak brother is sent out to do the work, and like that of the young or inexperienced mining superintendent, when the returns come in there is nothing to show. The labor has been unskilled, and the workman did not know how to seperate the precious metal from the gangue, and often what he gathered and put into the sack was waste, worse than what he threw over the dump. In the case of the Church laborer, he often gathered in the hypocrites, the weak-minded, or those who had been worn out in sin, and like the ore shipments, the returns did not even pay the freight, and left the miner in worse condition than before; and so the Church laborer leaves the field in worse condition often than when he found it.

How often the Church laborer gathers into the sack for saving, the waste, while he throws, or allows the more precious material to go over the dump: out into the gulches and ditches of sin, into the saloons and waste places of life. As I look down into the valley at the millions that must lie beneath the surface or the mountain side, from the indications and croppings on top, I realize that in a mining way, things are not as they should be. And as my thoughts run back to the gilded saloon and noisy street which I have just left, and the many noble hearts, "square fellows" that I meet in the gay crowd, and the little band gathered in prayer-meeting at the only church in town, I feel that things are not as they should be.

CONVERSION TESTED.

A SOLDIER in the East Indies, a stalwart man who had been a prize-fighter, was a terror to his regiment. He was converted, and the lion became a lamb. Two months afterward in the mess-room some of those who had been afraid of him before began to ridicule him. One of them threw a basin of hot soup over him. The whole company gazed in breathless silence, expecting that the offender would be murdered. But the former bully merely wiped off the mess. But after he had torn open his waistcoat and wiped his scalded breast he turned round and said, "This is expected when I became a Christian."

THE WHYS AND WHEREFORES.

LET us take up the whys and wherefores,
The questions and doubts and fears,
That are veiling our God's face from us
Like a star that is seen through tears.

Let us take up and bring together
All we cannot understand,
And lovingly, trustingly place them
In our Heavenly Father's hand.

'Tis a proof of his own great wisdom
That we, though ever so wise,
Cannot always divine the message
He sends to us from the skies.

When we stand with him in his kingdom,
All we who are blind shall see;
So let all the whys and wherefores
Be adjourned to eternity. —J. E.

"O LORD, THOU KNOWEST."

THOU knowest, Lord, the weariness and sorrow
Of the sad heart that comes to thee for rest.
Cares of to-day, and burdens for to-morrow,
Blessings implored, and sins to be confessed.
I come before thee at thy gracious word,
And lay them at thy feet, thou knowest, Lord!

Therefore, I come, thy gentle call obeying.
And lay my sins and sorrows at thy feet,
On everlasting strength my weakness staying,
Clothed in the righteousness of faith complete:
Then rising and refreshed, I leave thy throne,
And follow on to know as I am known.

THE COMING KINGDOM.

Its Nature and Manifestation Misunderstood Now as it was in Christ's Time.

BY GEO. H. PEMBER, M. A.

WAEN the Pharisees asked Christ, when the kingdom of God should come, he told them that it came not with observation, but was already among them (Luke 17 : 21). Do you, he practically says, inquire concerning the Kingdom of God? It will never come as you expect it: and when its first manifestation does take place, the circumstances will altogether preclude men from saying, Lo, here! or, Lo, there! You are looking for an outbreak of rebellion against the Romans, in this locality, or in that, and for the appearance of some great military chieftain to be your Messiah. You imagine that he will lead you on from victory to victory, and that, although your sins are still upon you, the prophecy will nevertheless be fulfilled;—"Five of you shall chase a hundred, and a hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight: and your enemies shall fall before you by the sword."

You are altogether mistaken: you will never see anything approaching to such an ideal. Nor is it possible that the Kingdom should be discovered by such watching as yours: for even now it is in the midst of you, and yet with all your observation you have failed to perceive it.

We need be at no loss to understand the significance of the last sentence. The Lord himself, around whom both the Pharisees and his own disciples were at the moment clustered, was at once the King and the embodiment of the Kingdom. In him was centred, not only its authority, but its life, its righteousness, its wisdom, and its power; and those who would become partakers in it must do so by believing in him, and abiding in him, until the day of instantaneous and glorious manifestation should have come.

And yet many Christians have been wont to misinterpret this answer, and then to quote it as if it included all that the Lord had to say upon the subject. See, they have urged triumphantly, the Kingdom comes not with observation, but is internal and spiritual: therefore, all your hopes of the personal return and reign of Christ are vain. They confuse the temporal with the spiritual as the Jews did.

Could there be a more striking example of the way in which the will of man overrides his reason? And in this instance the false doctrine is altogether without excuse; since the Lord at once, and on the spot, turned away from the Pharisees to his own disciples, to whom he immediately gave a vivid and thrilling account of the manner in which the outward manifestation of the Kingdom should take place. For they had already received him into their hearts: they had sworn allegiance to the King: they were abiding with him in his temptations. It was for them that the Kingdom was appointed: they should know of its outward manifestation, and of all else that concerned it.

Accordingly, the Lord unveils the future to their wondering gaze. Until the Kingdom come, there will be suffering and depression for those who are to enjoy it, and many endeavors on the part of Satan to draw them aside by means of false hopes. But, at last, a glorious deliverance shall break like lightning through the gloom—a deliverance, however, which must deeds be preceded by the rejection and suffering of him who shall bring it. Meanwhile, the dwellers upon earth will be absorbed in the pleasures and occupations of this short life, and, by reason of selfish indulgence, will grow so blind and deaf and insensible to everything spiritual, that the coming of the Son of Man will be to them as an unexpected knell of doom suddenly resounding over the broad earth, and spreading the wildest consternation and despair. Let the disciple then, beware of lapsing into the world's insensibility; for when the summons of the Lord goes forth, there must be an instant response. If any man hesitates but for a moment, he may, like Lot's wife, be involved in the destruction, even though his conveyance out of danger should be already in progress. And the great cause of hesitation will be love for the things of this life, which the believer must, therefore, eschew. For when the unknown time arrives, the Lord will, without a moment's warning, separate between the nearest relations and most intimate companions, and take to himself those only whom he finds faithful and watching. As to the world, wherever the rebellious or persistently indifferent may be, thither the ministers of vengeance will descend as vultures swoop upon the prey.

desire that the capitalists and the unfortunates may be brought close together in love; and here is a field where a little capital can accomplish immense results, and bring joy and gladness and blessing as well to the heart of the giver as to the receiver.

The Travelers' Club is composed of about a half thousand men who stay in New York, and meet every day except the Lord's Day, at 208 Eighth Avenue. Mr. Merritt has preached to the members every morning during the last two months. Writing recently of the Club, Mr. Merritt thus described its sessions:

"We preach each morning at 6 o'clock. This is early, but what an audience! Most of them have carried the banner, walked the streets all night, without a cent, or a friend, or a hope, or a home, in darkness, doubt and desolation. They are so glad to get in where it is warm, so pleased to have a kind word of encouragement, of counsel, of cheer. So delighted to appease their hunger and thirst by a couple of bowls of hot, excellent coffee, and a brace of rolls, so ready to receive the sweet truths of the Gospel on a full stomach instead of an empty.

"Men, all men, not a woman in the place. Men, our men, born in the same ward, taught in the same schools, played the same games with me. Men, men from the country, true men, but stranded in this immense city. Cultured, but ashamed. Men from over the ocean, wrecked here, such wrecks, seemingly hopelessly ruined, by misfortune, debauchery, drink. Men for whom Jesus died, and whom the Holy Spirit loves as a mother loves a bright, wayward boy.

"Men whose wives, children and homes are desolate through their wrong-doing, but to whom a kind word, a loving hand-shake, a tender caress is invaluable in this the time of their extremity and despair. So orderly, so thankful, so receptive are they, of the truth spoken in love. They cannot stand sanctimoniousness, they see clearly through any Phariseeism, and are too witty to be taken by any craft to get them into the Gospel net through the loaves and fishes. True hearts win them, unselfish purposes amaze them, they are attracted, drawn by an uplifted Christ that is presented in a simple loving manner, but they shun those whose object is applause or gain in the work of the Lord. They are indeed worth saving, and will measure up with any other class of men, man for man, in use-

GOD'S COVENANT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 22, 1893. Zech. 3: 7; John 15: 7, 8.

PERFECTLY reasonable from the human standpoint is the covenant God makes with men. We act toward our fellows on that basis and would resent any imputation of unfairness in doing so. Obedience, intelligence and an effort to conform to right rule and order are the conditions which the most indulgent employer demands of those in his service. "If thou wilt walk in my ways" is the Old Testament word; "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you," is Christ's stipulation. Both are of one kind. He who abides in Christ must be necessarily walking in God's ways, as he walked. Special rewards are promised to all who comply. But apart from reward, reason tells us that there is no way to happiness but that of conformity to the will of God. Our engineers and inventors have attained all their successes by studying the laws of nature and applying them to the problems to be solved. The steam engine, the electric telegraph, the suspension bridge are the triumphs of conformity to fact and law, which are only other names for God's methods of governing the material universe. By the same path must we travel in the spiritual world. God's way is the way of peace, but the way of the transgressor is hard. The rebellious child, the insubordinate servant have no comfort or rest in opposition, nor does reward fall to them. Sin is always loss. It weakens and demoralizes, and if persisted in, eventually destroy all the noble elements of being. The way of God is the way of growth and development. This covenant, therefore, brings its own reward to those who comply with its conditions; and over and above that fruit comes the special promise of God's favor and fatherhood with all that they imply.

WORK FOR KING'S DAUGHTERS.

AN appeal for help in founding and supporting a much needed institution is made to the King's Daughters by Miss Helen Richardson who is about to set out for India to resume charge of the work. She has been for several years at the head of the Rescue Mission in Bombay which was established to reclaim fallen women among the natives and the foreign population of the city. So much good has been done by the institution that the managers are anxious to enlarge it and to open branches in other cities. It is the only work of the kind in Western and Southern India. Miss Richardson has labored steadily there without salary or compensation of any kind since January, 1887. She has now purchased six acres of land on a healthy site near Poona, on which she is anxious to erect a new building. There the women will have a better prospect of physical and moral restoration than in Bombay. Miss Richardson asks Circles of King's Daughters who take an interest in Foreign Mission work to consider a suggestion that this form of helpfulness is especially appropriate to them and within the sphere of labor cultivated by daughters of the King. She promises that all contributions received for the purpose will be devoted without any deduction to the work, as there are no charges for printing, traveling expenses or any other administrative operations. Miss Richardson's address, for the present, is 250 West Forty-fourth Street, New York. Any Circles disposed to consider her appeal, would do well to communicate with her at once, before her return to India and obtain from her a full statement of facts and details.

THE TORONTO B. Y. P. U.

THE Young People's movement in the Baptist Churches of Toronto has taken hold with great power. The city union has just been celebrating its first anniversary. Three hundred representatives of the various unions in the city assembled in the Walmer Road Church on the occasion. Mr. H.L. Stark was re-elected president for the year. Mr. H.R. Jenkins was elected secretary and Miss Kerr, treasurer. Three hours were devoted to a conference on methods of work and plans of co-operation and aggressive efforts for the coming year. Rev. O.C. Wallace gave an illustration of an Outline Study on the life of Christ which was followed throughout with deep interest. All the young people were enthusiastic in their devotion to the Union and full of hope for the good results of future effort.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

A LEAGUE of two hundred and thirty members is reported in connection with the Eighth Avenue M. E. Church of Oakland, Cal. From North Lawrence, Kans., comes the news of the formation of a League as a result of a series of Revival services in the church there. The League in Missouri is flourishing. At the Union meeting recently held at St. George two more churches reported the formation of Leagues, making eight in all in that city. Indiana is making a record for itself in the movement. At Indianapolis the fifteen Leagues of the city and vicinity held a large mass meeing in which the Christian Endeavor Societies united. Short cheering testimonies and good music combined to make the occasion one of delightful interest. In the Sante Fe Chapter considerable attention is being given to literary matters. This has had an encouraging result in attracting members and in binding the young Christian people in closer fellowship in their studies. In Massachusetts there is remarkable activity in the Lynn District. At the recent quarterly meeting which was held at Chelsea, one Chapter reported having supplied the barbers' shops with religious journals; another having established an Italian mission; another has a boat which visits vessels in the harbor distributing tracts and Bibles and inviting the sailors to church, and still another has contributed $1100 to the church treasury during the past year. The new secretary, Dr. Schell, has been at Ellenville, N.Y., inspiring the Convention of the Leagues of the Newburgh District to increased effort.

A NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATION.

THE pretty and tasteful building, a picture of which appears on this page, is the home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Everett, Mass. The town has a population of about 13,000 and the fact of its having such a building is an indication of the devotion and enterprise of its young men. The Association was founded eight years ago and has now attained a membership of 370. It has a Library, Reading-room and Gymnasium. The cost of the building with its site was $20,000, more than half of which sum has already been paid.

A VIRGINIA C. E. SOCIETY.

IT is gratifying to learn that the Christian Endeavor Societies in the vicinity of Norfolk, Va., belonging to various denominations, have formed a union for co-operation in Christian work. it is only another instance of the growth of the consciousness of Christian brotherhood between Christians of different creeds which has followed the development of the Christian Endeavor movement. The union just formed in Virginia, which is to be known as the Tidewater Union, comprises Christian Endeavor Societies from Presbyterians, Methodist Episcopal, Disciples, and other churches. The meeting at which the Union was organized was held at the Church of the Disciples, when the model constitution was adopted and the following officers elected: President, Mr. A. M. Eley, of Norfolk; Vice-President, Mr. A. F. Odenhall, of Norfolk; Secretary, Mr. Emmett Deams, of Portsmouth; Treasurer, Mr. Joseph Parks, of Buckley. It was decided to hold a general meeting on Feb. 12 in the Monumental M.E. Church, Portsmouth, and regularly afterwards at intervals of two months. The meeting of the Virginia State Union takes place at Norfolk on Jan. 27.

TWENTY-NINE new C. E. Societies were registered in the British section during the month of November.

MR. R. MCCANN, the new traveling secretary of Y. M. C. A. was warmly welcomed at a crowded meeting held in the Apollo Bunder Rooms, Bombay.

THE annual meeting of the Anglo-American Y. M. C. A. in Paris has just been held, the Rev. E. G. Thurber, D.D., occupying the chair. The twenty-fourth annual report, read by the general secretary, Mr. Herbert E. Kinsley, recorded a very successful year's work.

SINCE the meetings held in Dublin by Mr. Moody and continued by Mr. McNeill the Dublin Y.M.C.A. have increased their membership roll by about sixty, and every department of the Association is throbbing with new life. The Bible-classes have increased in numbers and power; both the spiritual and educational branches have been well sustained.

THE DARK.

OH! never fear the dark my child,
'Tis a precious gift from heaven,
And earth would be a tiresome place
Had not this boon been given.

'Tis well to close the weary eye
And see no sight around,
'Tis well to rest the tired ear
And hear no common sound.

'Tis only in the dark we win
Refreshing, perfect rest;
When nature sleeps, and human ears
By noise are not oppressed.

Think not that God is farther off
In darkness than in light,
Or that he gives the evil one
A special power by night.

Then never fear the dark, my child
For God who made the light,
In love has left 'twixt day and day
The welcome rest,—the night. —F. E. R.

Ezra, the Editor-Prophet and Poet.

His Reputed Tomb in Persia—His Writings that have lasted through the Ages.

THE first editor of whom history, either sacred or secular, contains any record is Ezra, the scribe, a Hebrew priest of the line of Zadok. Before him there had been a long line of prophets, poets, historians, and men divinely inspired, who contributed to the literature of the Hebrew nation; and in other lands men had lived and died whose genius as shown in their writings still thrills the world with admiration. But to Ezra belongs the distinction of being the first, as far as we have any record, who collated and edited any of the books of the Old Testament. He was undoubtedly the author of the books of I. and II. Chronicles, and the books of Esther and Ezra, as well as the Book of Esdras in the Apocrypha. Besides, there is internal evidence to show that he also edited the first five books of the Old Testament Scriptures, known as the Pentateuch, arranging, transcribing and adjusting, with a view to chronological sequence, the various ancient manuscripts that had been handed down among the Israelitish priesthood since the time of Moses.

Ezra or Esdras, the Scribe, was the son of Seraiah, and according to Josephus, was a high priest of the Jews who were left in Babylon. In the year 458 B.C., we find him mentioned in Hebrew records as a man of great learning, zeal and authority, enjoying the confidence of his fellow-countrymen, his companions in exile, and also of the king of Persia, Artaxerxes Longimanus. Babylon had meanwhile come under the rule of the Medes and Persians. At this time, the period of the Jewish captivity was nearing its close and the condition of the exiles was much better than it had been in the beginning of the Babylonian sojourn. Their priests and princes were honored and accorded a wide freedom among their people in Babylon, besides enjoying the privilege of friendly intercourse with their compatriots in Jerusalem, and even making occasional pilgrimages there. Ezra's father was one of the first victims of the Babylonian oppression, having been slain at Riblah, by Nebuchadnezzar's orders.

History does not explain how Ezra, the Scribe, became influential with the Persian king. He was, however, sufficiently in favor with that monarch to obtain leave, about B.C 459, to go to Jerusalem, taking with him a company of Israelites, priests, singers and carriers, nearly 2,000 in all. These returning exiles were allowed to take with them many vessels of gold and silver besides considerable coin, some of which had been contributed by the Jews in Babylon and a portion by the king and his counsellors, and these offerings were used for the adornment and service of the temple and for the purchase of sacrifices. Besides, Ezra came back to the holy city clothed with authority to appoint the magistrates and judges in Judea and with the power of life and death over all law-breakers. He was also empowered to draw upon the treasury of Artaxerxes for such moneys as he might need to conduct the ministry of the temple and the government of Judea. That the Persian king, despite the fact that his subjects worshiped strange gods, was convinced of the supremacy of the God of Israel and entertained a fear of the Divine displeasure is evident from the language of the decree, concerning Ezra which said "And whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of Heaven; for why should there be wrath against the realm of the king and his sons?"

On the return, Ezra and his company made a three days' halt on the banks of the river Ahava, where they fasted and humiliated themselves before God. Ezra declared that he was ashamed to have an army escort, because he had trusted to God for safe guidance, and had committed the treasures to be carried to twelve of the chief priests, fearless of plunderers, and believing that God would protect the pilgrims. On their return, there was great rejoicing in Jerusalem. Ezra took steps to effect a religious reformation among the Jews of Palestine, and to bring them back to the observance of the law of Moses which had long been neglected, and to compel them to discard heathen wives and idols. A great assembly of the people took place at which he made in their behalf a public confession of sin, while the multitude wept tears of penitence. These prolonged days of confession and repentance were a memorable stage in the history of Israel.

REPUTED TOMB OF THE PROPHET EZRA, ON THE TIGRIS.

Ezra, on his return, had a double evil to contend with. Those Jews who had gone into captivity, together with their descendants, had become infected with Babylonish superstitions, while those who had been left behind—and who were the very lowest class of the population—had mingled with the Philistines and the neighboring tribes to such an extent that the religion of Jehovah and the moralities were almost forgotten. Indeed, the Israelites had almost reverted to heathenism. This was the condition of affairs when Ezra summoned the assembly and produced before them the books of Moses, which he read for their instruction and which they solemnly bound themselves to follow. Two generations had passed since the captivity, and the Israel of the reunion had never heard of the books, and were strangers to their precepts. Ezra, during the long years of exile, had availed himself of all the learning and traditions of the priesthood, and of the many historical documents in their possession, to edit and compile the books composing the Pentateuch. These he now for the first time presented to the people of Jerusalem, in a form which, save for occasional revisions and alterations of an immaterial character, is preserved to this day. Some authorities have held that he was simply a copyist or transcriber; but others, with probably greater reason, regard him as not only the editor but the author of much of the writings in the five books, and as a prophet and independent legislator besides. Whatever his true position and character, it is certain that he rendered not only to Jerusalem, but to the world an incomparably valuable service in this work, since the Pentateuch, and especially that part of it which contains the Mosaic code, has been universally accepted as the basis and foundation of all civilized legislation.

After effecting the moral and spiritual reformation of his nation and delivering to them the Mosaic laws, Ezra seems to have returned to Babylon and to have ended his days there in comparative retirement. In Nehemiah's narrative of the building of the wall, Ezra is not mentioned, but when the work was near its completion, he assisted at the dedication of the wall. According to tradition, he died in Babylon at the great age of one hundred and twenty years, in the town of Zamzumu, on the river Tigris, where he was stricken by a fatal illness, while going to Susa to see Artaxerxes about the affairs of the Jews. His reputed tomb, according to Benjamin of Tudela, is at Zamzumu otherwise known as Nehar-Samorah. Another building, also said to be the tomb of Ezra, is shown on the banks of the Tigris, near a point where it joins the Euphrates. This is shown on the illustration on this page. It is a handsome building with enameled dome.

The first object of interest, to the traveler moving up by boat from Margil to Baghdad, at the point of junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, just above, on the latter river, is Korna, alleged to be the site of the Garden of Eden. Here are some scattered mat and mud hovels exceedingly dirty, trees and vegetation, a leaning minaret, and little else to attract attention. Somewhat higher up the river is a bank of gardens; and here the traveler sees realized a charming picture of Mesopotamian village life and scenery, the bright green produce of the soil forming an agreeable contrast to the brown, orange, and magenta dresses of the women moving through it.

The mosque of the Kazimain or two Kazims; the tomb of Sultana Zobiede; the madrasahs or colleges; the singular ruin of Aggarkuf; and the Bazas are usually visited by the sight-seeing traveler whose journey has led him to Baghdad; and above all he should take advantage of the occasion to ride sixty miles south to Hillah, and visit the site of ancient Babylon.

Flowers as Emblems of Innocence.

WHAT can be more innocent than flowers? They are like children undimmed by sin. They are emblems of purity and truth, a source of fresh delight to the pure and innocent. The heart that does not love flowers, or the voice of a playful child, cannot be genial. It was a beautiful conceit that invented a language of flowers, by which lovers were enabled to express the feelings that they dared not openly speak. But flowers have a voice for all—old and young, rich and poor. "To me," says Wordsworth,

> The meanest flower that blows can give
> Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

The Value of Sunshine.

SUNSHINE has both a moral and a hygienic value. "Basking in the sun," says a scientific writer, is in itself of real and considerable benefit, and it is no compliment to our human intelligence to find that cats and dogs understand that fact much better than we do. Even the "blue glass" craze had a truth underlying it, and owed such success as it achieved to the proportion of sunlight which penetrated its colored medium.

The love of sunshine is naturally one of our strongest instincts, and we should be far healthier and happier if we followed and developed it, instead of practically ignoring and repressing it. How a sparkling, sunny morning exhilarates us and makes us feel that "it's too fine a day to spend indoors," and yet how few holidays are taken for that reason. The wealth of the sunbeams is poured out lavishly around us, and we turn from it to struggle for a few pitiful handfuls of something else that is yellow and shining, but not half so likely to bring us happiness.

THE CHILDREN'S BLESSING.

CHILDREN are the salvation of the race. They purify, they elevate, they stir, they instruct, they console, they reconcile, they gladden us. They are the ozone of human life, inspiring us with hope, rousing us to wholesome sacrifice. If, in the faults which they inherit, they show us the worst of ourselves, and so move us to a salutary repentance, they also stimulate our finer qualities; they cheat us of weary care; they preach to us, not so much by their lips as by their innocence; their questions set us thinking, and to better purpose than the syllogisms of philosophers; their helplessness makes us tender; their loveliness surprises us into pure joy.

A child is a sunbeam on a winter sea, a flower in a prison garden, the music of bells over the noise of a great city, a fragrant odor in a sick-room. If any one thinks this exaggerated, I am sorry for him. It is literally true of me, and for tens of thousands who have far more right to it, say a gentle-hearted writer. These fingers tingle with a kind of happiness while I am writing about them here. My chilly friend need not have my joy if he does not believe in it, or care for it; I will not force it on him, but he shall not take mine from me.

Simple Living.

A DETERMINED return to simplicity of living on the part of well-to-do families would be of immense service as a contribution to the problems of social science. The ambition for display—tawdry enough but intensely human—has much misery laid at its door, and many sins for which it furnishes the ruling motive, remarks the Northwestern Christian Advocate. There are persons spending thousands a year who assure us that they had just as much comfort and a great deal more happiness when their scale of living was not a tithe of its present dimensions, and when their income was counted by tens instead of hundreds. It may be that times have changed, and that the manner of life could never be reduced to the simplicity of earlier times, but that is no reason why it may not be much more simple and inexpensive than it is. When it is, the temptation to extravagance, that bane of social life in all ranks and in all countries, will be reduced to a minimum; and moderate incomes, the inevitable lot of a great majority, will be ample for all reasonable wants.

Helpfulness is Happiness.

A LADY was once asked to define her ideal of happiness, says the Boston Congregationalist, whereupon she set herself to answer the question and found it a more difficult matter than she had supposed. After studying the problem in all its bearings she concluded that, upon the whole, she could stand by this definition: "My ideal of happiness is the helping of somebody up." Is not this a strong, safe, blessed working rule? It covers all circumstances and applies to the doing of the "nexte thynge," whether it be soothing of a wailing child, the sweeping of the kitchen floor, the leading of a great cause, or the lightening of a spiritual doubt or burden. Each alike may come within the range of our daily duties and give ample opportunity for helping somebody "up."

Napoleon's Mother.

SOON after Napoleon's assumption of the imperial purple he chanced to meet his mother in the gardens of St. Cloud. He was surrounded by courtiers, and half playfully held out his hand for her to kiss. "Not so, my son," she gravely replied, at the same time presenting her hand in return: "It is your duty to kiss the hand of her who gave you life."

Public attention does not seem to have been directed to Napoleon's mother until her son was proclaimed Emperor in 1804. She then received the title of Mme. Mere and an income of 10,000. was settled upon her. She frequently solicited favors of her son for others, and was happy whenever her exertions met with success.

A STORY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HOME

Written expressly for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XI.

YOUNG MACGREGOR.

"HERE'S a letter for you, Miss Maple," said Rodney, arriving at Dora's room by the method of scaling a grape-vine frame, and putting his head in at the leaf-draped window.

"Rodney," said his mother, who was sitting with Dora, "never be guilty of putting your head into a lady's-room in that unannounced fashion again. Come to the door so that you may knock."

"She don't mind," said Rodney, "she's used to it. I come up here every day, and if she don't want me in, I find the curtain down, and then I sit and whistle till she pulls it up."

"Dora," said Mrs. Cardiff, "you are far too easy with the children. When I was a child parents and teachers were much more strict. Young people stood in awe, and were not so familiar."

"This is the 'Children's Age,'" cried Rodney, "children to the front! Children rule the world now! Frick says so. She's crying!"

Mrs. Cardiff hastily looked around at Dora, referred to as "she."

"What is the matter, my dear?"

"This letter is from Plymouth, from Anne Russel. She says she received a letter from Mrs. Lane, where Eloise boards, saying that Eloise was sick. Mrs. Lane found a letter lying on Eloise's table addressed to Anne Russel, and she slipped a note in and sent it off, saying she was quite sick and some of her friends ought to be with her. So Anne went. Here is what she says: "I knew you were busy and it would be very hard for Mrs. Cardiff to spare you; and also I have much more experience than you have, if Eloise should be very sick, and need skilled nursing. I am a capital nurse. But do not be frightened, she is going to escape without a course of fever, I am sure. She has worked too hard, and then, she is not happy, her trouble sticks to her, poor child! When I sit and look at her, and think that she really loved my husband, and cannot get over his deception, I cannot understand it. I too loved him very much, I thought, but I have cut my heart entirely free from him. She cannot do that, though nothing would induce her ever to see him again. Do not worry because I am here. I had a month's vacation; our establishment closed the work-rooms for six weeks. I shall be better for a change. I had a little money laid by, plenty for the trip. I cannot tell you how good Eloise has been to me all this year: she has borne all the boys' expenses, and sent me presents beside. My aunt urged me to hurry to Eloise at once, and she would take care of the boys. I know Eloise likes to have me here. People would say that we two ought to be enemies, but we are not. No sister could be better to me and the boys than she is. This is a very lovely old town, and the weather is cool and delightful. I will write to you often. Eloise sends love. I shall stay for a month."

"That seems a queer friendship," said Mrs. Cardiff. "I see no cause for worry, Dora, Eloise will no doubt be all right. You can go to Buffalo to-morrow and bring the boys here for the rest of the vacation, if you choose to take a little trouble in looking after them. I know Mr. Cardiff would say so: he is never so happy as when he can make a free hotel of his home, or any place where he is. If Mrs. Russel thinks the boys are in your care and enjoying themselves, she will feel better. As she is looking out for your sister, you must see to her sons."

The next evening as Tom MacGregor was in the Buffalo station, waiting for the train for Niagara Falls, he saw a young woman coming down the platform with a jolly little lad, jumping and dancing on each side of her; and now she turned her fair, smiling face to one, and now to the other, sharing their joy.

This picture of woman and child, is the picture which has won the heart of the world in all ages. In it meet all sweet harmonious thoughts, all innocent graces. Tom MacGregor looked upon the picture, and for him the hour of love struck. He had thought Dora most sweet and fair ever since she came into John Cardiff's house. Always the music of her voice and the graces of her manner, had grown upon him, and now, when he watched her coming along the platform with the little lads, his heart filled with love toward her, and she seemed the one woman in all the world to him, and he felt as if earth must needs prove a paradise, if he could walk through it, hand in hand with her.

He hurried toward her, extending his hands: Dora gave him her hand, not as enthusiastically as she might to her ideal of a man—John Cardiff—but cordially as to one of the family that in ministering to her sorrows had become hers.

MacGregor was a joyous, generous, warm-hearted young fellow, the clasp of his big hand was always like a vise. Dora detected nothing new as he held her gloved fingers firmly and lingeringly, while he demanded when she had come to Buffalo, and, took possession of her shawl strap; and poured forth his delight at meeting her.

"Much happens in three days," cried Dora. "Mrs. Cardiff sent me after the Russel boys, as their mother has gone to stay with my sister Eloise, who is not well."

Tom had been gone three days! She remembered it! Had she missed him? Had she counted the days? O joy! A mist came over his eyes as he looked at her, so fair, so sweet, so frank and gracious. Three days! surely she had missed him!

But no. There was not a man in the world whom Dora would have really missed. John Cardiff perhaps most of any, for he seemed as a tower of strength and shelter in all doubt and disaster. Uncle Rupert and Richard also, she cared for, but not so much as for Margaret and Aunt Lois.

Thus it happened that this party of four went to the Falls, and then drove over to Hotel Marot, in all the beauty of the summer evening. Dora very gleeful and enjoying thoroughly the company of the happy boys, and Tom MacGregor fascinated by Dora, and taking to his heart the notion that some of her gay freedom and brightness might be due to pleasure in his society. From that day there was a new light in Tom MacGregor's eyes, as he looked at Dora. As for Dora she did not see the light, she scarcely ever looked into Tom MacGregor's eyes, they were not worth looking into, in her present mood in which all men were bearing the sins of one.

Dora was in danger of seeing much of Tom, and taking carelessly a great many attentions. As for the elders, Margaret, Aunt Lois, Mrs. Cardiff, had each a partner in life to wait upon her, and MacGregor took his place by Dora, while Frick was general utility man for the whole party. Dora fell into the habit of taking little services from Tom—even of expecting them.

One moonlight evening early in August, John Cardiff and his wife were sitting on the porch of Hotel Marot. Near at hand, just across the lane, was a field of ripe wheat, ready for cutting, and shining under the moonlight like a silver sea, rippling in the breeze. On the other hand, the orchard grass lay dark under the shadows, and there myriads of fire-flies were keeping up a continuous flashing and splendor, while here and there, zig-zagging among the mimic fire-works went the white-clad forms of Philippa and Rodney, catching the fire-flies in wide mouthed-bottles, in order to have an illumination in their rooms, when they were sent to bed. Up and down the lawn moved Richard Cardiff and Margaret side by side, keeping even pace, her hand upon his shoulder.

"There goes," said John Cardiff to his wife, "to my mind a model couple. Like-minded and growing more and more like—all their interests one. Theirs is the loftiest and ripest form of human friendship—that which is love in its truest sense. Distance, disaster, sickness, death, would only deepen a love like theirs. Such a pattern of married life is a lesson of incalculable value to the young men, MacGregor and Frick, and to our children."

"Our children are too young for lessons of that kind. But there is another couple I wish you to observe. The girl is sitting on that garden-chair. The young man is perched on the gate-post."

"Dora and Tom? Yes. Dora has until fifteen minutes ago, been catching fire-flies with Philippa."

"And these fifteen minutes, and others like them, Mr. Cardiff, are drifting Tom into a fool's paradise. Tom is falling or has fallen, in love with Dora."

"I'm sure you are mistaken, my dear. She is married."

"The little fact of a husband, whom he has never seen, and who is never mentioned has passed out of his mind. And I am not mistaken. I have seen all Tom's soul in his eyes of late when he looked at Dora. What are you going to do about it?"

"Whether you are right or mistaken, my dear, there will be no harm in warning Tom. But here! When her husband came with her, a little over two years ago!"

"Two years is an eternity to a young man, and when he sees fit to fall in love, he does not consider."

"But Dora, has she fallen in love with Tom?"

"Dora thinks she hates men, and that nothing is more odious than marriage. Therefore Dora is just in the state of fancied security, where she may drift into love without knowing it."

"My dear, you are very astute."

"I have need to be, Mr. Cardiff, when you are so very reckless in your talk before young people. Rodney should be sent to bed."

"I think I'll be safe now, by calling both Philippa and Dora here to discuss what they have read this week."

"They have read Sir Walter Scott: his 'Ivanhoe,' 'The Monestery,' and 'The Antiquary,' and 'St. Ronan's Well.' You told them to read Scott, if you remember. I think girls of Philippa's age should read nothing about love."

"Then they'll think the more about it; and Dora is a safe companion in reading love stories; She has been behind the scenes. Rod! Let us have the pleasure of wishing you good night, and happy dreams. Philippa! Come here with Miss Maple, and make a report on your week's reading. Tell me what you think of Sir Walter."

"The first thing that I think, said Philippa, leaning on her father's shoulder, "is that he is very foolish to represent women or girls as falling sick of love, and pining away with broken hearts. Dora says that when women have plenty to do, and plenty of study and solid things to think of, they don't fall ill over love, and that such stories fitted better in ages when women did nothing but embroider and sing love songs. Now when they have to study mathematics, and natural science, and very often earn their own living, they need be no more silly over love affairs, than men are."

"It is wrong, in my view, for a child of your age to be speaking about love," said Mrs. Cardiff, indignantly.

"But one cannot help forming opinions about everything," said Philippa.

"And what is needed, is to have the opinions sound," said the Chief, "and they are most likely to be sound if they are brought forth to be examined and assisted by maturer judgments. As for love, my dear, she cannot help thinking of it. Everyone in this world falls in love, more or less. It is human fate. Love desires the highest good of its object: it is reverent and clean: love grapples with selfishness and weakness, and growing strong in the contest, stands upright with these beneath its feet. It is time we made an end of cherishing weakness, idleness, viciousness, and calling the product love. Philippa, never be deceived into believing the false, the true."

"We are better off with neither false nor true," cried Dora.

"The plot, the situations were splendid—they were so exciting, and we sat and read, until the tower over there, seemed some great frowning castle, and the hotel here a monastery, or palace; and we listened for the crash of arms, and felt shivers of terror, and peeped out into the roadway expecting to see whole files of cavaliers, and doughty knights riding lance at rest, and in the sunshine helmets and halberds and pennons flashing and blazing."

"And instead, we only saw the children playing at soldiers; Peggy and Betty chasing doomed chickens; the grocer's-wagon rolling up the lane, and such every-day young men as Mr. Frick and Mr. MacGregor, coming in hungry for roast beef and peach pie for dinner," cried Dora merrily.

"Dear me, I wish Frick and I were not kept busy all day, we could be introduced to fairy land's miraculous show, by means of Scott's novels! We should feel as our parents did, when the world waited for a new production of the Wizzard of the North, and a Romance by him was the event of the day," said Tom.

"We don't want any company in our reading, do we Dora!" cried Philippa. "It is nicer by ourselves, isn't it?"

"Indeed it is," said Dora heartily.

"What is so selfish as happiness?" sighed Tom.

"Sorrow," said John Cardiff, "that is more selfish still."

The next morning John Cardiff and Tom MacGregor were hard at work on certain maps and calculations. Finally, but for them the office was empty. John Cardiff dropped a pair of dividers. "See here, Tom; honor bright, are you falling in love with the children's governess?"

Tom flushed—started, recovered himself.

"I think she is the nicest girl I ever saw in my life!"

"See here, my lad; don't forget that her niceness can make no possible difference to you. She is a married woman!"

"Oh Mr. Cardiff! You don't think of holding her to that foolish, unfortunate mistake of so long ago?"

"I hold her, boy? What are you talking about! Common law holds her, as well as God's law. She was regularly married. I have her marriage certificate among my papers."

"Who knows but he may have been married to two or three other women, and her marriage is as void as her sister's!"

"Who knows that it is so? As far as she has any information she is a lawful wife, and as far out of your reach as any other married woman."

"But Mr. Cardiff, what are you talking of? Here is a burglar, a man who lives by swindling, who marries her to help on a robbery, and expects to train a lovely innocent girl to be a sort of stool-pigeon or decoy for him, gaining for him in communities where he wishes to perpetrate crimes, a standing and confidence that would be denied to him personally. Would you force a girl to live with such a monster?"

"Certainly not. But being, unfortunately, married to him, she cannot marry another man. The validity of the marriage does not depend on either his or her character."

"But Mr. Cardiff she has only to bring her case into any court, to get a decree of divorce."

"No doubt that is true. But if she sues for a divorce because she wants to marry someone else, the real ground of the divorce is not the man's character, but a change in her own affections."

"She ought to get free of him, any way," cried Tom, "and then be free to love and marry when the right man worthy of her appeared."

"The better way is for her to think no more of marriage, but honorably and patiently bear the burden she has imposed upon herself, by her own folly."

"Oh, Mr. Cardiff! That is so cruel."

"Cruel? possibly. But just—and if Draconian justice such as this, were adhered to, marriage would be a more sacred, better respected, more enduring tie than it is now. And the greater danger and disgrace of numerous divorces would be done away. I think Tom, the laxness with which the marriage bond is regarded, is one of the greatest dangers of the present age. It will bring in upon us a demoralization of individuals, of the home, of society, which will assure the destruction of the State. The process may be a long one, but if it continues, it will be a sad one."

"You seem to forget that if Miss Maple and others, situated as she is, make this sacrifice of maintaining as sacred such a heavy boudage, they may sacrifice others with them, others who can but love them for their lovableness. I love Dora—am I to be sacrificed because she married that scoundrel?"

"Yes, you are Tom; most assuredly—and I feel less pity for you, because you knew all the time that she was married, and yet have allowed yourself to trade on the notion that you could persuade her to get a divorce. If you had fallen in love with her, believing her to be single, I should have felt very much pity for you, and taken myself to task for allowing her to be called 'Miss Maple.' Now you are to blame—as there's a divinity which doth hedge a king—so there is an inviolable sacredness, setting apart a married woman from being fallen in love with by any man—but one."

"At least," said Tom, "seven years abandonment by that man will free her, and I can serve seven years for her, as Jacob did for Rachael."

"And have an Enoch Arden case later, with the kind of Arden who walks in upon you and bawls out his claims, eh?"

Subscriber, New York. Should a person who does not believe in a God and who thinks the Bible a fable, be allowed to hold a position as Notary Public?

He should not be allowed to hold such an office, or any office connected with the administering of judicial oaths, since he is morally disqualified; but unfortunately the law regulating such matters takes no cognizance of religious belief or disbelief.

Will you have the kindness to print in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the poem of Rowland Hill, one of the verses of which is the following:

But this I do find,
We two are so joined,
He'll not be in glory and leave me behind."

Have noticed the reply of A. Humphreys, Wooster, O., to the question whether there were recorded other cases of blood-sweating than that of the Saviour. He pointed us to a disease known as ecchyrmoses. But he did not mention what to me is of inte. est—that our greatest and latest medical authors such as Gunn, Osler and others, assert that in extreme cases of snake bite, the patient sweats drops of blood. Osler says, "The virus of snakes produces with great rap dity extravasation of blood." These facts lead us back in thought to the advent of sin into the world which was brought to Eve in the garden of Eden by a serpent. To the children of Israel the serpent was an emblem of sin.

Mrs. Fraser, Forestville, Cal. Who was Melchisedec and what are we to understand about him?

He was the King of Salem and Priest of the Most High, who went to meet Abraham, on his return from battle. He was a type of the regal high-priesthood to which the Messiah should belong. Even Abraham paid tithes to him. The Jews alleged that this regal priest was Shem, the most pious of Noah's sons. Theological writers have indulged in many conjectures concerning his identity, some declaring him an angel. He was probably a descendant of Noah, eminent for holiness and justice and therefore capable of discharging both the priestly and kingly functions (characters sometimes united in the remote ages,) and Abraham took this opportunity of testifying his gratitude to God in the manner then common, by offering a tenth of the spoil he had taken from Chedorlaomer and his allies.

MR MOODY'S OFFER.

The Arrangements Mr. Moody has Made to Enlarge the Facilities of the Women's Training School.

MANY inquiries have reached this journal in reference to the Women's Training School, established by Mr. D. L. Moody at Northfield, a full description of which we published recently. The following statement which we have just received from the Institute will give all the information needed and its publication will gladden the hearts of many who are seeing just the help in Christian work that this school is designed to afford:

Ths term just closing is the most successful and encouraging in the history of the school. This cheering fact has moved Mr. Moody to urge an enlargement of the school in order to extend its benefits and blessings to greater numbers of students. He has decided to open more rooms for new applicants, without change of term, the regular rates per term of three months being fifty dollars, which includes comfortable room, board and tuition. He has also concluded to continue his offer to Christian Endeavor Societies, to admit students of their selection, to the number of twenty-five, at the reduced rate of thirty-five dollars each per term.

In order to extend still further the opportunities of the school and increase the number of trained workers, Mr. Moody now announces that a friend has offered to give ten free scholarships for the use of worthy applicants for the next term of school.

The course of instruction given in the Training School has been found to meet the requirements of Christian women who aspire to greater usefulness in the service of Christ. They have found that increased knowledge of the Bible and methods of Christian work, reinforced by practical experience and acquired skill in dress-making, cooking and household science, will enable them to get nearer the people whose welfare they seek, by loving exhibition of practical Christianity, and will greatly increase their power of service. Ladies who are interested in Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor societies, home missions, or any and every department of church work or home service, and who desire to do more and better work for the Master, will find this a great opportunity to join the company of earnest Christian ladies in the Northfield Training School and to enjoy the religious and social privileges of this favored place.

Application by letter should be made to Miss Lilly L. Sherman, the Principal at East Northfield, Mass.

"MY JESUS."

AN evangelist who was conducting a prayer-meeting asked the congregation to repeat after him one word, just one word. All listened to hear what the one word should be, when, in the solemn moment of deep quiet, the brother said, "Jesus." From all over the house came the responses, "Jesus." "And now," he added, "I would have you say after me two words." All listened as he said, solemnly and reverently, "My Jesus," with a stress on the monosyllable my. Many responses were heard, but not so many as before. Not a few present could say, "My Jesus," but some could not.

The Conducting of Pleasure Tours.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, through its personally-conducted tourist system, has gained an enviable reputation in the conducting of its pleasure tours, inasmuch as they send out with each individual tour an experienced tourist agent and chaperon, whose sole duty is to cater to the wants and pleasure of all in their charge. All destinations of the tours are selected with the view of giving to the tourists the most delightful territory for recreation, pleasure and sight-seeing. The rates quoted for each tour are in accordance with that liberality for which this enterprising company is noted. There will be a series of five tours to Washington, D. C., during the winter and spring of 1893, dates for which have been fixed as follows: January 19th, February 9th, March 23d, April 13th, May 4th and 25th. In addition to the above-mentioned tours the company has arranged a series of five to the famous winter resort, Florida, leaving New York and Philadelphia January 31st, February 14th and 28th, March 14th and 28th, 1893. The first four tours allow a stay of two whole weeks in the Flowery State. The rate quoted from New York, $50, and from Philadelphia, $48; covers transportation, Pullman berth and meals en route on special train in both directions for first four tours, while tickets for the fifth tour are good to return by regular trains until May 30th, 1893, but do not cover Pullman charges or meals north-bound.

For those desiring a prolonged tour of pleasure and sight-seeing no better trip is afforded than one of the Pacific Coast tours arranged by this company, three of which will be run from New York and Philadelphia during the year 1893, departing on the following dates: February 8th, March 2d, and March 29th. The rate will cover transportation in a palace vestibuled train in both directions, meals en route, carriage drives, and side trips to prominent points of interest in California. For information regarding any of the tours, or for detailed itineraries, application should be made to the Tourist Agent, Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 849 Broadway, New York, or 233 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

Among the latter was a lady advanced in years who had never given her heart to the Saviour, and she had not the happy assurance that she possessed Christ. She rose from her seat, and, looking at the leader of the meeting said: "Oh, sir, pray for me. I could say 'Jesus,' but I cannot say 'My Jesus.'" The leader prayed for her, and as the prayer was offered she cast herself as a sinner upon the all-sufficient Saviour, and rose from her knees rejoicing in Christ as her Saviour.

THE OPEN GATES.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

ALONE in the Silent City,
Alone with the quiet dead;
Alone with the green graves underneath,
And the blue sky over head;

I stood of an Autumn evening,
And looked to heaven afar;
When in fancy I saw, with the setting sun,
The heavenly gates ajar.

I watched the beautiful vision,
And it made my sight grow dim,
As I thought of the dreary journey,
Before I could enter in.

But we never should grow weary
As we our lives pursue;
For the end is straight before us,
With the beautiful gates in view.

Then, when your feet feel weary,
You can do as I have done,
And in fancy see the vision
With the setting of the sun.

NO two hearts are alike or need the same thing. I have difficulties and trials that never touch you, and you perhaps have sorrows that never come into my experience. But there are the outstretched wings that shall fall on every sorrow and difficulty and distress that ever yet came into a human heart. It is not a shadow we want to-day, but a person, a real living Christ, and he says, "Take." Do not look for an abstract blessing, and say, I wish I had what somebody else had, but simply take Christ. He covers all the need of your soul, and metes out to you in proportion as you need a blessing.

You may long and long for Jesus till you are gray, or till your eyes close in death for an experience you wish you had. You may say, I want a baptism of the Holy Ghost that shall lift me out of all these troubles, and set me so firmly upon a rock that I shall be unmoved. And yet your eyes may close in death before you get it unless you take. He offers as freely as the sun's rays rest upon the earth today the fullness of his love; you are not to purchase it; it is without money and without price; you are simply to take. He says, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek."

The great difficulty is, people do not appropriate what God gives to them. It is exactly as when a father leaves his money in his will to his children. You have only to take it. You say that your father has left you so many thousands of dollars, but you are as poor as ever. Why? Because you do not take what he has given to you. We are here as God's dear children, washed in his precious blood, knowing what it means, I trust, to be cleansed, and yet some of you are waiting for a definiteness of experience you have never yet touched. You say, "I have given all to God, made that surrender, and I have tried and tried to have this experience." I say, cease trying; do not live upon that surrender, but simply take what you need, that is the Lord Jesus Christ to be an indwelling power in your very being. And you, having the Christ-life within, shall step out on these promises, full and rich as they are, and know what it is to be rich, to take of the things of God, and hide them in your own heart. The Spirit of God will make you rich as he reveals to you the hidden mysteries of God, and you become what you ought to be, a grand man or woman for God.

Take it by faith, for it is the only way we receive anything from the Lord. "What things ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Just believe now; give yourselves to him, a complete surrender. Believe that God gives himself to you, and just appropriate the Holy Ghost, the Comforter; then you will know what power is. It is the fire under the boiler; it is the very life that makes a man to think and live altogether for God and to work for God.

THE PRESS AND THE FAITH.†

In considering the attitude of the press toward the faith, we are not without encouragement. There never was a time when ecclesiastical news occupied more space in the public press than it does at present. Its value has been discerned, and even intelligence about foreign missions seems to find a ready market. The tone has changed as well as the substance. Where once the evangelistic effort at home or abroad would have been dismissed with a covert sneer, it is now discussed with sympathy and intelligence. In regard to foreign missions the change is most conspicuous. Despite some serious assaults their methods and results are to-day chronicled and discussed in a tone for which we shall in vain explore the newspaper file of twenty years ago. There is good reason to believe that both in London and the country, the papers growing in power and popularity are the papers which see the value of satisfying popular interest in Christian faith and work. So far, then, it is possible to view the position and tone of the newspaper press with great thankfulness to God. But there are some important qualifications to make. The average newspaper, morning or evening, is still far from what the devout Christian would wish it to be. He must take exception to much of its news and to some of its comments. In two particulars its news is contrary to good morals. Without exception it supports and feeds the twin vices of betting and gambling. Horse-racing, save as a vehicle for betting, is practically non-existent; and the entire space devoted to the record of racing and the discussion of coming events is so much food for a passion which Christian teachers, with rare exceptions, unite in denouncing. There are papers in which on some days scarcely less than a sixth of the text is devoted to sport allied with betting. Occasionally the advertising columns, even of some otherwise respectable journals, are opened to the promises and wiles of the advertising bookmaker and the racing tout. It is impossible that the Christian churches, whilst they unite in condemning betting and gambling, should view this with unconcern.

FROM HEATHENISM TO FAITH.

Gospel Progress among a Heathen Tribe in Western Africa.

BISHOP FERGUSON of Cape Palmas, whose portrait appeared in this journal on June 1, sends to the Spirit of Missions an interesting story of the gradual reclamation of the people around Hoffman Station from heathenism under the labors of Rev. H. C. Merriam and a band of native teachers. "There are five heathen villages," he says, "almost contiguous and the gospel-seed has been sown in all those villages. Although the returns have not seemed commensurate with the labor spent, still they have been a sufficient encouragement for us to press on. The darkness of heathenism has not been able to withstand the light of Christianity and civilization. The well-known and heart-rending trial by the 'sassawood' ordeal has been abolished by this tribe through Christian influence. Last year we succeeded in getting them to give up the old custom of having 'doctors' (demon-men) to 'make medicine' (fetich) to insure the success of their rice-farms; and instead thereof to join us in asking God's blessing on their work. As soon as they consented to this, we insisted that to secure the blessing sought, they should not work on the Lord's Day. It was not without considerable hesitation and a sharp contention that they yielded this point also. A law was made by themselves compelling all to observe Sunday. They found that they lost nothing by it, but rather, through the blessing of God, gained an abundant harvest. A day of public thanksgiving was observed after all had gathered in their crop. But a trying time soon came when a neighboring tribe waged war against them. Surely they must now have the best 'doctors' to 'make medicine' that they may succeed. Again we urged the claims of Christianity, and showed that God could do for them what no doctors in the world had the power to do. They took our advice and gave the demon-men no employment. But we must needs follow up our victory, and so advanced a step further. In a small enclosure in the house of the 'bodio' (high priest)—regarded a most sacred spot—was kept the fetich of the tribe. They were urged to give them up also and thus come out wholly on the Lord's side. Thank God, they not only yielded that point but were further induced to repeal their restrictive laws with regard to the high priest and his wife. The gree-grees that were enshrined in the bodio's house have been sent to me, and I am keeping them as trophies of vietory.

"It was proposed to them that they should raise money among themselves by a general contribution to purchase a large Bible for the tribe to take the place of the gree-grees. To my surprise (not that they consented to having the book; bul that they should agree to pay for it themselves, everything appertaining to the Gospel having been a free gift heretofore), they adopted the proposal, and I was recently summoned to Bigtown to meet the king and chiefs, in order to receive the collection which they had made. The king said the amount was not as much as he wished, for the reason that a voluntary contribution for such an object was preferred to an obligatory one. He then delivered to me $9.64 in silver coin, with the request that I would order such a Bible as I deemed suitable for the purpose. Although this change alone would be sufficient to cause the friends and supporters of the African Mission to rejoice and praise God, there is still further eneouragement. The chiefs requested us to build a chapel in their village (Bigtown), and for the purpose gave us a spot right in front of the high priest's house and only a few yards from it, where sacrifices had been regularly offered to the devil. Here the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving is henceforth to be offered to the true and living God."

FIRST DAYS IN COREA.

THE early days of a missionary's experience of life in the field of his labors are always a time of interest, as he sees for the first time the city and people among whom he is to work. This is especially so in a land like Corea which presents so marked a contrast to our own country in almost every characteristic. It is therefore interesting to read in a letter from Seoul to the Presbyterian Board the first impressions of the Rev. S. F. Moore who had just arrived there when he wrote. He says: "The heathenism of Korea is more unadulterated, the climate more invigorating, than we had expected. Tuesday noon, with the in-rolling tide, we steamed up the river Han. After an hour's tramp through the suburban streets (street is hardly the word, as in some of them one can stand in the centre and touch the wall on either side with the elbows) we came to the gate. The gates close at eight o'clock and the penalty for opening them to a tardy stranger is decapitation. A small hole at the bottom allows the dogs (privileged characters in Korea) to come and go at all hours. Baby Brown was the only one of our party small enough and humble enough to enter through the dog hole. The rest of us, with the aid of a rope let down from above, scaled the twenty foot wall without much difficulty, as there are many crevices which answer for foot holds. The six days of waiting in Yokohama were a sort of introduction to Orientialism. We spent one day at Kamakura where we saw the great Dai Butsu—one of the largest images of Buddha in the world, ninety-seven feet in circumference. The image, like Buddhism, is hollow, and we went inside and climbed up to the top of the great bronze casting. We saw a pilgrim worshipping there, and in the temple at Tokio we saw the people throw their money into the box, clap their hands to attract the gods attention and then kneel muttering prayers, a million heathen in that one city alone, and a handful of missionaries! Truly the harvest is great and the laborers are few!"

AN AMERICAN WITCH.

A GENTLEMAN who has traveled on foot over many States, says that he was astonished during a journey in Lancaster county, N.Y., three years ago, to find in a lonely hut in the woods a woman who claimed to be a witch. What was more remarkable was that the people for miles around believed in her powers. Asking about her of his host for the night, the man said: "She will, for a fee, give an applicant a charm to ward off lightning from his buildings, confound his enemies by bewitching them, making their wells run dry, or bringing any dire punishment upon them that the applicant will pay for. She will undertake the job of stunting the growth of a baby, destroying a rival's beauty, separating man and wife, or settling lovers' quarrels. Husbands take their wives, fathers their children, and young men their sweethearts to her for treatment for all ills and the removal of evil spells, and to obtain charms that will be potent in love and business.

If a child is deformed, demented, blind, tongue-tied, or naturally afflicted in any way, it is taken to her at once. In her healing operations she uses no medicines, but depends upon her 'charms,' which consist of breathing on the afflicted parts, waving the hand over them, accompanied by a few muttered words, the purport of which no one understands. The condition without which she will not consent to perform an operation on an applicant is explicit faith in and reverence for the operator." When that condition is complied with results follow which science cannot explain. It is evident, however, that the people are not cured by the woman but by their own faith, which would have cured them just as certainly if it had been exercised in a piece of wood or an image of stone or a bottle of Lourdes water. The sad fact is that men are willing to believe even to credulity, yet they will not believe on him who can give salvation for soul and body. (Mark 11: 22–24.)

THE POETS,

Whittier, Tennyson, Longfellow, Bryant, Emerson.

"A Yard of Chrysanthemums" is the richest and most artistic picture ever produced. It is a reproduction in twelve colors of a water color painting. Its size is 8x36 inches. The pictures of the five poets named are about 6x8 inches in size, each a separate and independent picture, highly artistic, and suitable for framing. All these pictures are made by us, and nothing similar can be purchased at any price. You get in each a select and rare picture, yet we send them FREE OF ANY CHARGE to introduce

The Home-Maker Magazine

TO NEW READERS.

THE HOME-MAKER is the ordinary magazine size, and bound in the regular magazine way. The departments of THE HOME-MAKER are Literary, Decorative Home Art, Topics of the Time, Notes of various Interest, Correspondence and Queries, The Domestic Club, etc., etc.

Among our subscribers are such people as Mrs Potter Palmer, Ex-U. S. President R. B. Hayes, Judge Noah Davis, Mrs. Charlotte Emerson Brown and Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher—all paid subscribers.

We guarantee THE HOME-MAKER MAGAZINE to rank with the leading $3.00 and $4.00 publications in literary merit and every respect.

Why should monthly magazines exact the same price now they did twenty years ago? Yet some of the old-fashioned publications are doing this. The daily newspapers reduced their prices long ago. We are demonstrating that a high-class magazine can be produced successfully at $2.00 a year—20 cents a copy—and to introduce this five year old magazine to new readers, we are going to give away all the above pictures, free of charge to every person.

If you look at a dozen common lamp-chimneys, and then at Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass," you will see the differences—all but one—they break from heat; these don't; you can't see that.

Common glass is misty, milky, dusty; you can't see through it; Macbeth's is clear.

Tough, clear glass is worth fine work; and a perfect chimney of fine tough glass is worth a hundred such as you hear, pop, clash on the least provocation.

A LETTER From the most eloquent Preacher, the Late

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon

That will be Read with Great Interest by all who are at Death's Door.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE:—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication: but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

(Rev.) C. H. SPURGEON,

Missionary Easton Writes of his Twenty-Years' Experience in Persia and the Caucasus — Braving Imprisonment and Danger for the Truth—How the Seed has Borne Fruit—His Native Helpers and their Heroic Efforts to Spread the Gospel.

KASHA MOSHY.
(Dr. Easton's Native Helper.)

IN 1870, Persia as a mission field was transferred from the American Board to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Up to that year, the work had been restricted to Oroomiah, and to the Nestorians dwelling in that part of Persia; but thereafter came a new departure and the mission to the Nestorians became the mission to Persia. In 1872, the station at Teheran was occupied by the Rev. James Bassett, and in 1873, I began missionary work at Tabriz. Previous to this, however, in 1869, the Church Missionary Society had commenced work at Ispahan, in the very centre of Persia. Since that time two other stations have been established, at Hamadan and Salmas, the last named being between Tabriz and Oroomiah.

In beginning the work in Tabriz, I did so on the basis of the Lord's commission—the Gospel to be preached to every creature, teaching to observe all things whatsoever Christ had commanded. Tabriz is the largest commercial city in Persia, with 150,000 population. The people are almost entirely Mohammedan, but of Turkish race, although those Turks are in their customs and manners. But, although one in race, they are entirely opposed to Turkey and the Turcomans in religion—being Shiahs and not Sunnis. Between these two sects there is a greater difference than between Protestants and Catholics. In addition to the Turkish-speaking people, there are in Tabriz from 2500 to 3000 Armenians belonging to the old Armenian Church, and also a very small official European element—the latter probably aggregating not over a hundred persons altogether. While all, except the Europeans, are called Mohammedans, we may say they represent really two religions rather than one. Turkish Mohammedanism may be called, with truth, a bastard Judaism, or Judaism with the Messianic element omitted, and yet with all the local elements that characterize that religion. Like the Jews, the Turkish Mohammedans have a special temple of their own. On the other hand, Persian Mohammedanism may be called a mongrel Christianity, but having a universal element, with a doctrine of the atonement, regeneration, etc., and declaring itself to be the only absolute religion, of which all others are but a mere passing phase. The Persians are divided into numerous sects, and on this account there is much more religious liberty among them than in Turkey. In January, 1874, I received a letter inviting me to call at the house of a leader of one of the sects. I went there, thinking to make merely a friendly call, and found that he had gathered together a number of his people. He proposed a discussion on the points at issue between Christians and Mohammedans. On that and the two following Fridays, discussions were held in different parts of the city, each week at a different house, and each meeting lasting six or seven hours. The government heard of the matter through private parties, and I was informed that they intended to arrest those men who came to the meetings. About two weeks later a descent was made on our Sabbath service and through information obtained from some of them, a leader of this sect and some of his friends were brought before the Chief mujtehid. The leader was so terribly beaten that for six months he was unable to stand, and he ultimately Died of his Injuries.

Others were thrown into prison, and it was rumored that they would be kept there until executed; but through friends at the British Embassy in Teheran, an order was sent commanding that these men be set free and directing that thereafter no person should have anything to do with the missionary. For three months no one dared to recognize me, even in the bazaars. After that, the people no longer came to the meetings as formerly, for fear of arrest; but they came freely to make calls. For a while, I had all I could do to entertain the callers. This, I may say, has been the history of the Tabriz mission from that time on. There are times when the Sabbath and other congregations are thronged and there are other times when, from intimidation and other causes, very few attend public services. In 1877, the congregation was perhaps from 120 to 130 of whom 80 or 90 were Moslems. The government seized eighteen of the worshippers, put them in prison for a time, and fined them and thus again broke up the services. In 1889 the attempt was made not merely to forbid men from coming to the services but even from calling at the missionary's house In order to meet this, I adopted a new line of tactics. Taking out of their own religious books those things which were in correspondence with the Scriptures and separating them from the errors with which they are connected in their books, I composed a series of tracts with the idea of showing that even, according to their own religious standards, they were condemned before God, in that they did not that which they themselves knew they ought to do. I hoped in this way the law would be the schoolmaster to lead them to Christ.

REV. P. Z. EASTON.

The Persians, like the Athenians of old, are exceedingly curious with regard to anything new, and on this occasion, just as on the occasion of the first opening of the services, there was at the start a great rush to get these tracts, and the whole city was full of rumors regarding them. For a time they were the common topic of conversation, from the palace of the prince to the hut of the poorest inhabitant. Several thousands were circulated, some being sent to distant parts of the country, people begging for themselves and for relatives, among whom they were to be distributors.

In addition to the tracts, the work of preaching, and calling and receiving calls, another line of work is among the Bazaars, where there were opportunities of meeting the people in little groups, and speaking to them. At the beginning of the mission in Tabriz, the missionaries did not venture to take up this bazaar work at all, and it was done by native helpers. Of late years, and especially in connection with the tracts, I have done a great deal of work in the bazaars personally. Still another class of Gospel work is the itinerancy in the villages. Here, at first, the missionary met with a warm reception in almost every case, as long as the work was new and comparatively unknown. A large crowd gathered around me everywhere, many being drawn by the hope of receiving help in their sicknesses, the idea being that every Frangi must be a physician. In this way much has been done to sow the seed of the Gospel broadcast amongst the people. Another class of work to which the missionaries of the Presbyterian Board have devoted a great deal of attention of late years is school teaching Schools for boys and girls and theological students have been established in Tabriz and much care has been devoted to this field of labor. As regards converts from among the Mohammedans there have been a considerable number, but of these few have proved faithful. It is to be borne in mind, however, that according to Persian law, anyone turning from Mohammedanism is to be put to death. Although that sentence has never been put in execution, yet persecution, loss of property and imprisonment have followed in a number of cases among those who professed Christianity. While the great bulk of the professed converts have turned out false, there have been a few cases in which has been given for Christ. In 1888, I was living with my family outside the city walls. A man came to me from a village thirty miles south, who, through reading the Scriptures, had been led to Christ. This man was with me as a gardener about a year and a half. He was a man of no special ability, but wonderfully zealous. He begged that I would give him daily two hours from his work and this time he employed in going about in the bazaars and even in the courtyards of the mosques, preaching Christ. After a year and a half he was arrested and imprisoned for a night, and although he was delivered from the prison, yet I found it quite impossible to continue him in employment and therefore allowed him to return to his family in the village. Thence he was driven out, after about ten months, and returned to me and was with me about a week when the English Consul advised me that it was best not to keep him any longer. I sent him to another part of the country; but he was not permitted to live even there, and he finally made his way to Russia, where he has been for the last three years, and there, as elsewhere, gives brave testimony to Christ as his Saviour, by word of mouth, and by a pure and holy life.

To-day imprisoned at Tabriz, is a Moslem convert confined who has dared all things for the sake of Jesus. He may yet be called upon to give up his life for the faith. His name is Meerza Ibrahim.

Such cases encourage us and give the hope that it may not be long before many such can be found. They also have a great influence upon the people, who, up to this time commonly believed that those who professed to be Christians were merely seeking their temporal welfare, but whose mouths are now shut in view of the fact that men are willing to sacrifice everything for the sake of the Christian faith. From 1874 to 1885 I did Missionary Work in Russia.

In 1875, I made my first visit to Tiflis, the capital of the Caucasus. Almost as soon as I had crossed the border, I found very important differences between the Persian and Caucasian Mussulmans. The former are always eager to discuss religious subjects, but when it comes to paying out money to buy religious books, it is very hard work to induce them to make even a small outlay. On the other hand, the Russian Mohammedans are eager to purchase books, not from any spiritual motive, but in order to advance themselves in reading.

On the way to Tiflis, I stopped over for a Sabbath at Erivan, at the foot of Mount Ararat. Here I had a most instructive experience with some evangelical Armenians. We sat in the post-house on the Sabbath, and I was astonished to see several of the men come into my

THE CIRCLE OF THE EARTH.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning at Atlanta, Ga. Text: Isaiah 40: 22: "It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth."

WHILE yet people thought that the world was flat, and thousands of years before they found out that it was round, Isaiah, in my text, intimated the shape of it, God sitting upon the circle of the earth. The most beautiful figure in all geometry is the circle. God made the universe on the plan of a circle. There are in the natural world straight lines, angles, parallelograms, diagonals, quadrangles; but these evidently are not God's favorites. Almost everywhere, where you will find him geometrizing, you find the circle dominant, and if not the circle, then the curve, which is a circle that died young! If it had lived long enough, it would have been a full orb, a periphery. An ellipse is only a circle pressed a little too hard at the sides. Giants' Causeway in Ireland shows what God thinks of mathematics. There are over thirty-five thousand columns of rocks—octagonal, hexagonal, pentagonal. These rocks seem to have been made by rule and by compass. Every artist has his moulding-room, where he may make fifty shapes; but he chooses one shape as preferable to all others. I will not say that the Giants' Causeway was the world's moulding room, but I do say, out of a great many figures, God seems to have selected the circle as the best. "It is he that sitteth on the circle of the earth." The stars in a circle, the moon in a circle, the sun in a circle, the universe in a circle, the throne of God the centre of that circle.

When men build churches, they ought to imitate the idea of the Great Architect, and put the audience in a circle, knowthat the tides of emotion roll more easily that way than in straight lines. Six thousand years ago God flung this world out of his right hand; but he did not throw it out in a straight line, but curvilinear, with a leash of love holding it so as to bring it back again. The world started from his hand pure and Edenic. It has been rolling on through regions of moral ice and distemper. How long it will roll God only knows; but it will in due time make complete circuit and come back to the place whence it started—the hand of God—pure and Edenic.

The history of the world goes in a circle. Why is it that the shipping in our day is improving so rapidly? It is because men are imitating the old model of Noah's ark. A ship carpenter gives that as his opinion. Although so much derided by small wits, that ship of Noah's time beat the Majestic and the Etruria, and the City of Paris, of which we boast so much. Where is the ship on the sea to-day that could outride a deluge in which the heaven and the earth were wrecked, landing all the passengers in safety?—two of each kind of living creatures, thousands of species. Pomology will go on with its achievements, until after many centuries the world will have plums and pears equal to the Paradisaical. The art of gardening will grow for centuries, and after the Downings and Mitchells of the world have done their best, in the far future the art of gardening will come up to the arborescence of the year one. If the makers of colored glass go on improving, they may in some centuries be able to make something equal to the east window of York Minster, which was built in 1290. We are six centuries behind those artists, but the world must keep on toiling until it shall make the complete circuit and come up to the skill of those very men. If the world continues to improve in masonry, we shall have after a while, perhaps after the advance of centuries, mortar equal to that which I saw last summer in the wall of an exhumed English city, built in the time of the Romans, sixteen hundred years ago—that mortar to-day as good as the day in which it was made, having outlasted the brick and the stone. I say, after hundreds of years, masonry may advance to that point. If the world stands long enough, we may have a city as large as they had in old times. Babylon, five times the size of London. You go into the potteries in England, and you find them making cups and vases after the style of the cups and vases exhumed from Pompeii. The world is not going back. Oh no! but it is swinging in a circle, and will come back to the styles of pottery known so long ago as the days of Pompeii. The world must keep on progressing until it makes the complete circuit. The curve is in the right direction, the curve will keep on until it becomes the circle.

Well now, my friends, what is true in the material universe is true in God's moral government and spiritual arrangement. That is the meaning of Ezekiel's wheel. All commentators agree in saying that the wheel means God's providence. But a wheel is of no use unless it turn, and if it turn, it turns around, and if it turn around it moves in a circle. What then? Are we parts of a great iron machine whirled around whether we will or not, the victims of inexorable fate? No! So far from that, I shall show you that we ourselves start the circle of good or bad actions, and that it will surely come around again to us unless by divine intervention it be hindered. Those bad or good actions may make the circuit of many years; but come back to us they will as certainly as that God sits on the circle of the earth. Jezebel, the worst woman of the Bible, slew Naboth because she wanted his vineyard. While the dogs were eating the body of Naboth, Elisha the prophet put down his compass, and marked a circle from those dogs clear around to the dogs that should eat the body of Jezebel the murderess. "Impossible!" the people said; "that will never happen." Who is that being flung out of the palace window? Jezebel. A few hours after, they came around, hoping to bury her. They find only the palms of her hands and the skull. The dogs that devoured Jezebel and the dogs that devoured Naboth. Oh, what a swift, what an awful circuit!

But it is sometimes the case that this circle sweeps through a century, or through many centuries. The world started with a theocracy for government; that is, God was the president and emperor of the world. People got tired of a theocracy. They said, "We don't want God directly interfering with the affairs of the world; give us a monarchy." The world had a monarchy. From a monarchy it is going to have a limited monarchy. After a while, the limited monarchy will be given up, and the republican form of government will be everywhere dominant and recognized. Then the world will get tired of the republican form of government, and it will have an anarchy, which is no government at all. And then, all nations finding out that man is not capable of righteously governing man, will cry out again for a theocracy, and say, "Let God come back and conduct the affairs of the world." Every step—monarchy, limited monarchy, republicanism, anarchy, only different steps between the first theocracy and the last theocracy, or segments of the great circle of the earth on which God sits. But do not become impatient because you cannot see the curve of events, and therefore conclude that God's government is going to break down. History tells us that in the making of the Pyramids it took two thousand men two years to drag one great stone from the quarry and put it into the Pyramids. Well now, if men short-lived can afford to work so slowly as that, cannot God in the building of the eternities afford to wait? What though God should take ten thousand years to draw a circle? Shall we take our little watch, which we have to wind up every night lest it run down, and hold it up beside the clock of eternal ages? If, according to the Bible, a thousand years are in God's sight as one day, then according to that calculation the six thousand years of the world's existence have been only to God as from Monday to Saturday.

But it is often the case that the rebound is quicker, and the circle is sooner completed. You resolve that you will do what good you can. In one week you put a word of counsel in the heart of a Sabbath School child. During that same week you give a letter of introduction to a young man struggling in business. During the same week you make an exhortation in a prayer-meeting. It is all gone; you will never hear of it perhaps, you think. A few years after a man comes up to you, and says, "You don't know me, do you?" You say, "No, I don't remember ever to have seen you." "Why," he says, "I was in the Sabbath School class over which you were the teacher; one Sunday you invited me to Christ; I accepted the offer; you see that church with two towers yonder?" "Yes," you say. He says, "That is where I preach," or, "Do you see that governor's house? That is where I live." One day a man comes to you, and says, "Good-morning." You look at him and say, "Why, you have the advantage of me; I cannot place you." He says, "Don't you remember thirty years ago giving a letter of introduction to a young man—a letter of introduction to Moses H. Grinnell?" "Yes, yes, I do." He says, "I am the man; that was my first step toward a fortune; but I have retired from business now, and am giving my time to philanthropies and public interests. Come up and see me." Or a man comes to you, and says, "I want to introduce myself to you. I went into a prayer-meeting in Atlanta some years ago; I sat back by the door; you arose to make an exhortation; that talk changed the course of my life, and if I ever get to heaven, under God I will owe my salvation to you." In only ten, twenty, or thirty years, the circle swept out and swept back again to your own grateful heart.

But sometimes it is a wider circle, and does not return for a great while. I saw a bill of expenses for burning Latimer and Ridley. The bill of expenses says:

One load of firs fagots,	3*s.* 4*d.*
Cartage for four loads of wood,	2*s.*
Item, a post,	1*s.* 4*d.*
Item, 2 chains,	3*s.* 4*d.*
Item, two staples,	6*d.*
Item, four laborers,	2*s.* 8*d.*

That was cheap fire, considering all the circumstances; but it kindled a light that shone all around the world and aroused the martyr spirit, and out from that burning of Latimer and Ridley rolled the circle wider and wider, starting other circles, convoluting, overrunning, circumscribing, overarching all heaven—a circle.

But what is true of the good is just as true of the bad. You utter a slander against your neighbor. It has gone forth from your teeth; it will never come back, you think. You have done the man all the mischief you can. You rejoice to see him wince. You say, "Didn't I give it to him!" That word has gone out, that slanderous word, on its poisonous and blasted way. You think it will never do you any harm. But I am watching that word, and I see it beginning to curve, and it curves around, and it is aiming at your heart. You had better dodge it. You cannot dodge it. It rolls into your bosom, and after it, rolls in a word of an old book which says, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

You maltreat an aged parent. You begrudge him the room in your house. You are impatient of his whimsicalities and garrulity. It makes you mad to hear him tell the same story twice. You give him food he cannot masticate. You wish he was away. You wonder if he is going to live forever. He will be gone very soon. His steps are shorter and shorter. He is going to stop. But God has an account to settle with you on that subject. After a while, your eye will be dim, and your gait will halt, and the sound of the grinding will be low, and you will tell the same story twice, and your children will wonder if you are going to live forever, and wonder if you will never be taken away. They called you "father" once; now they call you the "old man." If you live a few years longer, they will call you the "old chap!" What are those rough words with which your children are accosting you? They are the echo of the very words you used in the ear of your old father forty years ago. What is that which you are trying to chew, but find it unmasticable, and your jaws ache, and you surrender the attempt? Perhaps it may be the gristle which you gave to your father for his breakfast forty years ago? A gentleman passing along the street saw a son dragging his father into the street by the hair of the head. The gentleman, outraged at this brutal conduct, was about to punish the offender, when the old man arose and said: "Don't hurt him; it's all right; forty years ago this morning I dragged out my father by the hair of his head!" It is a circle. My father lived into the eighties, and he had a very wide experience, and he said that maltreatment of parents was always punished in this world. Other sins may be adjourned to the next world, but maltreatment of parents punished in this world.

The circle turns quickly, very quickly. Oh, what a stupendous thought that the good and the evil we start come back to us. Do you know that the judgment day will be only the points at which the circles join, the good and the bad we have done coming back to us, unless divine intervention hinder—coming back to us with welcome of delight or curse of condemnation.

Oh, I would like to see Paul, the invalid missionary, at the moment when his influence comes to full orb—his influence rolling out through Antioch, through Cyprus, through Lystra, through Corinth, through Athens, through Asia, through Europe, through America, through the first century, through five centuries, through twenty centuries, through all the succeeding centuries, through earth, through heaven; and at last, the wave of influence having made full circuit, strikes his great soul. Oh, then I would like to see him. No one can tell the wide sweep of the circle of his influence, save the one who is seated on the circle of the earth. I should not want to see the countenance of Voltaire when his influence comes to full orb. When the fatal hemorrhage seized him at eighty-three years of age his influence did not cease. The most brilliant man of his century, he had used all his faculties for assaulting Christianity; his bad influence, widening through France, widening out through Germany, widening through all Europe, widening through America, widening through the one hundred and fifteen years that have gone by since he died, widening through earth, widening through hell; until at last the accumulated influence of his bad life in fiery surge of omnipotent wrath will beat against his destroyed spirit, and at that moment it will be enough to make the black hair of eternal darkness turn white with the horror. No one can tell how that bad man's influence girdled the earth save the one who is seated on the circle of the earth—the Lord Almighty.

"Well now," say people in this audience, "this in some respects is a very glad theory, and in others a very sad one; we would like to have all the good we have ever done come back to us, but the thought that all the sins we have ever committed will come back to us, fills us with affright." My brother, I have to tell you God can break that circle, and will do so at your call. I can bring twenty passages of Scriptures to prove that when God for Christ's sake forgives a man, the sins of his past life never come back. The wheel may roll on and roll on, but you take your position behind the Cross and the wheel strikes the Cross and is shattered forever. The sins fly off from the circle into the perpendicular, falling at right angles with complete oblivion. Forgiven! Forgiven! The meanest thing a man can do is, after some difficulty has been settled, to bring it up again; and God will not be so mean as that. God's memory is mighty enough to hold all the events of the ages, but there is one thing that is sure to slip his memory, one thing he is sure to forget and that is pardoned transgression. How do I know it? I will prove it. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Come into that state this morning, my dear brother, my dear sister. "Blessed is the one whose transgressions are forgiven."

But do not make the mistake of thinking that this doctrine of the circle stops with this life; it rolls on through heaven. You might quote in opposition to me what St. John says about the city of heaven. He says it "lieth four-square." That does seem to militate against this idea; but you know there is many a square house that has a family circle facing each other, and in a circle moving, and I can prove that this is so in regard to heaven. St. John says: "I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders." Again he says: "There was a rainbow round about the throne." The two former instances a circle; the last, either a circle or a semicircle. The seats facing each other, the angels facing each other, the men facing each other. Heaven an amphitheatre of glory. Circumference of patriarch and prophet and apostle. Circumference of Scotch Covenanters and Theban legion and Albigenses. Circumference of the good of all ages. Periphery of splendor unimagined and indescribable. A circle! A circle!

But every circumference must have a centre, and what is the centre of this heavenly circumference? Christ. His all the glory. His all the praise. His all the crowns. All heaven wreathed into a garland round about him. Take off the imperial sandal from his foot, and behold the scar of the spike. Lift the coronet of dominion from his brow, and see where was the laceration of the briers. Come closer all heaven. Narrow the circle around his great heart. O Christ, the Saviour! O Christ, the man! O Christ the God! Keep thy throne forever, seated on the circle of the earth, seated on the cirle of the heaven.

On Christ, the solid rock I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand.

A COREAN BIBLE CLASS.

A SIGNIFICANT and encouraging feature of the work among the Coreans is their readiness to study the Bible itself and to ask questions of the missionaries. The Rev. Samuel A. Moffett, who writes to the Presbyterian Board from Eui Ju says: I find great encouragement in being able to report five or six men who seem to have a real hold on the truth and are rejoicing in it, and in the fact that large numbers of people have learned what the Gospel is; many are quietly searching the Scriptures and there is an evident conviction on the part of many that this is the truth. I heard of quite a number who had given up the worship of evil spirits and I feel that a great deal has been done towards getting the people to think about and talk over this new doctrine. I have enrolled several applicants for baptism, one of whom gives me great joy because of his perfect willingness to let it be known that he is a Christian. He has given up the worship of evil spirits and now every night he assembles his household to hear him read from the Gospels or other Christian books. He charged me to tell the people in Seoul that he had become a Christian. I look upon the Bible class as the most profitable part of my work and the one which will have the greatest effect in preparing for a harvest. A class of twelve men from eight towns and villages were with me for fifteen days and they were taken through a course of instruction on the main doctrine of Scripture.

GOSPEL TROPHIES IN ITALY.

Lives and Homes Transformed by the Preaching of the Gospel Among the Italians.

THE best evidence of the power of the Gospel is such facts as the following which are reported from his own experience by Pastor Mariani, of Bari, Italy, who has done much evangelistic work in the country districts:

"One evening while I was preaching Jesus to a large auditory in our chapel, I was delighted to see a man particularly attentive. Since that evening he has never failed to come, Sundays and week days. In talks with him I learned that the word of grace had wrought deeply in his heart. He was a very wicked man, and a complete slave to drunkenness, blasphemy and lust. No sooner was the change wrought in his heart, than he took steps to give up his sinful practices. The woman with whom he lived sought the same Saviour, and nightly, with the New Testament in hand, he explained the Gospel to her. They were then married, a child which they had abandoned was recovered from a foundling home, and, in happy family life, they witness for Christ, and with encouraging fruit

"Another man, some time after his conversion, was unable to rest under the accusing of conscience. He remembered that some years previously he defrauded a poor shopkeeper of about twenty francs. In days gone by he felt no remorse, but now he was in deep trouble. He remembered the case of Zaccheus, and exclaimed, 'If I wrongfully exacted aught of any man, I will restore forefold.' At last, having some money in the savings-bank, he took from it a hundred francs, confessed his dishonesty to the shopkeeper, and obliged him to accept the sum in the name of Jesus, who had changed him and given him an invaluable treasure.

"At Brindisi recently, while on an evangliization tour, I heard a voice in the street crying, 'Down with the Protestant!' I was surprised, because I was known by nobody in the place, and had no special dress that could make me known as a Protestant. I soon perceived that the threat was not addressed to me, but to a poor man who was approaching me with a small box, asking to clean my shoes. He was an old acquaintance of mine! He was formerly a man well acquainted with all the prisons of the Puglia, where he lived several years to expiate woundings, murders, and other crimes. About five years ago he lived at Bari, and was well known as a man to be shunned.

"One evening I saw his frightful countenance among the hearers in our chapel. At first he seemed to laugh to scorn the Word of God, but at last he became more serious, and at the end of the service he went out quickly, so that I had no time to catch him. He attended the next meeting, and afterwards never failed to come to every service.

"I had many and long conversations with him. A complete transformation took place in his whole being; even his countenance became more human. He used often to say: 'I don't recognize myself, and how love has taken the place of hatred in my heart! I have lost all my strength, and feel unable to kill a fly. I was a lion, and am a lamb, I do not understand how Jesus could love such a scoundrel as I am; but it is a fact, and is enough.' Sometime after his conversion he left Bari for another town, and I lost sight of him. Now I was glad to meet him at Brindisi, and as soon as he recognized me he embraced me and wept for joy. I am very delighted to say that he is a faithful, unwearied, and fearless witness for Jesus in that town. All day long, and wherever he is, he cannot help speaking of him who transformed his life and saved him."

A SOLITARY WITNESS.

CHRISTIAN work is often likened to a battle and there are some incidents which show that Christ's soldiers need all the heroism of those who bear arms for their country. One such story comes from Inhambane in Africa where Mr. G. H. Agnew is laboring under many discouragements. He says:

This place is full of people without God and without hope. It has a mixed population of probably three or four thousand, including a few Europeans (mostly Portuguese), Mohammedans, Hindoos, half-castes, and natives of different tribes. The place boasts of a Roman church and a "padre," whose business it is to say masses, baptize children, and probably once in two or three years perform a marriage ceremony.

All classes unite in selling intoxicating liquors to the natives, but very little is imported, as sugar cane, palm and cashew trees all grow here in abundance, and out of these the natives are kept more than supplied all the year round. Some of the Mohammedans pray four or five times daily, and the call to prayer is heard early in the morning, but they go forth from their devotions to cheat, deceive, and sell rum to the natives; for although they do not drink themselves, still they have no compunction whatever, apparently about selling it to others. Very little is known about social purity, and marriage is almost totally disregarded. Agents come here from Europe, leaving their wives and families at home and lead immoral lives.

With the help of Bibles and other Scripture portions, and tracts in Portuguese and Arabic received from the Religious Tract Society, I am endeavoring to confess the Lord Jesus before this emphatically "wicked and adulterous generation." I have an interesting school, and being alone in the work, between doctoring, teaching, visiting, etc., manage to keep pretty well employed.

A SMALL BEGINNING.

IN a letter recently received from Rev. Geo. W. Sharp THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary of the American Sunday School Union, he recounts the following pleasant experience of a visit to a church which has grown out of one of the farm-house meetings he is still holding in the country districts of Missouri:

In the progress of my travels I have been delivering numerous sermons and addresses, and have come to a community which was the scene of great blessing in my early ministry. I refer to a meeting which was begun at a dwelling where a farmer opened his house for preaching, which was well attended by his neighbors. At the close of the first sermon eight persons became inquirers. The meeting after a few days was transferred to a small school-house in the neighborhood. The attendance was so great at the first appointment that there was not standing room for the people. To accommodate them an arbor was prepared, covered with brush, in a beautiful grove nearby; and temporary seats were arranged by laying plain plank on equally plain supports.

Service began each day about 11 A. M., and closed about 4 P. M., with an intermission for dinner, which the people brought in abundance every day, mostly in baskets, and was eaten on the ground. Such services are not uncommon in summer in the West, and are called "basket meetings." The intermission between services afforded time for dinner, and for social and religious conversation, which proved to be very pleasant, and helpful to the one great object in view—the salvation of sinners.

The meeting I am describing continued about thirty-three days, and is widely known as the "grove meeting" from its having been held in a grove. People attended for miles around, Christians of all denominations worshipped and labored together in happy fellowship. The conversions were clear and bright and included old and young. It was God's work. The fruits of that meeting have been glorious and permanent in those who turned to the Lord, as shown in their useful and faithful lives, and in the triumphant deaths of those who have fallen asleep. It has been often remarked how well the converts "held out," a proof that they were born of the Spirit.

The total number of conversions is not known. Ninety-four are known to have united with churches, some of whom were very old people. I remember five who were said to be between sixty and seventy years of age; and three who were over seventy.

A notable case was a very profane man who was seventy-seven years old. God's grace completely changed him. He was ever afterwards free from any semblance of profanity, and during the remaining years of his life exhibited an amiable, gentle and lovely Christian character. Many in the endless bliss of heaven will remember the blessing received in the "Grove meeting." It shows how God can turn a little beginning (as in that farm house) into glorious and wide-spread results.

SUNRISE.

A restless city entombed in sleep,
A silver fringe on the mountain steep,
A pale blue tinge on the starry deep,
And the sky-lark's soaring song.

A flash of flame on the eastern sky,
A world of starlets grow dim and die,
Gay boats on the river rippling by,
And the whistling shrill and strong.

A noiseless tread o'er the desert street,
A silence dead, save the watchman's beat,
An echoing stir from sin's retreat,
And the city's moving throng.

A fading star in the paling west,
A crown of gold on the steeple's crest,
A ray of light on the river's breast,
And the sunshine all day long.

THE SPIRIT OF THE LORD.

S. S. Lesson For Jan. 29 Zech. 4: 1-10. Golden Text, Zech. 4: 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE inner eye of Zechariah the prophet was focused to see things in the light of God. Living as he did, nearer the time of Christ's first coming, the suffering Messiah was in some things more clearly revealed to him than to any of his predecessors. Isaiah saw indeed that Jesus would be the Sin-bearer; but Zechariah discovered details concerning the Messiah in the light of prophecy, which none other saw. Again, it was given him to see the Holy Spirit and his works more fully than any that were before him. As with Ezekiel and with Daniel, a messenger from heaven, "an angel of the Lord," was sent to talk with him, freely and distinctly, of those things which were hidden from men in general. Our Lord himself said, in speaking of the Holy Ghost:

"Whom the World Cannot Receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him." (John 14: 17.) And again Paul says: "The things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God." (1.Cor. 2: 11, 18.) It takes the Spirit of God to understand all which is of a spiritual nature, just as it takes the organ of sight to perceive all which is visible. We can no more see with our ear, or hear with our hands than we can understand what is of God with our intellect,apart from the Spirit of God.

It is significant that when the angel who talked with him came to Zechariah to teach about the Spirit of God, he found him asleep, and had to waken him. The whole church of God is as fast asleep about the Holy Spirit as the prophet was, and needs indeed an angel, or a thousand angels, to awaken her to the fact that without the Spirit she is the dead and powerless thing which we see she is everywhere, to stand against the world and the flesh and the devil.

It is a wonderful conversation between a heavenly being and an earthly being. The prophet saw every preparation that the candlestick might give light, but is utterly silent as to whether any light shone from it. The candlestick, the type of the church (Rev. 1: 20), was there; the bowls for holding oil, the pipes for conveying oil, the very olive trees which produce oil were there, and yet

No Light!

In how many a church is it thus. The building is there, the minister is there, the congregation is there, the preaching is there, the prayer-meetings are there—but the Holy Ghost is not there, and nothing is accomplished; souls are not brought out of darkness into God's marvellous light. The preaching produces, not conversions, but either the flattery or the criticism of those whom it is meant to bring conquered to the feet of Jesus. The very pride, which should be slain before the Word of God, feeds upon the kind of preaching, or the form of the church, and thus that which is an offence to God grows like a rank weed in the pulpit and in the pew, and the candlestick gives no light; the light which is in her is darkness. What is lacking? Just that which the angel spoke of; the Spirit of the Lord: "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." O the mockery of God, O the bitter disappointment of man, O the delusion and mistake of those who attempt to substitute anything else for the power of the Holy Ghost! "Without me ye can do nothing." (John 15: 5.) "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore." O if men could only learn the old truth, which was taught by a man filled with the Holy Ghost: "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven;" how they would cease from their own works! Only God can do divine things; he may do them through us if he will, but it is he that worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure. He may give us spiritual gifts, but these very gifts "worketh that one and the self-same Spirit." (1. Cor. 12: 11.) He is ever, the Worker, the Originator of all which is divine, all which is and nothing else has any intrinsic value, it is only running uncertainly, and beating the air; nothing for eternity is accomplished by it. Men cannot work themselves into the power of the Holy Ghost by getting up a great deal of fervor in prayer. In this, as in all else, "a man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven." Preaching is powerless to do any real good except the words are as the Spirit gives utterance. Paul's speech and preaching was "not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men,but in the power of God."

How it grieves and dishonors God when men put human eloquence, human fervor, human energy, in the place of "the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven!" It is like the insolent presumption of Cain's altar! Christ's death demands our death to ourselves and to all we are: only as crucified with Christ can we so live that Christ lives in us by the Holy Ghost. If the very Son of God could not speak except he received from heaven the words he should utter, if the Holy Ghost also does not speak of himself, but, like the Son of God, speaks that which he hears, who are we that we should flatter ourselves that we have a power in speaking which the very Godhead does not claim independently? God teach us the need for the Holy Spirit.

The Glory of the Old Covenant was that God was with his people; the glory of the New is that God is in his people. But as the golden calf, the imitation of God's presence with his people, was the sin and curse of the Old Testament, so, if one may so put it, the imitation of the power of the Holy Ghost, by every conceivable means, is the terrible sin of the Church of this day. Men will kindle false fire on the altar, and get filled with their own happy feeling, be full of self-satisfaction, and intoxicated with their own success; and they will mistake this for, and actually call it by the name of, the Spirit of God, who glorifies not man but Christ!

How then may we know the power of the Spirit? By his work, which discounts the resources of man. "Not by might, nor by power." By his showing the greatness of God in every emergency. "Where art thou, O, great mountain? Before Zerubbabel . . . a plain. . . . For who hath despised the day of small things? For they shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel, even these seven; they are the eyes of the Lord, which run to and fro through the earth." In the light of the Spirit of God, all things are seen in their relation to him. The Holy Ghost sees God in everything,and shows us God in everything. A man who has only his finite reason to guide him may well flee when none pursueth, and muster all his forces to ward off real and imaginary evils from mind and body. The man who trusts in God, and who sees in the light of the Holy Ghost, sees God in everything.

The enemies of the Jews opposed the building of God's house; all seemed lost, the authorities were arrayed against God's little flock. But the Most High must have his word in the matter; the decree had gone forth from a mightier than they who troubled Israel: "The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house, his hands shall also finish it." "He shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it." And thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you. "All may look utterly impossible,but God cannot speak in vain. "Hath he said, and shall he not do it? Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?" Zechariah believed that everything was possible to his God, and he lived half in heaven,to bring messages to Joshua and Zerubbabel who stood in the front.

In the time of the tribulation, spoken of again and again as lasting "three years and a half," "a time,times and a half a time," "forty-two months," and "twelve hundred and sixty days," these two "sons of oil" seen by Zechariah (4:14), reappear. "I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and three score days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth." Are these the resurrected saints of God, Moses and Elijah? We shall yet see. They "have power to shut heaven, that it rain not," like Elijah of old; they have "power over waters and turn them into blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues." (Rev. 11 : 3-6.) In any case, the lesson we have to learn is, that anointed men, Holy Ghost filled men, are the channel of light and blessing to the Church of God, and through the Church, to the world. Men such as Moses, who knew God "face to face," are needed in the Church and in the Mission field,and men like Elijah, who would stand before kings and witness for God before an assembled nation of idolaters to prove his divine power by sending fire down from heaven. Oh, for anointed ones; Oh, for true sons of oil!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AS the people engaged in rebuilding their Temple needed more encouragement, Zechariah was commissioned to give it. He brought two messages veiled in imagery which their own ritual enabled them to understand. He said that an angel had shown him a great gold lamp-stand with seven branches, each bearing a light. The older men had seen just such a lamp-stand in the former temple—a lamp-stand which according to our estimate of the value of gold was worth $28,000. But in the prophet's vision there was a peculiarity. A provision was made there for the lamps burning perpetually. Planted beside it were two olive trees and pipes conveyed the oil from them to the bowl and kept it always replenished with oil. The people knew that God was telling them by this vision that the light they were to hold up to the world would never be extinguished. The second message was about their leaders, in whom apparently they were losing confidence. Assurance was given that in spite of difficulties and the slowness of the work that the men who began it should finish it. And why? Because such work did not depend on might or on power but on God's Spirit, which in the earlier vision had been promised.

The angel came . . . and waked me. The prophet had fallen asleep and the angel waked him to give him the message, but there are some people whose spiritual slumber is so deep, who are so oblivious of spiritual truth, so absorbed in business or pleasure, that it would seem that nothing but an angel could wake them. Sometimes the angel brings trial for the purpose. A great writer tells of a wealthy merchant who had two children, a son and a daughter. The daughter was a lovely character,gentle and affectionate,but her father took no notice of her and seemed scarcely conscious of her existence. All his attention was given to his business and his son who would inherit his wealth. His son died and his business was ruined. Then, when in his old age and in poverty,his daughter was his comfort and joy, he wondered that he had not perceived her worth before. When a man is waked by trial or any other means to the beauty and value of religion, he wonders that he did not realize it before. The help needed to awaken a man to the hope of a better life sometimes comes from a godly man. Few men in this generation had such influence over the criminals of London as the late Earl of Shaftesbury. He always labored in hope. One man went to him after his release from prison to seek his counsel. Years afterward,when redeemed to God and humanity,he was asked when his reformation began. "With my talk with the Earl," he replied. "What did the Earl say?" "It was not so much anything he said; but he took my hand in his,and said,'Jack,we'll make a man of you yet.' It was his touch that did it."

A candlestick all of gold. Therefore precious to its owner as well as useful to those who get light from it. It symbolizes Christ's church on earth in both particulars. Among the old records of the city of London is one that shows how the city was lighted in the olden time and it would appear from it that the citizen had not done his duty when his own house was well lighted. He was expected to have some concern for the people outside in the streets. At sunset the watchmen who did police duty in those days called out as they went their rounds, "Hang out your lights." That is what every one should still do. However feeble the light may be it should be hung out. It may light some one who otherwise might stumble. But the old record goes on to say that Bow Church had lanterns all the way up its steeple and lights were placed in them at night "whereby travelers to the city might have better sight thereof and not miss their ways." So what the householder did for those at hand the church did for those at greater distance and its spiritual duty remains the same. But the individual duty must not be forgotten. Dr. Oswald Dykes says: "As I have seen the glowworm at late evening, by the silent side of an empty lane, mount some tall spike of grass and turn up its tiny lamp, content to hang, head downwards, itself unseen, so that the exquisite soft green light which God had given it might be visible in its loveliness; so may one find in this world's lowly and unfrequented paths Christ's light-bearers, who shed each his own sweet love-light round a narrow circle of the dark.

By my Spirit saith the Lord. No other power will serve instead of this in any work for God. Mr. Spurgeon used to compare the difference between churches which had the Holy Spirit from those without him to a difficulty about a locomotive. The locomotive would not move. They put on a new driver and said,"he will make it go," but the wheels were motionless. They painted and decorated it, but it remained stationary. They tried the experiment of changing a wheel here and another there, but without success. Then some one breaks through the crowd and exclaims, "The engine does not need new wheels, or decorations, or a new driver. The fire is gone out. You must have fire and the engine will travel. The fire of the Holy Spirit is indispensable to the success of a church.

"Suppose," says Dr. Arthur in his Tongue of Fire, "we saw an army sitting down before a granite fortress, and they told us they intended to batter it down. We might ask them, How? They point us to a cannon-ball. Well, but there is no power in that. It is heavy, but not more than a hundred-weight, or half a hundred-weight. No, but look at the cannon. Well, but there is no power in that; it is a machine, and nothing more. But look at the powder. Well, there is no power in that; a child may spill it, a sparrow may pick it up. Yet this powerless powder and this powerless ball are put into this powerless cannon; one spark of fire enters it, and then, in the twinkling of an eye, that powder is a flash of lightning, and the cannon-ball is a thunderbolt, which smites as if it had been sent from heaven. So it is with our church machinery of the present day. We have our instruments for pulling down the strongholds, but they can do nothing until the Spirit gives them power.

Despise the day of small things. It is never wise to do that. Small things may grow, or, if they remain small they may exercise a far-reaching influence. When the air-balloon was first launched a matter-of-fact gentleman contemptuously asked Franklin what was the use of it. He answered the question by asking another: "What is the use of an infant? It may become a man." What if we and our work should be small, God can cause grand issues to result from them. A Methodist local preacher preaching in a little country church one snowy morning, may have thought his service was of no account. There were very few people there, but among them was a young man desiring to know the way to God. He preached earnestly and faithfully to the handful of hearers and his sermon was the means of converting that young man, whose name was Charles Spurgeon, the great preacher whose sermons have pointed thousands to Christ.

"I remember," says Mr. Moody, "hearing of a person who was always trying to do some great thing for the Lord, and because he could not do a great thing, he never did anything. There are a great many who would be willing to do great things if they could come up and have their names heralded through the press. I heard of a man's dream in which he imagined that when he died he was taken by the angels to a beautiful temple. After admiring it for a time he discovered that one stone was missing. All finished but just one little stone was left out. He said to the angel, 'Why is this stone left out?' The angel replied, 'That was left out for you, but you wanted to do great things, and so there was no room left for you.' He was startled and awoke, and resolved that he would become a worker for God; and he worked faithfully after that."

Persecuted for Christ's Sake.

oom, looking here and there in every direction s though they feared something. On my ask- ng for an explanation, they told me that they were evangelical Armenians who had come to see what could be done to gain some religious liberty for the evangelical work in the Caucasus. The outcome of the visit was that I found in the Senate a copy of a firman issued some years before by the Czar, granting special privileges to the Caucasus as a district apart from the rest of the empire. In 1878, while returning from Tiflis to Tabriz, I struck upward to the Caspian, visiting Baku and Shamoki, where there are flourishing communities of evangelical Armenians. In 1881 I came up from Tabriz, by the way of the Caspian, preaching at Baku and Shamoki, and then visiting for the first time Shusha, in the district of Karabagh, where there is also an evangelical Armenian community. I was so much encouraged that I made a second visit to St. Petersburg, where I saw Count Ignatieff, then Minister of the Interior, and also Grand Duke Michael, the Viceroy of the Caucasus, and from the latter with reference to working in the provinces of the Caucasus as an evangelist. In 1883 on returning from a visit to the United States, I made a third trip to St. Petersburg. A change had taken place in the government, the Caucasus having been annexed to Russia, and having now become a part of Russia proper. This made it necessary for me to obtain a further paper authorizing my work. A moral change had also taken place, and the principal men, including such as Tolstoi and Pobedonostoff, were bitterly opposed to all kinds of evangelical work, and, although I succeeded in sending a petition to the Czar (which was handed to him through the kindness of a friend at court) yet I could obtain no concession in regard to work in the Caucasus.

In 1884 I came back to Tiflis, and in the spring of 1885 made a visit to the other side of the Caspian to the Turcoman country, which had lately been brought into the Russian dominions. Here I found people different from all the other Mohammedans I had ever met. In fact, they were little more than Mohammedan in name, having no regular form of prayer, few set places of worship and very little to mark them as distinctively Mohammedan. They regard Christians in a very different way from the other Moslems, making no distinction between them in their salutations. Here was a most hopeful field of labor, and I was planing to return to it at some future time, when I was required by the Russian government to leave Askabad in forty-eight hours. I returned to Tiflis and thence went to Tabriz. In 1886 I had no opportunity to visit Russia, but in 1887, before I could do so, a command came from St. Petersburg entirely shutting me out of the Caucasus. Even now, on my return journey from Persia to America, it was only on account of the illness of my wife that I was able to obtain permission to travel through the Caucasus. One thing, however, seems to me certain in reference to the growth of the Kingdom of God in Russia —that the work has gone too far and is too deeply rooted to be destroyed or even fatally injured.

A TURCOMAN TENT OR "KIBITKA."

Baron Americhanjanz, whom I have previously mentioned, together with two Elders of the Baptists, in 1887 was banished to Siberia for preaching the Word in Russia. The baron was released in 1890, but the two Russian preachers, Pauloff and Voronin, were kept until 1891, and on returning to Tiflis, were confronted with a paper demanding that they promise thereafter to have nothing to do with preaching the Gospel to the people. Voronin signed the paper, but Pauloff refused and he was immediately returned to Siberia. What has been done in these cases is done in multitudes of others. In this way the seed is being scattered. Just as the Caucasus has been evangelized by sending the Molochans there, so Siberia, the furthest limits of the Russian Empire is being evangelized throughout its length and breadth by the action of the government in persecuting these Christians.

PETER Z. EASTON.

The Rev. Peter Z. Easton, who has furnished the foregoing valuable contribuition to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and whose portrait appears on the first page of this issue, is a native of New York City, where he was born in 1846. He entered the New York City College in 1860, and was graduated in 1865, and from the Union Theological Seminary in 1870. During the next year (1871), he preached in Long Island, and in 1872 he left for Persia to labor there under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Before beginning work in his new field, he stopped eight months at Constantinople on account of his wife's feeble health. In July, 1873, he finally arrived in Persia, and in September of the same year settled in Tabriz, which has since been the centre of his missionary efforts over a very extensive tract of Asiatic territory and also over the Russian dependencies in the Caucasus. Up to 1880, Mr. Easton was working in connection with the Presbyterian Missionary Board, but from that year up to the present time, he conducted the work upon an independent basis.

ARMENIAN GIRLS.

The illustrations accompanying the article are from photographs taken in Persia and the Turcoman country. One of these (on the first page) is a portrait of his faithful native helper at Tabriz, Kasha Moshy, who has been with him for 19 years and is a most successful worker among Moslems. Another shows a caravansary or Asiatic warehouse, while still others are a portrait of a Seyyid, a lineal descendant of the prophet, a kibitka or Turcoman tent, and two young native Christian women of Armenia, in the peculiar dress of that country. Mr. Easton intends to return to Persia during this year.

THE PASTOR REMINDED.

AMONG the many anecdotes of Pastor Spurgeon which have come to light since his death is one that he related to some friends to show how truth may be obscured by moods and physical depression and how comfort was once administered to him in a strange manner. He said that once after an illness he was very weary and sad at heart and went down into the country, and went into an old Methodist church. The preacher on the occasion was an engineer, and during the delivery of the sermon he (Mr. Spurgeon) was moved with the deepest emotion. At the close of the service he went to the preacher and thanked him, when the preacher at once asked who the inquirer might be, and when he was informed he exclaimed, "Oh, it was one of your sermons that I preached." Mr. Spurgeon replied, "Yes, I know it was." In telling the story, Mr. Spurgehn said he felt greatly relieved after hearing the sermon, and was glad to think that one of his own sermons had had such an effect, and he earnestly trusted other hearers were affected in a similar way.

The Ministry of Flowers.

AS I passed through the conservatory of a friend this afternoon we came to the long beds of chrysanthemums lifting their sturdy faces to the sun as it came beaming through the transparent panes of glass. I thought how many blessings we have in life we scarcely thank the dear Father for, but accept them just as though they belonged to us; and then I thought of a little mission which this same flower only a short time ago had helped one perform.

We were going to have our Mother's Supper at the Florence Mission. So I said to my friend: "Can you give me a few of your flowers to make into bouquets for these poor women who have so little sunshine in their lives and oh so few flowers?"

"Yes," she said. "I will send you a boxful; you can do with them just as you please."

True to her promise, the treasures came. So we carefully assorted and made them up into twenty tiny bouquets. One for each poor weary mother, whose life had been made bright within the last few years by a knowledge of the Father's love. They were beautiful to look at. I thought I had never seen flowers whose petals were so pure and white, such perfect emblems of the life of him who had arrayed them in their pure garments. We took them, each bunch tied up in a delicate golden ribbon, and never did I see flowers give so rich a blessing. I told them how these plants, as they turned their life-giving leaves, with their myriads of imperceptible little breathing pores to the sun, were as we, turning our hearts to the sunshine of God's love, that we might blossom and grow in his Kingdom, and the humblest little flower in the most secluded place, was but an emblem of that sweet life which is to come.

Then I let them each choose their own little bunch. Some wanted those whose back ground was of soft green fern; others preferrsd the sweeting jasmine; but all were pleased, and they hold them as a queen might a rich jewel. One said: "Let me smell yours;" another said: "Look at mine." And each mother carried this message of love to dark and desolate homes:

God bless all gentle ministers
That brighten life's sad homes,
The tender word, the kinkly act,
The ministry of flowers—
That breathe their life out frequently,
In homes of want and care,
Reminding anxious hearts of him,
Who clothes the lilies fair.
And, listening, they can hear these words,
Sweet words of love so true,
He clothes the lillies of the field,
Will not he care for you.

A NEW MAP OF JAPAN.

C. HACHIRO KAJIWARA, a Christian native of Japan, has recently compiled a large map of his native country—a work on which he has been long occupied. Mr. Kajiwara is a student in Princeton College, and has a desire to give Americans a more accurate knowledge of Japan. He is now being educated for the ministry, and intends to become a Christian preacher in his native land. The map is 52 x 54 inches and is very complete, showing railroads, highways, post-offices, ancient battle-fields, local governments, historical places, Buddhist and Shinto temples and mission centres of all Christian denominations. The number of inhabitants of each town or village is indicated. Those of our readers who are interested in the progress of Christianity in Japan, can address Mr. Kajiwara at 27 North Edwards Hall, Princeton College, Princeton, N. J.

THE WONDROUS SECRET.

I HAVE learned the wondrous secret,
Of abiding in the Lord:
I have found the strength and sweetness
Of confiding in his word;
I have tasted Life's pure fountain,
I am drinking of his blood,
I have lost myself in Jesus,
I am sinking unto God.

All my sicknesses I bring him,
And he bears them all away;
And my fears and griefs I tell him,
All my cares from day to day,
All my strength I draw from Jesus,
By his breath I live and move;
E'en his very mind he gives me,
And his faith and life and love.

For my words I take his wisdom,
For my works his Spirit's power,
For my ways his ceaseless presence,
Guards and guides me every hour.
Of my heart, he is the portion,
Of my joy the boundless spring.
Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer,
Glorious Lord and coming King.

THE SOUL'S DAYSPRING.

WE will never capture this world for God by any keen sabre of sarcasm, by any glittering lances of rhetoric, by any sapping and mining of profound disquisition, by any gunpowdery explosions of indignation, by sharp shootings of wit, by howitzers of mental strength made to swing shell five miles, by cavalry horses gorgeously comparisoned pawing the air. In vain all the attempts on the part of these ecclesiastical foot soldiers, light horsemen, and grenadiers.

Let each Christian go to the forest of God's promise and invitation, and hew down a branch and put it on his shoulder, and let us all come around these obstinate iniquities, and then, with this pile, kindled by the fires of a holy zeal and the flames of a consecrated life, we will burn them out. What steel cannot do, fire may. And I announce myself in favor of any plan of religious attack that succeeds—any plan of religious attack, however radical, however odd, however unpopular, however hostile to all the conventionalities of Church and State. We want more heart in our song, more heart in our alms-giving, more heart in our prayers, more heart in our preaching.

One night I went down to the African Methodist meeting-house in Philadelphia, and at the close of the service a black woman, in the midst of the audience, began to sing a hymn, and all the audience joined in, and we were floated some three or four miles nearer heaven than I have ever been since. I saw with my own eyes that "fountain filled with blood"—red, agonizing, sacrificial, redemptive—and I heard the crimson plash of the wave as we all went down under it:

[illegible]
Lose all their guilty stains.

The Gospel is not a syllogism; it is not casuistry, it is not polemics, or the science of squabble. It is blood-red fact; it is warm-hearted invitation; it is leaping, bounding, flying good news; it is efflorescent with all light; it is rubescent with all glow; it is arborescent with all sweet shade.

I have seen the sun rise on Mount Washington, and from the Tip top House; but there was no beauty in that compared with the day-spring from on high when Christ gives light to a soul. I have heard Parepa sing; but there was no music in that compared with the voice of Christ when he said: "Thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace."

Any new plan that makes a man quit his sin, and that prostrates a wrong, I am as much in favor of as though all the doctors, and the bishops, and the archbishops, and the synods, and the academical gownsmen of Christianity sanctioned it.

IS IT WELL WITH THY SOUL?

A MAN may be sound in body, and he may have luxuriant investments, and have high social position, and yet instead of it being well with him there may be everlasting diseases wasting his soul, and awfully and overwhelmingly it may be ill with him. All those estates will go out of your hands, all these friends will vanish from your earthly association; but God has planted in you a light which will burn on after the last ember of a consuming world is trampled out and extinguished.

There is a life that always lives,
There is a death that never dies.

Considering the fact that you are so invested, and that eternity presses on toward you, and that soon your naked soul will step out and up into the presence of the eternal God in judgment, ought not the momentous question resound through the deepest depths of your immortal nature while I cry out: "Is it well with thy soul?" You have an undefined lodging in your soul. You tried money-making; that did not satisfy you. You tried office under Government; that did not satisfy you. You tried pictures and sculptures; but works of art did not satisfy you. You are as much discontented with this life as the celebrated French author, who felt that he could not any longer endure the misfortunes of the world, and who said: "At four o'clock this afternoon I shall put an end to my own existence. Meanwhile, I must toil on up to that time for the sustenance of my family." And he wrote on until the clock struck four, when he folded up his manuscript, and, by his own hand, concluded his earthly life. Grace alone satisfies the soul with a high, deep, all-absorbing, and eternal satisfaction. It comes, and it offers the most unfortunate man so much of this world as is best for him, and throws all heaven into the bargain.

The wealth of Crœsus, and of all the Stewarts, and of all the Barings, and all the Rothschilds is only a poor, miserable shilling compared with the eternal fortunes that Christ offers you to-day. In the far East, there was a king who used once a year to get on one scale, while on the other scale were placed gold and silver and gems; indeed, enough were placed there to balance the king; then, at the close of the weighing, all those treasures were thrown among the populace. But Christ to-day steps on one scale, and on the other are all the treasures of the universe, and he says: "All are yours—all height, all depth, all length, all breadth, all eternity; all are yours."

THE ONE CHANCE.

IT would not be safe for this world if men had another chance in the next. If it had been announced that, however wickedly a man might act in this world, he could fix it up all right in the next, society would be terribly demoralized, and the human race demolished in a few years. The fear that, if we are bad and unforgiven here, it will not be well for us in the next existence, is the chief influence that keeps civilization from rushing back to the semi-barbarism and semi-barbarism from rushing into midnight savagery, and midnight savagery from extinction; for it is the astringent impression of all nations, Christian and heathen, that there is no future chance for those who have wasted this.

Multitudes of men who are kept within bounds would say, "Go to, now! Let me get all out of this life there is in it. Come, gluttony, and inebriation, and uncleanness, and revenge, and all sensualities, and wait upon me! My life may be somewhat shortened in this world by dissoluteness, but that will only make heavenly indulgence on a larger scale the sooner possible. I will overtake the saints at last, and will enter the Heavenly Temple only a little later than those who behaved themselves here. I will on my way to heaven take a little wider excursion than those who were on earth pious, and I shall go to heaven via Gehenna and via Sheol." Another chance in the next world means free license and wild abandonment in this.

Suppose you were a party in an important case at law, and you knew from consultation with judges and attorneys that it would be tried twice, and the first trial would be of little importance, but that the second would decide everything; for which trial would you make the most preparation, for which retain the ablest attorneys, for which be most anxious about the attendance of witnesses? You would put all the stress upon the second trial, all the anxiety, all the expenditures, saying, "The first is nothing, the last is everything." Give the race the assurance of a second and more important trial in the subsequent life, and all the preparation would be post-mortem, post-funeral, post-sepulchral, and the world with one jerk be pitched off into impiety and godlessness.

This idea lifts this world up from an unimportant way-station to a platform of stupendous issues, and makes all eternity whirl around this hour. But one trial for which all the preparation must be made in this world, or never made at all. That piles up all the emphases and all the climaxes and all the destinies into life here. No other chance! Oh, how that augments the value and the importance of this chance!

UNAPPRECIATED BLESSINGS.

THIS age is no more characterized by wonders of disaster than by wonders of blessing. Blessing of longevity. The average of human life rapidly increasing. Forty years now worth four hundred once. The average life practically greater now then when Noah lived his 950 years, and Methusaleh lived his 969 years. Blessing of intelligence. The Salmon P. Chases and the Abraham Lincolns and the Henry Wilsons of the coming time will not be required to learn to read by pine-knot lights, or seated on shoemaker's bench, nor will the Fergusons have to study astronomy while watching the cattle. Knowledge rolls its tides along every poor man's door, and his children may go down and bathe in them. If the philosophers of the last century were called up to recite in a class with our boys at the Polytechnic, or our girls at the Packer, those old philosophers would be sent down to the foot of the class because they failed to answer the questions! Free libraries in nearly all the important towns and cities of the land. Historical alcoves and poetic shelves and magazine tables for all who desire to walk through them or sit down to them.

Blessing of quick information; newspapers falling all around us thick as leaves in a September equinoctial. News three days old rancid and stale. We see the whole world twice a day—through the newspaper at the breakfast-table, and through the newspaper at the tea-table, with an "extra" here and there between.

Oh! you dead churches, wake up. Throw back the shutters of stiff ecclesiasticism and let the light of the spring morning come in. Morning for the land. Morning for the sea. Morning of emancipation. Morning of light and love and peace. Morning of a day in which there shall be no chains to break, no sorrows to assuage, no despotism to shatter, no woes to compassionate. Oh Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown! Bruised hand, take the sceptre! Wounded foot, step the throne! "Thine is the kingdom."

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

REACHING THE MASSES.

THE way to reach the masses, is to reach them.

I want to give THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers a sight of what I call a successful meeting. It was not in church or hall, not in house or home, but in a great factory. The largest glass-works in America. The De Pauw Co., at New Albany, Ind. It was arranged by the officers of that company, all Christian men, who were present at the service. A hand-bill was printed by them and scattered freely to the men.

The service was at noon. An improvised platform was built in one of the large open spaces in the works. Around were some few seats. As we filed in we found many there and after the first song they came by hundreds till a great crowd stood close by and were as attentive and as orderly as in any sanctuary.

The singing was a big feature. The clear tones of a woman's voice singing the Gospel won them. Then they heartily joined in a verse of "Nearer My God to Thee."

There was absolute silence during prayer, and then came the Gospel address. I put in plenty of the brightness, and from first to last it was not creed or church or even Christianity but Christ. I tell you it did my heart good to see the way those men listened. Many of them as godless as sin, seldom if ever in a church, but as interested as men could be, and when at the close I asked them to say it aloud, "Christ for me," it was a perfect shout from nearly all, and twice they repeated it. The whole service lasted less than a half hour, but the warm hand-shakes afterward told the story of success. No wonder the following Sabbath many were at the meetings in the churches. This is but a sample of others held, for the same thing, was repeated in the Marion Car Shops, the woolen mills, the steel rail mill, the iron works, the Bent Work factory and others, and in every instance the crowd was large and as attentive and as eager in listening and full of thanks at the close. I am convinced there are literally thousands of factories where such gatherings could be held and the result would be glorious.

A Letter.

Mr. Turnback. My dear sir:—I desire to call your attention to a portion of God's Word, where it tells of "a man putting his hand to the plough," and turning back, is not fit for the kingdom of heaven. It is my plain and painful duty to tell you, you are not fit for the kingdom, and only people get in, who are fit.

You had grace at meals once—now, no more.
You had family prayers once—now, no more.
You read your Bible once—now, no more.
You prayed in prayer-meeting once—but have backslidden there.
You once gave in proportion to your income—now you rob God.
You once longed for grace and glory—now you long for gumption and gold.
You were once a winner of souls, but since your financial prosperity, there has been less and less of it, till now, no one joins the host of God from your work.
You once chided yourself for lukewarmness, but even that is passed, and, if indications point anywhere, they point to the pit towards which you are hastening.

Had thee not better turn back?

Your friend, A. TRUTHFUL.

Stumbling.

A blind man was met at night, carrying a lantern, in one of the big Western cities. A friend met him and said, "See here, what are you carrying that lantern for; it won't keep you from stumbling over people."

"No, no," was the reply, "but it will keep them from stumbling over me."

I thought to myself, if more people would carry their Christian light, less stumbling would abound.

It's written, "they fall deepest who fall backward into hell," and I don't want anyone to fall that way over me.

About one of the cleanest cut portions of Scripture for sinful Christians to read, is Ezek. 33

Christian life is Christian warfare.

Our weapons must be adequate for the foe and fray.

We must have swords for hand conflicts and long range guns for citadels.

The foe within dislodged—pride, selfishness.

The foe without vanquished—tempter and temptations.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A FAMOUS BIOLOGIST.

THE recent death of Sir Richard Owen removes from the world one of the most distinguished biologists of modern times. Not only in England, where his work was done, but throughout Europe and in this country, his learning and talents won for him profound veneration. He was in his eighty-ninth year and was living in retirement though continuing the researches, the results of which have given his name world-wide fame. He was a disciple of Cuvier, under whom he studied, as a young man, in Paris. From that great master he imbibed a taste for the study of comparative anatomy, and so far did he prosecute his studies that it was said he could fully describe the shape and habits of an animal he had never seen, if he was shown any part of it. He held that the different parts of an animal were always in so close an agreement that one part would never exist without the corresponding parts necessary to adapt it to its sphere of life. Thus he was able to classify and describe the antediluvian animals, parts of whose fossil skeletons have been exhumed. He has left behind him a library of learned works in which he described his researches and which are among the text-books of our greatest universities. It is gratifying to notice that all his books are pervaded by a deep religious spirit, and more than once he pauses in his description, to point out how the wonders he has been explaining manifest the infinite wisdom of the Creator. He never ceased to oppose that teaching of evolution which would exclude the idea of a Divine Being as the origin of all things. Like the wise king of old he believed that "the hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made both of them." (Prov. 20: 12.)

Mother and Daughter United.

A HAPPY meeting took place in Albany, N. Y., a few days ago, between a mother and her daughter. The former gave a pathetic account of the incidents that led to it. She said that she had been married eighteen years before, to a man who had deserted her after their daughter was born, and she afterward found that he had a wife living when he married her. She was completely destitute and found herself unable to secure employment while she retained her baby. A family offered to adopt it if she would finally and fully renounce all claim to it. She was very reluctant to make the promise but, believing that she was consulting the child's interests as well as her own, she consented and the transfer was made. She succeeded in earning her living and was eventually married to a gentleman in Boston. She scrupulously kept her promise not to see her child, though her heart yearned for her. One day recently, however, she read in a newspaper a letter which was evidently written by the daughter she had not seen in seventeen years. The writer described the longing of her heart for the mother of whom she knew nothing, but whose love she craved. The mother did not know what to do; she wanted to keep her promise but could not resist the pleading of her own heart and of her daughter's longing. Finally after consulting her husband she decided that maternal duty was paramount to every other consideration, and she went to Albany and claimed her daughter. Sometimes men feel that God is far off from them and does not concern himself about them; but he who has said that his love surpasses that of a mother is never unheeding when his children call upon him. (Isa. 49: 15.)

To Evade the Law.

A LAW extremely unpopular among Chinamen is that requiring them to affix a photograph of their features to their certificates of residence. The object of the law is to prevent a Chinaman returning to China and permitting another Chinaman to come back instead of him on his certificate. A detective in Philadelphia recently discovered an ingenious plot to defeat the law. Seeing a photographic camera being carried into the Chinese quarter, he followed it and found that a photograph gallery was to be opened there. The proprietor has been taking lessons and has become an expert. He has also learned a secret connected with the art for which there is generally no demand. It consists in spreading a colorless solution over the picture after it has been printed which causes it to fade after a few months and renders it entirely unrecognizable within a year. A Chinaman may have his portrait taken by his countryman, affix it to the signature on file in the Collector's office and depart safe in the knowledge that by the time his substitute presents himself, the picture will be so indistinct that identification will be impossible, and so a man who has never acquired residence here may be admitted. It would appear, by the way some men act who believe in a heaven and hope to be admitted there when they die, that they are indulging in a similar hope. But they cannot be too often reminded that only those who belong to Christ here will be admitted there. "The Lord knoweth them that are his." (II. Tim. 2: 19.)

A Bridge Dragged Away.

A DISPUTE between two railroad companies in New Jersey led to a strange incident a few days ago. The New Jersey Central Railroad Company recently obtained permission to replace an old bridge across the Morris Canal in Jersey City with a new iron bridge. There would have been no opposition to that change, but the concession included a change of grade. The old bridge was about twenty feet above the canal, with an inclined approach at each end. The company proposed to have the new bridge on the level, with a draw to permit the passage of canal boats. To this arrangement there was strenuous opposition on the part of the Lehigh Valley Company, which owns the canal. The new bridge was put in place on January 5, but the anchorages were not firmly fixed when the men left work at night. During the night, while only one watchman kept guard over the structure, a locomotive and two cars drew up on the Lehigh Valley road. A number of workmen alighted and fixed strong chains around the bridge. They were attached to the locomotive, and it was started. With a mighty pull the heavy structure was dragged from its place and fell in a slanting position, one end resting on the bottom of the canal, and the other on the towpath. The bridge is ruined, and the courts will probably have to decide the dispute between the two companies. As there were to be no tracks over the bridge, but only a roadway for vehicles and foot-passengers, the inconvenience resulting from the Lehigh's high-handed proceeding will fall on the public. It is unfortunate that the jealousies and quarrels of two corporations should incommode people who have no interest in their disputes; but excited disputants often forget or ignore the consequence to others of their proceedings. If it had not been for God's omnipotent power, infidels would long ago have pulled away the bridge by which multitudes pass safely over the chasm of death into the eternal home. (Psalm 46: 2.)

THE LATE SIR RICHARD OWEN, THE FAMOUS BIOLOGIST.

Breaking into Prison.

A CURIOUS case of burglary was reported in New York on Jan. 6. Some thieves broke into the Tombs prison and made an unsuccessful attempt to force open the iron safe in the clerk's room. Entrance to the prison, which as a rule, burglars find more easy than they wish, was effected by climbing over the iron gates in the rear, and prying open the outer door with a jimmy. The locks on the inner doors were picked and then the burglars had access to the safe. The combination disk on the safe door was pried off and a hole was drilled in the mechanism. At this point the burglars seem to have become alarmed and to have decamped. The safe door was not opened, but the men made their escape, taking their tools with them. It is supposed that they at some time have been involuntary guests in the Tombs and have seen the clerk deposit in the safe the money collected in fines in the court and have expected to make a large haul. Their knowledge of the location of the safe confirms this theory. It shows how persistent men will be in evil courses when imprisonment fails to cure them of wrong-doing. The same persistence is often displayed by people, who, although they obey human law, continue to violate the law of God in spite of frequent admonitions and the judgments which God sends to bring them to repentance. (Prov. 29: 1.)

A Strange Christmas Present.

A LADY who was buying Christmas gifts just before the holidays, surprised her escort by saying that for her last purchase she would have to go to a drug-store. On her arrival she asked for six bottles of cod-liver oil, and they were made into a package for her. "I think," her escort said, "that is a Christmas gift that will not be duplicated in the city." The lady replied, "That may be, but there will be none more acceptable. The poor girl, who will get this, has been ordered to take the medicine, and the physician says that nothing else will save her life. She has not a cent to spare to buy it, so I could not send her anything she has more need of. It is not very appetizing, but she will take the oil, and that is my chief concern. But it does not look so nice as a box of bonbons would." The lady showed her wisdom in sending the girl the medicine that would do her good, rather than a present that would be simply pleasant. Every one recognizes the fact, but not all can do so when the dispensations of God's providence fall upon them, although we are assured that the chastenings which seem grievous for the time, "afterward yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." (Heb. 12: 11.)

A Daughter's Rights.

A DECISION was handed down in the Court of Common Pleas in New York last week, defining the rights of a daughter in her father's house. The suit arose out of a quarrel with a stepmother. About a year ago the owner of a house in the city was declared insane and was taken to a lunatic asylum. His wife and his daughter by a former marriage lived in the house. The latter was nearly twenty years old. She had never been on good terms with her step-mother and, after her father's removal, the antipathy between the two ladies increased. There were frequent quarrels and eventually the elder lady turned the younger out of the house. The daughter appealed to the courts and Judge Bischoff has now decided that she is entitled to the use of a good room in her father's house and to be reimbursed with the cost of her board between the date of her expulsion and the day on which she came of age. Thus the girl's right to a home under her father's roof is legally established. Doubtless, she will now take advantage of it and not rest satisfied with knowing that it is her right. In doing so she will be wiser than some Christians who although sons of God do not exercise the privileges of sonship which are assured to them. (Gal. 4: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. E. P. Marvin has been holding meetings at North Evans, N. Y. His recent meetings at Syracuse and Oneida were greatly blessed.

Miss Frances E. Willard in company with Lady Henry Somerset received an ovation at the famous English racing town of Doncaster, where they addressed two large audiences on temperance.

The new series of Sunday Theatre services in Brooklyn opened on Jan. 8 with a service in the Grand Opera House in Elm Place conducted by Rev. A. C. Dixon of the Hanson Place Baptist Church.

An English lady who has been making a tour of the world, recently sent a large donation to the British and Foreign Bible Society with the remark, "The more I have traveled, the more I have seen the good Bible Societies are doing and also the need of that work."

A large meeting called in response to a numerously signed requisition was held Jan. 8, in Chickering Hall, New York, to listen to John Philip Quinn's anti-gambling exposures. It is probable that an anti-gambling association will be the result of Mr. Quinn's work in the city.

Rev. Francis E. Smiley is conducting union meetings at East Liverpool, O. On Jan. 29, he goes to Bound Brook, N. J., for ten days and thence to Bradford, Penn., commencing there on Feb. 8. Mr. Charles Alexander of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is associated with Mr. Smiley as director of the musical exercises.

Evangelist H. W. Brown has been laboring for several weeks in the churches of Seattle, Wash. The Post-Intelligencer of that city reports large meetings and striking results. More than three hundred persons have made a profession of faith during Mr. Brown's stay in the city. At the Y.M.C.A. meetings for men only, the evangelist made earnest addresses on social purity and organized a White Cross League.

Rev. Thomas Harrison's meetings in Jane Street Church, New York, are developing in interest and power. There have been several remarkable conversions including those of prominent business men. On Sunday, Jan. 8, the church was crowded from pulpit to entrance. Many persons were enquiring the way of salvation. Mr. Harrison's engagement was for one week of reunion meetings, but the interest has been so marked that he has been urged to prolong his stay with the church.

The Cremorne Mission, established by the late Jerry McAulay, in Thirty-second street, New York, celebrated its eleventh anniversary on Jan. 12. Mr. J. N. Stearns presided, and among the speakers were: Dr. A. Kittredge, Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle; F. A. Palmer, president of the Broadway National Bank, and several superintendents of other missions in New York. Miss Louise Shepherd of Mr. Simpson's church sang to her own accompaniment on a zither. It was stated that $4,000 was urgently needed by the mission. A collection amounting to $1,000 was taken up.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman formerly of Bethany Church, Philadelphia, has been much blessed in his labors in Lincoln, Neb. In the early days of the meetings Dr. Chapman spoke as often as five times daily. For several evenings overflow gatherings were necessary and Dr. Chapman addressed audiences in both places. On Sundays services were held in the new Opera House. The Lincoln correspondent of a contemporary writes: "More than 2,000 men were present at one meeting. Hundreds who never thought much of such things stood up, and Dr. Chapman himself declared he had never had a more satisfactory and cheering audience of men."

The union services in Dayton, O., conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall, have resulted in a large ingathering of souls. No less than 413 cards have been signed by persons who have been under religious impression during the revival, declaring their faith in Christ and indicating the churches of which they will become members. About a dozen denominations are represented in the list. Presbyterians and Methodists are at the head. Each of those churches will receive ninety accessions from the revival. The Reformed Church has 58, the United Brethren 48, the Baptist 44, the Lutheran 28; the remainder are scattered among various denominations.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

POWER AND PEACE.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, January 15th, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

"The Lord will give strength unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace." Psalm 29: 11.

THE twenty-ninth psalm is a striking illustration of the majesty and glory of God as displayed in a thunder storm. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to find in any other literature so sublime a description as this of a storm of thunder and lightning. Perowne calls attention to the fact that we have here the suggestion of the storm marching from north to south, the desolation and terror which it causes, the peal of the thunder, the flash of the lightning, the gathering of the storm, and finally the lull of the elements when the storm has passed. He also emphasizes the thought that the psalm consists of five parts: a prelude, the body of the psalm, consisting itself of three divisions, and the conclusion.

All expositors are impressed with the artificial elaboration and symmetrical structure of the psalm, some affirming that there is no specimen of Hebrew poetry in which these features are more marked; but all are agreed, at the same time, that this elaboration in composition does not check the force and fire of the poet's native genius or his divine afflatus. We see that he moves in as he describes the rising and progress of the storm. He sings throughout the psalm a strain of triumphant exultation. At once our thoughts are lifted from earth to heaven as the psalm opens by an appeal to the angels who stand before the throne of God, and who are summoned to praise him who reveals his glory in the rolling thunder and in the flashing lightning. Beginning with the third verse and going to the end of the ninth, we have the main body of the poem. This portion of the psalm consists of three strophes, and the critics call attention to the fact that they are so constructed that the first, consisting of verses three and four, gives us the beginning of the storm. Its low, faint muttering in the distant heavens is heard in these stanzas. In the second strophe, verses 5-7, we have a description of the storm at its height when it crashes the cedars and shakes the lofty mountains in its fury. In the last strophe, verses eight and nine, we see the storm passing over the country to the forest of Kadesh, where it dies away in silence and peace.

Still more striking is the fact that the characteristics of these three strophes, forming, as we have said, the main body of the psalm, are found in each strophe in itself. A careful examination of each, and especially the reading of the psalm in the Hebrew, will bring out these characteristics with equal clearness and beauty; and the psalm thus studied becomes musical and beautiful beyond description. We may hear one peal after another, reverberating along the sky, the storm reaching its and then becoming silent as it blends in the music and songs of the heavenly host in the temple singing glory unto Jehovah. When we reach the conclusion of the psalm we are beautifully reminded that Jehovah, who raises the storm to its wildest uproar, can also still the elements into a sabbatic peace; that he, whose mighty power was seen in the march of the tempest, is seen also in the stilling of the storm and in giving strength and peace to his people. Delitzsch has finely said that the psalm begins with a gloria in excelsis and ends with a pax in terris.

The psalm teaches that when the thunder rolls over the sea and the land, and the lightnings flash along the sky, religion keeps the soul in perfect peace, lifting it up in adoring contemplation and filling it with calm trust in him, who can control this elemental strife. All these fierce storms are under the direction of a hand of infinite love and power. They [illegible] not governed by caprice; they are raised and hushed at the voice of Jehovah, a very sweet expression seven times uttered in this sublime psalm.

Looking more closely at the text, you see that it is the conclusion and application of the thought which underlies the entire description. It teaches that the God who controls the storm is able to defend his people; that he will use his amazing power to protect his chosen; that his children need not fear when the thunder rolls, when the lightning flashes, nor when the trees are broken in the forest, for God rules over all nature and the stormy wind simply obeys his mighty word. This is the argument of the psalmist.

That is a very superficial exposition which finds here only a description of a thunder storm, sublime and majestic. Grand as is the description it is not given for its own sake; nor for mere poetical effect. It is rather a ground of hope and to believers that this mighty God, who is thus audible and visible in nature, "who presided at the flood and is to reign forever," is pledged to use his great power for the good of his people. The text really gives the keynote of the whole psalm, which may have been composed during a great storm.

Two great blessings are here promised to the people of God—strength and peace. The people of God are in need of daily strength for the performance of daily duty. They have to contend against enemies who are numerous and powerful, while in themselves they are weak and unworthy. They have to contend against Satan and all his hosts. Their conflict is not against flesh and blood; such a conflict would be serious in the extreme. But the Apostle Paul, in writing to the Ephesians, clearly teaches us that we wrestle against the rulers of the darkness of this world, and against spiritual wickedness in high places. The devil is not dead; he is still a mighty adversary going about seeking whom he may devour. He is at the head of a wide and powerful empire; he leads on the hosts of darkness against the children of God.

Every Christian is a Soldier who must endure hardness and fight valiantly. Satan attacked our Lord himself, and we may be sure that he will repeat the attack upon all the true followers of Christ. Over the children of the world he rules with absolute dominion; they are taken captives at his will, but Christians are rebels against his authority; they have escaped from his tyrannous sway. Against them, therefore, he hurls his fiery darts with the utmost fury, malice and malignity. But let not the children of God be discouraged. In Jesus Christ we are promised we shall come off more than conquerors. He defeated Satan in the wilderness, hurling the crown from his brow and striking the sceptre from his hand. Satan has never recovered from the completeness of that defeat. The promise given at the gate of Eden is that the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent. The day is coming when that promise shall be literally fulfilled; the time will soon arrive when we shall completely bruise Satan under our feet, when we shall rejoice in a transcendent victory over the last of our foes.

Christians have also to contend with the world. It is not the friend of God, indeed it never can be. It is as unwilling to-day as ever it was to make an unconditional surrender to Jesus Christ. It cannot, it is true, break out in the old forms of pagan and papal opposition to the saints of God; but the spirit of enmity to the truth still exists. There is continually raging between the king of darkness and the God of light, between the children of God and the children of the world. Often the world's smiles are more dangerous than its frowns; often its promises are more hurtful than its threatenings. When it cannot allure Christians from their fealty, it charges them with being hypocrites, and thus attempts to win them from their loyalty. When it cannot induce them to desert the ranks of loyal soldiers, it will load them with reproaches and hold them up to scorn; but great as is the power of this worldly opposition, and subtle as is the spirit of this secular life, the world is still a defeated foe. Our triumphant Lord before leaving his disciples, said: "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." In God we, too, may overcome the world. This truth is also clearly taught us when it is distinctly said: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." In the midst of this wildest storm of worldly opposition, a storm fitly represented by the crash of elements in this 29th Psalm, we may be assured that peace will come to our souls, as truly as this fierce hurricane was hushed and as a sweet calm followed. Jesus, the mighty God, will be our peace. We shall triumphantly sing even amid the thunder, because we know that soon it will be succeeded by the calmness which the world can neither give nor take away, "but thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

The Enemy in the Citadel.

Christians have also to contend against their remaining depravity. Large portions of the heart are still at times occupied by the enemy. Although the enemy has capitulated he is not exterminated; there is danger that he may still revive and again assert his power. It is true that the new life is implanted, but the old is not entirely destroyed; the old man is dying but is not yet dead. He is crucified, but he dies slowly as well as painfully. The believer joyfully affirms that the sin within him is not dominant sin, but he must also at the same time painfully admit that it is not dormant sin. The Apostle Paul teaches us that there is a fierce conflict between the old nature and the new; that as there is a dual nature within us there is often also a fierce duel within us. He cries out that when he would do good evil is present with him, and that there is a law of sin warring against the law of the mind and drawing him into captivity. Painful and humiliating is his cry, "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" But glorious is his note of triumph as he passes from the seventh to the eighth chapters of Romans chanting, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The Source of Power.

We thus see that the believers have great need of strength. They are led because of their conscious need to lay hold of the sweet promise given in the text; they are able thus rightly to estimate this precious promise. Conscious of enemies without and traitors within, they rejoice to know that "Jehovah will give strength unto his people." They shall be delivered from this present evil world; they shall still occasionally be hindered by sin, but it shall not have dominion over them. They shall still be tempted, but not above that they are able to bear. With his right hand God will uphold them amid the trials of life and the sharp pains of death; and by his power he will keep them through faith unto salvation in time and in eternity.

The next blessing promised in this precious text is God's own peace. Peace is the great blessing of the Gospel. The angels sang the song of peace the night when Christ was born. Peace was the legacy which Christ promised his disciples just before his crucifixion, and his resurrection salutation was, "Peace be unto you." God by the Apostle also is beautifully described as the "God of peace."

The believer has peace with God. We are born in sin and so are the children of wrath even as others. We are enemies to God by wicked hearts and wicked acts. Sin is the thing which God hates with a perfect hatred. It is opposed to all his glorious attributes and gracious promises; it justly merits his wrath and assuredly will be visited with his sore displeasure. Men and women in their natural state cannot have Peace with God.

It is affirmed by God that there is no peace, no true and abiding peace, to the wicked. We are commanded to acquaint ourselves with God that we may enter into his peace. When Christ had forgiven the sins of the wretched woman before him, he said, "go in peace." She had never known genuine peace until her sins were forgiven and her soul was made white by the cleansing power of Christ. Jesus Christ is our true peace. He makes peace between a sinful soul and a holy God. Out of Christ God is a consuming fire; but Christ heals the breach which sin has made; extinguishes the fire of justice and fills the soul with the peace of God. By his cross he has slain the enmity between God and man; and he has reconciled man to God by his own blood. By his stripes we are healed; on him our sins were laid, and by his infinite sacrifice divine justice was appeased.

True Christians also have peace with themselves. There is war in the heart of every unconverted man. Sin brings guilt and guilt brings shame and fear. Sin and sorrow are related as are substance and shadow. So long as men sin, in this life or in the life that is to come, they must suffer. No human ingenuity can interrupt the operation of the law that sin brings suffering. There are times when conscience will arouse itself; times when its thunder will roll and its lightnings flash and burn. "A wounded spirit who can bear?" At such a time,

When the Soul Seeks Christ,

he comes with his pardoning mercy; as the balm of Gilead he comes to the wounded heart; with his love he heals the bruised spirit and with gentle power he binds up the broken heart. He speaks peace unto his people and to his saints; he gives to them beauty for ashes; the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. We are distinctly taught in Scripture that the work of righteousness is peace and that they who love God will have great peace, while the wicked are like the troubled sea whose waves can never be at rest but cast up mire and dirt. Oh sweet blessing of peace for the tired soul! Not more marked was the stillness that followed the storm as it swept to the south and rolled over the forest of Kadesh, than is the peace which comes from a sense of forgiveness after the soul has been tortured by a sense of sin. True Christians may have peace through all the trials of life. Trials must come; they are inseparable from the experiences of life and duty. Every life has its own sorrow and every heart its peculiar cross. Every believer must enter some furnace for and the purification of the gold in his Christian character. Christians are not promised exemption from trial; but they are promised a final victory over trial. They shall not be kept from trial; but they shall be kept in trial. Those who have cast all their sin upon Christ learn also to cast all their care upon Christ. They "know that all things work together for good to them that love God;" they know that though they are troubled on every side, they shall not be cast down; though perplexed, they shall not be in despair. Death to them has no terrors, for they know that precious in the sight of God is the death of his saints; they know that God will keep in perfect peace those whose trust is in him. How sweet are the secrets between God and his people. How glorious is the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us!

The text suggests the character of the persons to whom this peace is promised. It is clear that the promise is not to all men irrespective of their character and their relations to God. These blessings are for those who are the people of God. The Bible gives us many texts by which they may know who are truly God's people. True ministers of Christ must rightly divide the word of instruction; they must cut it straight, as the language of the apostle really means; they must not give to the foes of God the promises intended only for the friends of God; they must not apply the comforts of the Gospel to those who need first its warnings. Only those who really feel their need of strength will seek

The Blessing of Peace.

The mere worldling is unconscious of the power of his spiritual foes, and so he does not seek the necessary spiritual strength. If you know to-day that you are not one of God's people, then the blessings of strength and peace are not yours. You have neither part nor lot in either blessing; you are without strength and without peace. You may say "peace, peace"; but it is a false peace. It is a peace which comes from a pacified but seared conscience. You may lull conscience to sleep now, but it will some day have a fearful awaking. Oh that God would arouse you to-day! Oh that he would strike conviction to your heart now! In the words of Scripture we would warn you that to-day you harden not your hearts. Seek God with all the heart and his peace will be yours; give him your trust and he will give you his peace.

In the psalm which we have discussed there is a sublime description of God's power in a thunder-storm; but this power is only a faint shadow of that which he will display on the great day when "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." Oh, to-day seek Jesus Christ as your personal friend and Saviour; then shall you be found in him, having that peace which he alone can bestow; then you will sweetly experience in life and death, in time and eternity, that Jehovah will give strength unto his people; that Jehovah will bless his people with peace!

"LOVING GOD."

WHILE a theological student at Rochester, writes Mr. W. C. Wilkinson, I undertook a quasi-pastoral charge for a time, of a small country church some twelve miles distant, too poor to maintain a resident minister. As I could command leisure for the purpose, I used to visit the people of the community, from house to house, with the errand of the Gospel in free and familiar personal talk.

It was near nightfall of a lovely summer Saturday, that I called at the house of a prosperous young farmer, of whom I had previously heard as a man of excellent moral character, but whom I had never met before. I found him frank and friendly in manner, and there was no obstacle to easy conversation.

After a few preliminary commonplaces exchanged between us, the transition was natural enough to the benevolence of God as displayed in the bounty of nature. My sentiments on this topic met a cheerful and ready response.

"Strange," said I, "that so few of us love God, when we all of us think him so good. Do you love him?" I asked suddenly and bluntly, just as I would have asked any other question which could imply no offence.

"Why, as to that," said he, "I should consider that everybody ought to love God."

"Yes, no doubt of that. Still the obligation to love him and loving him are not quite the same. You admit you ought to love him; now do you love him? How as to that?"

It was rather closer quarters than he had prepared himself for But he made up his mind to face his dilemma.

"Well—yes—I believe I do love God," he answered, manfully resolved to take a step forward without well knowing whither it would lead him.

"You still answer a little uncertainly. You believe you love God. We generally know when we love any one. There are several pretty sure signs."

"What signs?"

"The signs of love are not difficult to recognize. You easily perceive a mother's love for her children or a boy's love for his mother. If you ask a good husband if he loves his wife he would scarcely be likely to say, 'I believe I do.' He would know that he did. Why does the father or the mother look so sad? Their child is sick and they are afraid they will lose it. Do they love it? You see they do. Then there are other signs.

"For instance, if we love any one we think of that one often. This is so much the case that it has come to be an equivalent phrase. We say of one that we love, 'I think a great deal of so-and-so.' Isn't this so?"

"Yes. I am even more apt to say I think a great deal of a person than that I love him."

"Well, now apply that test to your love for God. Do you think a great deal of God?"

The man hesitated.

"Have you thought of him to-day?"

"Can't say that I have."

"This week?"

"Couldn't be certain that I have."

"Within a month?"

"Well, yes. I should say that I have thought of God within a month."

"And do you suppose you average a thought of God once a month?"

"I think I do."

"Is thinking of God twelve times a year thinking a good deal of God—is it loving him."

The man was silent.

"There is another test. We are certain to talk of those whom we love. A mother knows who are her son's favorite companions at school—he has so much to say about them. You can consider within yourself how much you spontaneously talk about God."

Something in the spirit of our conversation, I suppose it was, or perhaps it was wholly a heavenly influence breathed into the man, that made him not merely patient under this cross-examination, but even desirous, apparently, to feel the probe thrust deeper yet into the quick.

"One more test of love," I said. "We are fond of doing things for those whom we love. You are industrious, honest, truthful, kind-hearted, your neighbors say. Why are you so? Have you a thought in it of pleasing God? Do you say ever to yourself, 'Now this I will do because it will please God, for I love him?'"

That candid witness against himself confessed that he could not remember having ever in the whole course of his life done a single act for the sake of pleasing God. The evening drew on, and I bade him good-night. I never knew whether he found out afterwards how industry, honesty, truthfulness, and kindness, became transfigured from a task into a delight, when they are animated with the loving spirit of a conscious personal love to a personal God revealed and accessible in Christ Jesus.

It is said: The early Christians were accustomed to bid their dying friends "Good-night," so sure were they of their awakening on the "Resurrection Morning."

HELP THE CHILDREN.

[The following lines were suggested to the writer as he was walking about the streets of West Kansas City looking into the faces of hundreds of little children who have never heard of a Saviour's love.]

WE are toiling without ceasing,
For the souls in distant lands;
Oft forgetting those so near us,
Those who plead with outstretched hands.

Let us not forget the children
Who are living at our door,
As we teach the distant heathen;
Sending them of God's rich store.

In our cities great and sinful,
There is labor for us all,
To reclaim the lost, forsaken;
Is the "special work" and "call."

In our cities fields are ripening,
Whitening for the reaper's hand;
Shall we let the grain be wasted,
Heeding not our Lord's command?

In our cities many children,
Know not of a Saviour's love,
Know not that he died to save them;
For a brighter home above.

Let us gather in the children,
Sinful outcasts though they be,
Tell them of the blessed Jesus;
How he died to make them free!

A MESSAGE FROM PARADISE.

WHAT mean you by this weeping
To break my very heart?
We both are in Christ's keeping,
And therefore cannot part.

What if the clouds surround you,
You can the brightness see,
'Tis only just a little way
That leads from you to me.

I was so very weary,
Surely you could not mourn,
That I a little sooner
Should lay my burden down.

Then weep not, weep not, darling;
God wipes away all tears,
'Tis only yet a little while
Though you may call it—years.

It was Christ, himself, who originated the comparison. See John 3; 14. He was teaching Nicodemus the nature of faith and he reminded him of an event in the national history when such faith as he demanded was exercised with saving effect.

THE PREDICTED RESTITUTION.

What the Characteristics of the Millennium will be According to Scripture

THE anticipation of some sort of blissful change to come upon this sad and sinful earth after its long-continued storms and sorrows is, in one form or another, very general. Even those who despise God's word and rely on human prognostications or scientific researches for their date, prophesy with greater or less distinctness of meaning a future Millennium. This belief is indeed so general that the coming of the Millennium has even passed into a current newspaper phrase. With all those who take God's Word for their guide, the expectation of such a time of coming blessedness, in some form, is universal. But what is to be the character of the change? How far is it to affect this earth and the race? What are its attendants and its time?

Let no one suppose, from the existing great diversity of views, that the Scripture expressions concerning this event are meagre or doubtful. On the contrary, they are very striking and comprehensive. They arrest attention at once.

It is called first a "Regeneration," a new creation, a second birth—Palingenessia. Surely this implies a vast and comprehensive and thorough change, and a change on the habitable earth. Again, it is so vast and comprehensive that the whole creation is depicted as groaning and travailing in pain, waiting to be admitted into "the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. 8 : 21–22). And it is represented as so glorious, that even believers also with the firstfruits of the Spirit are groaning and waiting for this day; the day of the redemption of the body; when they shall be manifested to be the Sons of God. It is called by the Apostle Peter a "restitution of all things" (Acts 3: 21), implying that there is no department of creation that has been impaired which will not feel the influence of the restitution. It is represented both by the Old Testaments (Isaiah 65: 17–66–22) and New Testament apostles (II Peter 3 : 13 ; Rev. 21: 1) as "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness;" a complete, all-pervading, blessed, abiding change. And to close all: In the prophecy which foreshadows it as accomplished, the change is represented as total as it is glorious; and we hear the voice of the king on the throne saying, "Behold I make all things new."

1. There is promised a thorough renewing, physical and spiritual, of the earth and the race; "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousuess;" "a kingdom of God under the whole heaven that shall abide forever." For so the Prophets Isaiah and Daniel distinctly declare, and the Apostle John sets it forth in symbol just as plainly.

2. That this kingdom of God, promised from the beginning, is identified with, and must not be expected independently of, this earth on which we tread. For Isaiah and all the prophets, in every prophecy, speak of Israel when restored as abiding here for ever. They testify that all the nations of the earth from generation to generation are to worship the Lord in this renewed earth, and the Apostle John in the Book of the Revelations makes no note of any other condition of things up to the very last chapter.

3. That this regeneration is to take place in the visible presence of God's King, the Lord Jesus, who "shall reign in Mount Zion and before his ancients gloriously." For to his presence, not only Isaiah witnesses but Daniel also, and Jeremiah and Zechariah, as already shown, speaking of him sometimes as David's Son, sometimes as the true David, sometimes as the Lord, our Righteousness. So does Christ himself witness, for he says he will personally come to the earth, and will cast out of the kingdom all that offends; and "then the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." And none can mistake the Apostle John's declaration that it is in the visible presence of the returned Christ that the reign on earth shall take place.

4. That the saints of God from all ages shall reign with Christ over the nations of the saved, the dead saints being raised in the first resurrection, the living saints changed, and both caught up and glorified. For so the Prophet Zechariah declares: "The Lord my God shall come and all the saints with him." So Enoch testified before the flood. (Jude 14, 15.) And so Paul declares: "If we suffer we shall reign with him"—that is, reign when he reigns. So Christ declares: "He that overcometh shall sit with me on my throne." So John declares: "They lived and reigned with

THE SMALL BEGINNING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 29, 1893. Zech. 4: 10; Job 8: 5-7.

NO better illustration of the truth set forth in the passages selected for the topic could be found than in the movement the birth of which we celebrate this week. Very small and insignificant was the little gathering which twelve years ago inaugurated the Society which has spread over Chistendom. Comparatively small as the mustard-seed to which the Master likened the kingdom of God, it has grown until it is the wonder of the world. But while we rejoice in the mighty organization which with its Baptist and Methodist sisters is working for Christ in the world, we must not forget the source of its strength. The two olive trees which the prophet saw standing by the golden candlestick were the sources of its light. The wealth and influence of the Society, like the gold of the candlestick do not suffice for light-giving. If the connection with the source of strength is severed the candlestick, though it be of gold, will not fulfil its mission. The words addressed to Job show what that connection is. "If thou wert pure and upright." Purity and integrity are essential to continued usefulness. God does sometimes use impure men to accomplish his purposes, but they are his tools, not his sons, and they are cast aside when the work is done. It is not of those that the passage speaks the promise, "thy latter end shall greatly increase." We are too apt in these days to lay greater stress on creed than on conduct, but creeds may have little influence on life and it is the life that the world sees and by which it judges. The principle of growth is the same in the individual soul in the organization and in nature. There must be life and nourishment and these can come to us from only one source, and in only one way. He that began the good work is able to perfect it and he will continue to perfect it so long as it preserves its purity and integrity. When it ceases to perform its functions with a single mind to the advancement of Christ's kingdom within us and around us, it will soon cease to be. Therefore, the prayer offered this week should be for more of God's Spirit rather than for increase of numbers. That will come in God's way and time.

THE FATHER OF THE Y. M. C. A.

NEARLY fifty years ago a young man in the employ of Messrs. Hitchcock & Co., the dry-goods merchants in St. Paul's churchyard, London, was holding a prayer-meeting of the young men of the establishment in an upper room of the building. It was then a startling innovation, but the head of the firm countenanced it and great good resulted. That beginning made, the young man became concerned about the spiritual condition of other young men in the city, of whom there were at least 150,000 engaged in banks or in trade, and sought to help them. A society was formed for "Improving the Spiritual Condition of Young Men." The Society changed its name afterward to the Young Men's Christian Association by which it and the multitude of societies which are its offspring are known in every Christian land. The name of the young man who established the prayer-meeting and organized the Society was George Williams, and his portrait, no longer representing a young man, appears on this page. Mr. Williams rose to a partnership in the house which he entered in humble capacity as a boy and he is now one of London's most respected merchants; but with increased demands on his time and attention, his interest in the organization over whose birth he presided, has never waned. He is deeply concerned as ever in the welfare of the Association, and many a liberal gift from his pocket has relieved struggling institutions in provincial towns of their burdens, and given encouragement to their friends to redouble their efforts.

THE TENEMENT HOUSE CHAPTER.

IT is gratifying to learn that the Tenement House Chapter of the King's Daughters in New York have been enabled to arrange for the opening of the long desired kindergarten. Miss Dodge has kindly added to her many benefactions by giving the Chapter the furniture and appliances requisite for the institution. The first report of the work recently presented by Miss Clara Field indicates not only how much good has been accomplished but how urgently such work was needed in the great city. She says: "We have kept up a large Fresh Air Work, and have found our back-yard an invaluable play ground. Some forty children a day; twenty in the morning and twenty in the afternoon, have found it a welcome change from the noisy streets, narrow alleys, and crowded tenements. Its influence became apparent in the neighborhood, and the children were overheard saying one to another, 'If you do this,' or 'If you do that, they won't let you into "The King's Garden."' A meagre little spot, it seemed to us, who had come from the beautiful country, to claim such a blessed name, but if it was doing the King's work, it was worthy of the name. Even now, when the weather is so dark and chilly, the children are only too happy to gain access to it.

We have just started a Penny Provident Fund, and it is interesting to see the little things coming in with their pennies and going off with their bank-books as proud as the owners of fortunes. We hope very soon to draw the little girls into a Saturday morning sewing-class, and an afternoon club for the boys is projected. We are negotiating for a lease of the whole house, in order to control it, subletting the two upper floors, until we can afford to keep them for our own use, and we are very happy now in the prospect that Miss Dodge's Annex Working Girls' Club will use our rooms and take in our girls, which will give us at once all the benefits of their experience and a well organized, successful club, and add to our income as well.

Our special needs now, next to personal work and money, are for warm clothing, shoes, stockings, and flannels; warm outside garments and some thick dresses for children; anything in the way of fruits and vegetables and delicacies for the sick; bandages, lint, and old linen for the injured, and picture books and toys for the children—all are welcome." They may be sent to our headquarters, 77 Madison St., New York.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Epworth League is intended for a spiritual force in the work of the church, being something more than a mere social and literary club. It does do social and literary work, but its chief aim is to reach out and save the perishing. At the late session of the Illinois conference one brother reported that of 1,000 conversions which had occurred 800 of them had been through the instrumentality of the League. In some churches the League has greatly helped in financial matters. Grace Church Chapter, Thankakee, Ill., has pledged $100 toward the payment of the church debt, being one dollar per member. In Norway, the League is making rapid advance. Chapters have been organized at Stockholm, Upsola, Talm, Norberg and Laxa. The annual Epworth excursion to the home of the Wesley family in England, will be postponed this year on account of the World's Fair and the International Epworth Convention. Many Chapters have arranged for a series of entertainments through the winter season. Rev. J. J. Hill recently gave a lecture entitled "A Talk to Young Men" to the Chapter at Claysville, Pa. It was much appreciated by all those that heard it.

A beautiful incident, which deserves to be an example widely followed, is reported to the Epworth Herald by a correspondent who says: A delightful reception was recently given by the chapter of Trinity Church, Newburgh, N. Y., Dr. J. J. Reed, pastor, to the "old folks." It was Dr. Reed's suggestion, but the young folks worked it. They invited to dinner those who, in days long gone by, had toiled and sacrificed and prayed for Trinity Church. Carriages were sent for all over seventy years of age, and more than seventy-gve of the veterans responded, including some who were present at the corner-stone laying of the original church. After the dinner a beautiful address of welcome was spoken by the president of the league, and half a dozen of the guests responded with brief and touching reminiscences.

A FLOURISHING UNION.

THE eleventh anniversary of the Baptist Young People's Union of Philadelphia, recently celebrated, shows it to be one of the most vigorous as well as one of the oldest in the country. In point of age it is antedated only by the Union in Brooklyn, N. Y. There are at present 56 churches and missions represented in the Union with a total registration of 3,670 members in Young People's societies. The following gleaned from the annual report, published by the Young People's Union, will show some of the activities of the organization: There are seven districts. Six are officered and working ; five of them very successfully. In these five districts 148 visits have been made to Young People's prayer-meetings by 1,241 visitors, an average at each meeting of 9; ten of these being revival meetings. During these meetings there have been 55 requests for prayers and 9 conversions. 6,500 tracts and 350 Testaments have been personally distributed.

AT the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Y. M. C. A. of New Hampshire held at Concord recently, the subjects discussed were: The Association Idea of Physical Culture, The Young Men's Congress, The Claims of the Y. M. C. A. on the Time of a Busy Man, Does It Pay to Have an Association Building? Educational Classes, Social Work, Efficient Committeemen, The Personal Factor in Association Work, Business methods and Spiritual Equipment. A mass meeting for men was held in the Opera Hourse and addressed by J. L. Gordon of Boston. It was announced that an arrangement had been made whereby R. H. Shelton will assume the State Secretaryship of Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, giving to Maine six months and the other two States three each. The Y. M. C. A. of Concord has purchased a corner lot and is moving to secure subscriptions for the erection of a suitable building costing from $50,000 to $75,000.

The Family and Home Circle

A Mohammedan Festival.

How the Moslems of India Celebrate the Buckra Ede or Prayer Festival—An Imposing Spectacle of Devotion.

NOT a few of the Mohammedan festivals are identical in their origin at least with similar observances among the Jews. One of the most imposing of these celebrations among Moslems all over the world is held in commemoration of the faithfulness of Abraham and his willingness to sacrifice his son Ishmael (the Isaac of the Bible) at God's command. In India where this festival is observed with extreme fidelity by Orthodox Moslems, it is known as the Buckra Ede or Festival of Prayer and Sacrifice. The illustrations on this page give the reader an idea of the public character of the celebration in that country. These groups—each numbering over one thousand

MOHAMMEDAN WORSHIPPERS AT THE BUCKRA EDE FESTIVAL.

Moslems—assembled during the recent celebration at Naini Tal in the northwest provinces of India, many of them coming from a great distance to participate in the Feast of Sacrifice, which is held on the day of Zul Hijja and forms the last scene of the great annual pilgrimage to Mecca. It has many other names, some calling it the Baqr-i-id, others the Id-ul-azha, and the Arabs giving it an appellation which means, translated, "the Great Feast."

Concerning this festival, a writer in the London Graphic explains: "Although later commentators have identified this sacrifice with the one contemplated by Abraham in Jewish history, the origin seems to have been merely the recognition that the shedding of blood must be an essential feature of the remission of sin, and in the Mohammedan rite either a cow or a sheep, a goat, or a camel may be slaughtered, provided that it is without blemish. Jellaluddin Suyty was the first Mohammedan commentator who declared that the festival was instituted in commemoration of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son. He states that when Ibrahim founded Mohammedanism the Lord desired him to prepare a feast for him. Upon Ibrahim (the friend of God!) requesting to know what he would have on the occasion, the Lord replied, "Offer up thy son Ismail." A more common version is to the the effect that Ibrahim, being a good man, was called upon to make a sacrifice. He first made one of a camel, the next morning one of a horse, the next a goat, and so on for one hundred mornings. Still God required more of him and, according to the legend, said he must bring his best beloved object, when he brought his son.

At Mecca, and in India the people assemble for prayer at the Idgah. After prayers they return to their houses. The head of the family then takes a sheep, or a cow, or a camel to the entrance of the house, and sacrifices it repeating the words, "In the name of the great God," and cutting its throat. The flesh of the cow or other animal is then divided, two-thirds of it being retained by the family, and one-third going to the poor in God's name.

The Buckra Ede Festival is celebrated throughout Mohammedan India with not less fervor than by the pilgrims at Mecca. A certain number of the audience or congregation have performed the pilgrimage themselves, and they set an example of devotion to those who have not. The Buckra Ede is the nearest resemblance in Mohammedanism to the Christian doctrine of the Atonement, and bears a striking similitude to the sacrifices in the Old Testament.

Among the ordinances of Islam may also be reckoned the Saghir, or minor, and the Kebir, or great festivals. The first (Al-Fetr, or breaking the fast), following immediately upon the Ramadan, begins on the first day of the month of Shawal, and lasts three days. The second (Eed Al-Kurban, or sacrifice) begins on the tenth day of Dsu'l Heggeh, when the pilgrims perform their sacrifice, and lasts three or four days. It is intended to be the most important of the two, but the people have in most places changed the order, and now make the lesser festival following the Ramadan the most joyful and the longest. The day set aside for the weekly day of rest is Friday, not, as is generally supposed, because both the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday were to be avoided, but because, from times long before Mohammed, the people used to hold public assemblies for civil as well as religious purposes on Friday.

The celebration of the Moslem day of religious solemnity is far less strict than is the custom with the other eastern religions. After service the people return to their worldly affairs, if they cannot afford to give themselves up to pleasure for the day.

Beautiful Lives.

EVERY man feels instinctively, wrote James Russell Lowell, that all the beautiful sentiments in the world weigh less than a single lovely action; and that while tenderness of feeling and susceptibility of generous emotion are accidents of life, permanent goodness is an achievement and a quality of the life. "Fine words," says one homely old proverb, "butter no parsnips;" and if the question be how to render those vegetables palatable, an ounce of butter would be worth more than all the orations of Cicero. The only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he gives himself for a principle. Words, money, all things else, are comparatively easy to give away; but when a man makes a gift of his daily life and practice, it is plain that the truth, or whatever it may be, has taken possession of him. From that sincerity his words gain the force and pertinency of deeds, and his money is no longer the pale drudge 'twixt man and man, but, by a beautiful magic, what ere-while bore the image and superscription of Cæsar seems to bear the image and superscription of God.

LIFE'S LESSONS.

INTO each heart the evil thoughts will steal,
And rob the beauty from the purest life;
Leaving the soul with bitter, sorrow rife
And causing wounds that time can scarcely heal

No chain is stronger than its weakest link,
In word and deed we build for good or ill;
A sudden strain will swerve the stoutest will;
Our acts no better than the thoughts we think.

We fall, but rise again; if we but seek
New courage and a higher ideal live,
Each failure use to step above, and give
New hope and trusting faith to hearts still weak.

Thus day by day, life's lessons we are taught,
In weakness gaining strength of mind and heart,
Ready to speak the works and act the part
Of heroes who a life long fight have fought.

"Trying to Help God."

HERE is a charming little incident which illustrates the thoughtfulness of childhood—a quality we are apt very much to undervalue. A little girl seeing the servant throw the crumbs into the fire, said:

"Don't you know that God takes care of the sparrows?"

"If God takes care of them," was the careless reply, "we need not trouble ourselves about them."

"But," said the little girl, "I had rather be like God, and help him take care of the little birds, than scatter or waste the food that he gives us."

She carefully collected what was left of the crumbs and threw them out of the window. In a short time several little birds flew eagerly to the spot, and picked up the crumbs she had scattered. After this she every day collected the crumbs that fell around the table, and threw them out of the window for the little birds; and during all the winter these little creatures came regularly after each meal to partake of the food thus provided for their support. This was her idea of "helping God."

Korean Mothers and Daughters.

THE Koreans have no schools for their daughters, but high-class girls learn to write and read the Enmoun at home, says a correspondent of Woman's Work for Woman. They are taught by their mothers, grandmothers and sometimes by their fathers. This knowledge is of little use, however, as all their epistolary correspondence is simply an exchange of compliments and their books of any value are written in the Chinese character. It is a rare thing for a Korean lady under fifty years of age to pay a visit or to call, even on her own mother, and as they do no fancywork, no drawing, painting or piano playing, and have only the simplest kind of housekeeping to look after, it is hard to see just how the high class women kill time. When visiting from house to house, I have always found them either smoking, sewing or doing nothing.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PASSING BELL.

RICHARD RUPERT was walking along a street in Louisville, the street on which stood Uncle Barlow's house. Richard had not been in Louisville since the night when he took the penitent Dora back to her foster-father, only to find her rejected and banished. Now he had business in the city, and resolved to call on the deserted old man, who having "washed his hands" of every one who displeased him, found toward the end of life, his hands very cold and empty, indeed.

It was a warm September day. Upon the mountain, at Hotel Marot, the children were rioting in orchards loaded with peaches, plums, sweet apples and golden pears. All the wealth of Pomona seemed to be poured out on tree and vine, and a rich, spicy fragrance rolled out upon the mellow air. But here was Uncle Barlow's home, dark and silent, with closed shutters, and in a back parlor where sun seldom shone, sat Uncle Barlow alone beside the fire, and looking worn, shrivelled, miserable.

"O, yes; Richard Rupert. I remember you, though I have not seen you very often. Sit down, I'm glad to see you."

"And I am sorry to see you looking so poorly, Mr. Barlow. What seems to be the matter?"

"Nothing in particular and everything in general. A break up, I suppose. I've been running down since Christmas. We must all come to it, I know. Human fate, and I haven't any energy to fight against it."

"Come, come," said Richard, "cheer up. You are not so old a man as my father, by ten years, and he is hale and hearty. I think what keeps him up is, that he interests himself in things, has his family about him, keeps at his work, and goes out into the sunshine regularly."

"Well, he's different from me. I don't interest myself in anything, I live alone, except for three old darkies to do the work. I gave up business long ago. I had enough for myself, what did I want to accumulate for?"

"Accumulation itself is a pleasure to some people; but my father does better than that, he gives largely, and he can say as Job: 'When the ear heard me then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me it gave witness to me. Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me; and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'"

"I suppose he has had children that were some comfort to him. I had none, but I was fool enough to take my two nieces instead, and you see how they turned out."

"They are turning out to be noble and useful women. It is true that they made very foolish unfortunate marriages, but you remember that they were deprived of the example, advice and care of a good mother, and in the matter of their associates and lovers they were left to themselves in the most dangerous period of life. It is between fifteen and eighteen that girls are likely to be led into some matrimonial folly. If they arrive at twenty or twenty-one, with unperverted judgment and taste, they are likely after that to choose wisely for themselves."

"I reckon I looked after the girls as well as their own mother would have done, or as most mothers do."

"Many mothers are very deficient in this regard, but most of them are not. I am sure you [illegible] have felt as if you were very poorly rewarded. [illegible] but you should feel corresponding joy in seeing [illegible] the girls becoming useful and admirable women."

"No," said Uncle Barlow, "I have washed my hands of them. I don't care any more about them, or what they do."

"See here," said Richard, "it is a bad look-out to harbor anger when we are on the verge of eternity, with surely only a little time to do our undone work. If I were you, I should now live in the Lord's Prayer spirit. 'Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us.' Call one of those girls home, to be your friend and nurse. Open your home to air and sun; drive out every day with your niece; see your friends; invite them in; visit the poor as you drive around, carrying the sick and needy little comforts. You will be happier, live longer, and so fill up your last days with bounty, that many shall mourn your dying."

Uncle Barlow shook his head. "You can't teach old dogs new tricks. I found humanity a bad lot and washed my hands of them long ago."

"Pilate washed his hands, if you'll remember, but did not get them the cleaner. We have a duty toward humanity."

"I've done my duty in every particular," said Uncle Barlow testily. "A great deal better, too, than most people you see. My hands are clean. There's no use to talk to me of changes, I won't change; and if you came to beg me to take one or both the girls back—I won't do it. There, that's flat."

"I came on no such errand," said Richard "Neither of the girls need help from any one. They are independent, self-supporting women. Dora lives with us, and gets a good salary as a daily governess. Eloise is in Plymouth, where she makes more than a living teaching music and elocution. Neither of them knew I was coming here. I did not know it myself yesterday morning."

"Have either of them heard from her husband again?"

"Not a word. Each one lives under her own name. Dora is no doubt a lawful wife, but has a terrible dread and dislike for the man she married. His true character revolted her exceedingly. Eloise passionately loved the man she married, but her moral sense would prevent her ever wishing to see him again, as he has another—I mean a real wife."

"She was infatuated by that fellow's baritone voice. It was a complete craze. From a child such a voice moved her deeply. Her mother was just that way. She would never have eloped with the man she did, if she had not been beguiled by his singularly beautiful voice. Nothing I could say or do prevailed on Eloise to abandon that Grafton, and I'll do him the justice to say, he really tried to escape her, and seemed to fear to marry her. I could see it. She would not, the idiot!"

"It is all past now, think no more of it," said Richard soothingly.

"I'm glad you came. I have a few words to say about my property. There is not so much: all sold and all told, thirty thousand. I have meant to make a will, and leave what little I have to some institutions, but the institutions suit me as little as the girls do. They'll all make ducks and drakes of it, so why not the girls as well as any other? The property can't do me any good after I'm dead, so I wash my hands of all effort to take care of it! When you hear I'm dead, you'll know I died intestate, and the girls are my only heirs. You can come if you like, and take possession of what is left in their behalf. Then they can throw it away as fast as they please."

"Take my word for it, Mr. Barlow, they will use it well. But why not have one or both the girls back, be as happy and live as long as you can?"

"I tell you I won't. All I want is to be let alone."

So Richard went away. He told the girls of their Uncle Barlow's state and they each wrote to him, but he did not answer their letters.

October found Hotel Marot still occupied by its summer guests. Dora looked after the studies of all the children in the mornings, and read with Philippa after tea. The rest of the time the entire party, except Mrs. Cardiff, Aunt Lois and Uncle David, spent wandering in the woods, nutting, gathering autumn leaves and thoroughly enjoying the delicious, bracing air of October. They husked corn, gathered apples and were jubilant. The Russel boys were still with the others, and Anne Russel was long since back at her work, and Eloise again busy with her teaching.

One day Dora received a telegram from her Cousin Richard, telling her that her Uncle Barlow had died the previous night, and that she should come on to Buffalo at once, to go with him to the funeral at Louisville, look over her uncle's papers and close up his affairs. Eloise was too far away to reach Louisville in time for the burial, and sent a despatch saying that she preferred that things should go on at Louisville without her.

The next fortnight passed like a turbulent dream to Dora, so much there was to do in closing up the records and disposing of the possessions of a lifetime. Dora felt as if an ancient funeral pyre would be desirable, where thousands of old relics once loved by the dead, meaningless and worthless to any other, could be given honorable ending. Richard had written to Eloise that she had inherited from her Uncle Barlow about sixteen thousand dollars, and half the household effects. "If either you or Dora have a home to furnish," he said, "these household goods need not be sold." Eloise telegraphed back "I shall have a home to furnish, send my share to me."

"She might as well have my share, too," said Dora," as I have no place for it. We can sell some of the things, and that will pay for the moving expenses. But I wish I knew what Eloise means by 'having a home.' I hope she will do nothing rash."

"If you will stay here without me, for five or six days, and go on with the work, I will make a dash to Plymouth to investigate."

Richard accordingly reached Plymouth on a bright October afternoon.

"As you wouldn't come to me," said Richard to his cousin, "I have come to talk over affairs with you."

"Let us go where we shall be entirely private," said Eloise.

She led the way along the streets, turned up a steep ascent into an ancient cemetery, climbed to the highest point, and so on Burial Hill, on the site of the first block house or fort built by the pilgrims, she sat down beside Richard. Before them, at their feet, lay the quaint historic town; beyond it the smooth expanse of the land-locked bay guarded by the twin lights of the Gurnet; the green oval of Clark's Island, and the long grey sand spit, the natural breakwater of Plymouth Harbor. All about them lay the dead fathers and mothers of the land; the heroic leaders of a forlorn hope that dared and conquered.

"Richard," said Eloise, "it is a lovely scene, is it not? The air is bracing, all the suggestions of the place are strong and true and faithful. This is far from, and very unlike the home where I lived as a girl, a very headstrong foolish girl. I have resolved to make this the home of my life."

"Yes," said Richard cautiously, "that may be well. Tell me what you have planned."

"I can make an income here, and you tell me I have from Uncle Barlow, about sixteen thousand dollars. I have four thousand. Twenty thousand makes me rich in this quiet town. I can buy one of these home-like homes overlooking the bay. I can live here among memorials of those who were great and unselfish and brave."

"And how will you live? Not alone in your home?"

"No; perhaps you think I should send for Dora; but then Dora has as much money as I have, and can set up her own home, and she has formed close ties in Buffalo, with you and the Cardiffs. My household shall be of those who need me, and have suffered with me—Anne and the boys."

Richard started. "You will send for Anne Russel, and the boys, to make with you a family?"

"Yes. It seems to me that they are nearer to me than any others in the world. I am better educated than Annie, and I can do more than she can for the education of the boys. But Anne is sympathetic, companionable, faithful. I find her a person that I like to be with. The boys are the sons of a man I truly loved. The only man I shall ever love. You cannot tell me, Richard, anything that I do not know, about his unworthiness, but I love him in spite of it all. I consecrate a love which I cannot kill—consecrate it by sharing it with his wife and his children. Anne was wronged by me. If I had not persisted in marrying Cecil, he might never have gone so far in his desertion of her. Some day he might have repented and gone back."

"She is better off without him," said Richard, savagely.

"No doubt she is, and so am I. He is the sort of man that any woman is better without. Yet he has some ways that make him beloved. I hope it need never be said, that Anne and her boys would be better off without me. Anne loves me, although I have helped to wrong her. Now I will do the best I can for her and hers. I have picked out a house that will suit me. As you are here, I wish you would look at it with me, and give me your opinion. Help me for a little in my business arrangements, Richard. I want to be all settled by Thanksgiving day, with a home and a family."

"Eloise," said Richard, taking her hand, "I am proud of you. There is something in you very noble and strong. God bless you Eloise."

"He has," said Eloise with shining eyes, and a steadfast smile. "Since I made this plan, my heart has known the sweetest peace and rest of all my life."

"I suppose," said Richard, as they walked to Eloise's boarding place, having looked through the cosy little home she proposed to buy, "that I may first ship you the goods and then the family."

"Yes. Anne and the boys will enjoy helping to settle the house."

"The home is all that can be desired, and is a very reasonable bargain. I feel sure that you will be very happy in it."

Back went Richard to Louisville, and the work went on, Uncle Barlow's house was dismantled and sold: the goods were shipped to Eloise. Richard and Dora were left alone in the empty library. Dora sat on a kitchen chair, Richard on an upturned box.

"I hope this home will hereafter see better fortunes," said Dora with a sigh. From it her unhappy mother had fled; from it she herself had eloped, and here Eloise had made her disastrous marriage. Richard desired to turn her thoughts to other channels.

"Eloise has mapped out her own life," he said; "what changes shall you make?"

"None, immediately. I had promised Mrs. Cardiff to stay with the children another year, and so I shall. I do not want to be idle, and I don't know what a woman situated as I am, can do. I hope, Cousin Richard, that you carefully kept out of the papers all about Uncle Barlow's money and so on."

"Yes; Uncle Barlow's money was too little for the papers to trouble themselves about."

"And I don't want any one to know that I have money. I don't want to live as if I had any. I want to live as a working woman, too poor for people to bother themselves about. That man thought Uncle Barlow was quite rich. He may be waiting until he hears that I have money, and then he will come back to trouble me. I am afraid of him, Richard!"

Dora was trembling; her eyes were dark and large and full of terror. She seemed to see Peirce Denham starting from some shadowy corner to seize her.

"Do not be afraid, child," said Richard, "If that man comes near you, we will find out where he is wanted by the police and have him taken care of."

"Think of the hideous exposure," sobbed Dora.

"It may never come. Poor girl! you are paying dear for a rash act."

"Richard," said Dora, getting close to his side, "let me tell you that I am never without fear. I never like to go out alone in the streets when it is dark. I often tremble when I hear a bell ring. I dream that that man has kidnapped me and carried me off. He is equal to anything! If I did not keep busy, and keep my mind from dwelling on this thing, it might drive me crazy. I try my best not to think these thoughts, to fill my mind with other things, so that my face shall not be stamped with fear. I have seen faces, Richard, where fear lies as a brand."

"What girl, Dora, who could hear you speak, would ever be persuaded into a hasty or secret marriage! Where is there any other act which bears such bitter fruits!"

They went back to the mountain. It was then and there, when Tom MacGregor came in and unexpectedly found Dora standing alone in the hall, hanging up her hat, that he held out both his hands to greet her, love-light shining in his grey eyes, and illuminating all his strong features. That was such a look as Dora had never before met on any face. Her eyes fixed on MacGregor, her hands in his grasp, she knew what the look meant, that she was dearer than all else in the world to him. They stood near together, and betweeu them, as if written on the air in letters of fire, Dora read her marriage certificate—married to Peirce Denham! Lines that like a wall of flame, shut her out from an honorable love. She must rebuke this love, she saw it on the instant, drive it back on itself without a question as to whether she could ever share it.

Her woman's wit came quickly to her rescue. "You here, McGregor! I had almost forgotten you! How is Mr. Frick?"

AN ALASKAN WEDDING.*

KUN-UL-KOOL'S betrothal trial of six months in the family of his chosen bride is at an end, and with mutual congratulations the friends of the couple meet again in the house of Shans-ga-gate to ratify the marriage agreement. For many days the snow had been falling heavily and continuously, and the Kutwulhtoo people have come up by trail on snow-shoes.

The short journey had been a carnival, filled as the people always are, with child-like joy and exuberance of spirits at the appearance of early winter snow; the young men with their light and slender snow-shoes have run races with each other the entire distance over the broad white valley—all minor obstacles being hid far beneath its surface. Servants have carried the packs of blankets and skins which go to Shans-ga-gate and Sha-ga-uk, the parents of the bride. The groom's father and mother with their friends follow, with merry speech and laughter.

And now, leaving their snow-shoes at the door, that no ill-luck might enter the house, the friends gather about the great pile of blazing logs in pleasant sociability. Messengers have been sent with strict etiquette to bid those of the village who are expected to come. The goods have all been looked over and approved by the recipients, who, on the other hand, make quite a display of Kahsteen's handiwork.

A man of years, with whitening head, who is a relative to neither family, but a friend to each, has been called upon to speak. Without rising, he responds by addressing first the groom, who has taken a more prominent place in the company than on the occasion of his betrothal:

"Kun-ul-koo, son of the Bear, you have been allowed your eyes and your ears, your smell and your taste in this household for six moons—is your heart still the same? Is your desire still for the daughter of Sha-ga-uk?"

In a clear voice, and with a straightforward look, the young man makes answer:

"Ah, ah! my friend! The heart of Kun-ul-koo is made strong!"

Then to the young bride turns the old man: "Kahsteen, daughter of the Ravens, is your heart filled? Do you cry for no other?"

Blushing and shy she draws back still more behind her mother. Her answer is too low to reach the company.

"She wants him," speaks the mother; at which the old man turns to the parents:

"This new man and woman have not changed their hearts in the sight of each other for six months. Sha-ga-uk and Shans-ga-gate, are your hearts for this? Is this young man what you want for your daughter's husband? Are you and your friend satisfied with his gifts?"

"His gifts are good! He is a good man!" answer the mother and father of Kahs-teen, while Kin-da-shon adds:

"Kun-ul-koo is my mother as I am, and to my father as his brother."

Then to the parents of Kun-ul-koo the old man speaks:

"Have you anything against this woman?" and they answer:

"She is my choice."

Now there is a loosening of tongues among the assembled company—merry laughter and noisy chatter soon dispel all shadow of ceremony.

A GODLESS HOME.†

"WHAT is the Bible, Paul?" I asked, for I had seen the name often in my reading.

"Oh Agnes Wendover! Don't you know?" Paul cried in astonishment. "Why, the Bible is God's book."

"Did he write it?"

"No, he did not write it himself, but he told some good men what to write and they did it. That is where we find out about God, Agnes."

"I never knew anything about God, Paul."

"Poor Agnes," he said, in a tone of pity. "I will find a Bible, and you can read it for yourself." And he began to scan the shelves. After a long search he sat down again. "I can't find any," he said sighing. "I must ask Miss Wendover to get me one. I have some money to pay for it. I had a Bible, but when they packed my clothes to come away with Mr. Bishop they forgot it. But I dare say Miss Wendover will get me one, and then we will have such nice times reading. Do you know, some of the Bible seems just like poetry, and that makes me like it so? Do you ever make poetry, Agnes."

"No," I said. "I never knew anybody who did. Do you?"

"I make it sometimes," said Paul modestly. "Of course it isn't so good as the poetry grown-up folks make, but it jingles just like theirs."

"Oh Paul you are very clever," I said admiringly. I can't do the things you can. I am very stupid; I can only study the things in books."

At luncheon Paul began, "Miss Wendover, will you get me a Bible?"

Aunt Wendover looked aghast, and Hawkins stood still, holding a plate between his napkined thumbs as the clear voice rang through the room.

"I have some money that Mr. Bishop gave me, and I wish you would take it and buy me a Bible. I wouldn't trouble you about it, only there don't seem to be any stores on the Island. Agnes and I want a Bible very much, and we couldn't find any in the library."

A curious expression came over my aunt's face, and I waited to hear what she would say. But her closely shut lips did not open, so Paul began again.

"Perhaps you would be kind enough to lend me a Bible till I can get mine. Agnes and I want to read it this afternoon."

He looked at her, and smiled pleasantly. To my surprise she said, "I dare say nurse Hillyer will loan you the book you want. You may ask her after lunch."

"Thank you, Miss Wendover, I will give you my money when you are ready to go to the store."

We got the Bible from Nurse Hillyer after some parley, but not till she made a short journey to my aunt's room. We spent the whole afternoon reading the book that was so strange and mysterious to me. I shall remember that afternoon as long as I live, for then I first heard about Christ and his mission, and I began to see that God was our Father, a being to be loved as well as feared. Paul read from the parts he called poetry, and his sweet, childish voice read Psalm after Psalm, I listened enchanted, feeling that he had been sent to comfort me.

The Czar's Consumptive Son.

The Grand Duke George, the Czar of Russia's second son, was recently obliged to return from India because of serious pulmonary trouble, and has since that time been undergoing a very remarkable course of treatment in the Caucasian Mountains. The walls of his apartment are bare and unpapered, the furniture of plain wood without upholstering or covering of any kind, while his bed has only the thinnest kind of a mattress. During the coldest weather, only a very low fire is kept up, while the windows are continuously open. This treatment has caused his attendants dreadful suffering, but his medical advisers hope by this means to destroy the bacillus and prevent the formation of tubercle, and they predict that in two years their distinguished patient will be restored.

Even should this very unusual treatment of consumption prove a success, it seems very unlikely that it will ever become popular. People in any stage of Pulmonary trouble, who have neither the time, money, nor fortitude to have the disease frozen out of them, should interest themselves in the natural cure, by which thousands of persons have been cured of Consumption, right in their own homes. We refer to the Compound Oxygen Treatment of Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, which has been before the public twenty-three years, founded on common sense, inviting the closest scrutiny, and in the possession of thousands of such letters as this:

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.:—Your Compound Oxygen is all you claim for it, and more too. Not only in my own case, but in W. B. Hinton's case it has done wonders. We were both given up by our friends and physicians as hopeless consumptives: to-day, after two-months' use of your Compound Oxygen Treatment we are almost as well as ever in our lives. Dr. Hicks, a friend of mine, tells me he has used your Compound Oxygen Treatment with the best results. Through the blessing of God it has saved my life and restored me to health.

L. A. PEACOCK, M. D., Smithville, Ga."

Persons with pulmonary trouble should lose no time in writing to Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch Street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

WHAT WILL THE NEW YEAR BRING?

I KNOW not what another year
May bring to me;
A life all sombered o'er and drear,
Or full of cheer.

Hoping, trusting, I'll watch and wait,
To see revealed,
What's writ within the Book of fate,
Whene'er unsealed.

I may be called a cross to bear,
As yet unseen,
Or some one's bitter grief to share,—
Some anguish keen.

Whate'er my lot, I'll not repine,
For well I know,
Some angel hand is holding mine,
Where'er I go.

Oh! blessed thought that 'mid the strife
That reigns on earth;
There is a higher, holier life—
A second birth.

Seek then my soul this life to gain,
And thus to rise,
Above the reach of toil and pain,
Beyond the skies.

E'er clinging to the cross, I'll win,
That blessed rest;
So pure, so sweet, so free from sin,
Supremely blest.

Cherriton Va. —REV. H. PETTY.

TWENTY YEARS TO HARVEST.

A WOMAN recently presented herself for baptism to a missionary at Shaou-Hing, China, who first came under Christian influence twenty years ago. She was at that time a little Chinese girl living near one of the mission schools at Ningpo, and used to play with the scholars. More for amusement than instruction, she learned from them the Ningpo Romanised print, and also the main truths of the Gospel. For twenty years she seems to have thought nothing about Christianity, nor had she a Bible. In 1891 her husband came to live in Shaou-Hing, and her youngest daughter, having something the matter with one of her feet, the mother chose to bring her to the Christian dispensary. Whilst there, the mother heard the Gospel, and remembered it was the same teaching she had listened to at Ningpo when a girl. She felt it was true, and borrowed a Ningpo Romanised Testament. She studied it diligently, and taught her children to read it. After some months she applied for baptism. Her husband was very angry, and said he would cast her off if she was baptised. However, after a couple of months, he relented so far as to allow her to be baptised and to come to church once a month. Her husband has since given her permission to come to church regularly. The eldest daughter, aged eighteen, is anxious to become a Christian, and the three little boys say they are determined to be like their mother. The husband will not allow a foreigner to go to his house, but he has paid a visit to the dispensary, and seems friendly.

The testimonials published in behalf of Hood's Sarsaparilla are all honest, straightforward statements, given and signed by the people themselves, and nearly all entirely unsolicited.

A LETTER From the most eloquent Preacher, the Late
Rev. C. H. Spurgeon
That will be Read with Great Interest by all who are at Death's Door.

DEAR MR. CONCREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since first I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your remedy. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally, I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Yes, you can wash them without the boiling, but ask your doctor to explain the difference between clothes that are boiled, and clothes that are not boiled—he knows. When you think what you save by doing away with the rubbing, the saving of health, the saving of clothes, the saving of hard work, time and money—then isn't it time to think about washing with Pearline?

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE
AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple and one can use it. It acts quickly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERSEDES ELECTROLYSIS.
—Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.—
Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞ Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) People have no idea how crude and cruel soap can be.

It takes off dirt. So far, so good; but what else does it do?

It cuts the skin and frets the under-skin; makes redness and roughness and leads to worse. Not soap, but the alkali in it.

Pears' Soap has no free alkali in it. It neither reddens nor roughens the skin. It responds to water instantly; washes and rinses off in a twinkling; is as gentle as strong; and the after-effect is every way good.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

THOSE CHICAGO LOTS AT

EVERGREEN · PARK

Now being Sold for $150.00 each.

AN investment to be "Cood" must in the first place be Safe. The security must be ample. In the second place a "Good" investment should yield a good return. Six per cent. is a good rate of interest for money loaned on ample security, but a good real estate investment will yield much more. Many parties are buying lots at Evergreen Park, building houses on them and renting or selling them. There is a demand for houses far beyond the present supply, and the income on the investment is fine. We are just finishing twenty houses, including one hotel; the latter will be furnished next week and every room will be filled at once. We are finding ready sale for our houses. The conditions at Evergreen Park are all conducive to prosperity. Factories employing hundreds of hands in active operation. New enterprises negotiating for sites. New families moving into the town almost every day. Fine stores being built and stocked, and all this during mid-winter. The most active place to-day around Chicago, the most active City in the world.

We cannot here tell you a tithe of what you ought to know about Evergreen Park as the most desirable place for a Good Investment, and then there is something we want to tell you about those $150.00 lots. Send us your name on a postal, and receive "Evergreen Park Illustrated." Remember that this property is not miles from Chicago where future growth might possibly overtake it. It is only half a mile from the City limits; the City lies on two sides of it, and the day of its prosperity has arrived. If you want to share in the property, you must act promptly. Address

TRAINING CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

The Chicago Evangelization Society and its Mission in Educating Consecrated Young Men and Women for the Gospel Field at Home and Abroad—How the Bible Institute, Founded by Mr. Moody, is Conducted—A Noble Work that reaches out to the Ends of the Earth.

A LITTLE SOLOIST.

THE great problem that confronts the leaders of Christian thought and action in the world to-day is "How shall we reach the masses?" The means and methods for most effectually spreading the glad tidings at home and abroad, constitute the overshadowing moral topic of the times in which we are living. Consecrated lives, full of devotion to the cause of Christ's kingdom, are not wanting; but every succeeding year discloses more clearly the need of training and system as essential to the progress of the warfare against sin. In this warfare should be enlisted all the agencies that Christian intellect and experience can command. One such agency is the Christian Evangelization Society of Chicago, whose yeoman work for the Master has already won for it a glorious record among the annals of Gospel effort in America.

The Chicago Evangelization Society has various forms of Christian work, one of the most important being the Bible Institute. About five years ago, Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the well-known evangelist, conceived the plan of founding a school where men and women could be educated in practical Christian work. It was two years before this plan could be carried into successful effect. Three roomy buildings on La Salle Avenue, immediately north of the Chicago Avenue Church, constitute what is known as the Woman's Home, and just back of those, facing what was formerly called Pearson Street, but is now known as Institute Place, is the Men's Department of the Bible Institute. Rev. R. A. Torrey, is the superintendent, and is assisted by D. Baines-Griffiths. When the Institute was first opened, Miss Gertrude Hulbert was put in charge of the Ladies' Department. This position was soon afterwards assumed, however, by Mrs. S. B. Capron, who for thirty years was a missionary in India. Miss Emily S. Strong is Mrs. Capron's assistant and Mrs. Harper is the housekeeper of the Home. The full course of instruction covers about two years, but is varied to suit the needs of the students. The regular course of study is as follows:

I. Biblical Introduction. This is taken in four divisions, i.e., Inspiration and Authority of the Bible; Principles of Biblical Interpretation; Methods of Bible Study, and a general survey of the authorship, purpose, contents, etc., of each book of the Bible.

II. Exegetical Study in sections and books: which includes the Life of Christ in the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, Pauline Epistles, General Epistles, Revelation of Jesus Christ and the Book of Psalms. In this study the general plan is to carefully scan the authorship of the several books, analyze the circumstances under which they were written, the modes of the people for whom they were intended and the reasons for thus writing to them. The central thought is then decided upon and the results classified.

III. Biblical Typology, which refers to the Tabernacle, sacrifices, priesthood, etc; Prophecy—where the prophecies of the Old Testament are carefully studied, especially those relating to the Messiah; History which shows the student something of the life of the Jewish people; and Biography, under which all of the principal and some of the minor characters of the Bible are studied.

IV. Biblical Doctrine, which treats of the doctrine of God, of Christ, of Grace, of Man, etc. This work the students are expected to do as much as possible by themselves, with frequent suggestions from the teachers.

V. Study of the Bible with immediate reference to its practical use, which is certainly an invaluable branch of the institution.

VI. Study of the best methods of Construction, and Delivery of Bible-readings, Gospel Talks, Sermons, etc. This work is done in the class-room where the topics are taken upon the black-board, and the student presents sermons and Bible-readings of his own preparation.

VII. Study of the best method of work; which includes lessons in conducting various kinds of meetings, visitations and missionary work. The students relate their various experiences and profit by one another's trials and triumphs.

VIII. The Study of Music. Mr. Moody believes that the Gospel should be sung as well as preached. He is the "guiding star" of all the good work at the Institute. Both vocal and instrumental music is taught. Prof. H. H. McGranahan is Director of this department, and is the teacher of voice culture and singing. Prof. W. Coffin, formerly of the Imperial Quartet, also teaches voice culture and singing. Last winter there was a chorus class of five hundred students. The members came from fifty-one different churches, representing nine different denominations.

The work is wholly undenominational, which does away with the obstacle in some missionary work, as in China, where so many different sects have sent missionaries to the multitudes that the heathen are frequently confused by the conflicting testimony. Able lecturers are secured for the Institute, such as Rev. R. F. Weidner, D.D.; Prof. T. M. Hawes, Rev. F. B. Meyer, D. D., and Major D. W. Whittle.

During three months of the year, tent-work is carried on by the Institute, and much good is done in this way. Each tent is supplied with musical talent from the Institute, an organ, organist and choir leader. There is generally a choir of ten or twenty voices, and the people who visit the tents are greatly pleased with the vocal and instrumental music.

THE BIG TENT OF THE CHICAGO EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

Cottage Meetings are conducted by the students during all but the summer months of the year. Permission is obtained from some one living in a poor neighborhood, to hold a meeting in a parlor—which is frequently both kitchen and bedroom also—the neighbors are invited in and the students come with Bibles and hymn-books and infuse into the minds of their audience, some idea of a better and happier life. Seeds are sown in this way which spring up and grow much better than might be expected amid such misery, the wretchedness of some of these homes being indescribably pitiful. The energetic students find many ways of improving the surroundings also, which practical way of illustrating their teachings makes a much more lasting impression than any amount of grammatical expounding of religion could do. There is sometimes an audience of fifty at these meetings. An average of thirty-five Cottage Meetings is held during each week of the winter.

Children's Meetings are also held, with an average atendance of two hundred, and Mothers' Meetings, to which a picturesque if not, at first sight, attractive class come, and are given friendly advice as to the guidance and education of their children. Many come to these meetings simply to beg, and some very touching stories are told of destitute homes, fatherless children, and sickness and worries of every description. The people at the Institute have learned by experience to thoroughly investigate these stories before believing them. The unselfish students spend liberally out of their own pockets to provide for the many needy ones they visit and converse with.

The main object of the Institute is, of course, a study of the Bible, but it is wonderful how much outside missionary work is done by the students, when we consider that lectures must be attended, studies prepared, music lessons taken and practiced, and regular hours kept. The students make reports of their work, and statistics show magnificent results. Each student is allotted a share of the house-work to do which generally occupies an hour each day. This work is performed in such a systematic and considerate manner as to be a pleasure rather than a task.

There is an average of about one hundred and fifty students in all; about fifty of whom are ladies. In their department, the "rising bell" rings at a quarter to seven in the morning, every day except on Sunday and Monday, when it sounds at 7–15. Breakfast at 7–30, then devotions, usually in the parlor; but if there is any special work on hand which calls for extra time, they are held in the dining-room directly after the meal. The devotions are led by Mrs. Capron and all the students are expected to attend and take part. Lectures are always held in the morning, and the after-

THE CHICAGO BIBLE INSTITUTE AND ITS WORK.

THE WALL OF HEAVEN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon on "The Precious Stones of the Bible, or God Among the Amethysts." Text: Revelation 21: 19: "The foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones."

SHALL I be frank and tell you what are my designs on you to-day? They are to make you homesick for heaven; to console you concerning your departed Christian friends by giving you some idea of the brilliancy of the scenes in which they now commingle; to give all who love the Lord a more elevated idea as to where they are going to pass the most of the years of their existence; and to set all the indifferent and neglectful to quick and immediate preparation, that they may have it likewise. Yea, it is to induce many of our young people to study a volume of God that few ever open, but, without some acquaintance with which it is impossible to understand the Bible—I mean the precious stones; their crystallization, their powers of refraction, their cleavage, their fracture, their lustre, their phosphoresence, their transparency, their infinity of color and shape, and what they had to do with the welfare and doom of families and the destiny of nations; aye, the positive revelation they make of God himself.

My text stands us in the presence of the most stupendous splendor of the universe, and that is the wall of heaven, and says of its foundations that they are garnished with all manner of precious stones. All the ancient cities had walls for safety, and heaven has a wall for everlasting safety. You may say that a wall made up of all manner of precious stones is figurative, but you cannot understand the force and significance of the figure unless you know something about the real structure and color and value of the precious stones mentioned. Now, I propose this morning, so far as the Lord may help me, to attempt to climb, not the wall of heaven but the foundations of the wall, and I ask you to join me in the attempt to scale some of the heights. We shall only get part of the way up, but better that than to stay down on the stupid level where the most of us have all our lives been standing. We begin clear down at the bottom and where the wall begins.

The first layer of the foundation, reaching all around the city and for fifteen hundred miles, is a layer of jasper. Indeed there is more of jasper in the wall of heaven than of any other brilliant, because it not only composes a part of the foundation but makes up the chief part of the superstructure. The jasper is a congregation of many colors. It is brown; it is yellow; it is green; it is vermilion; it is red; it is purple; it is black; and so is striped with colors that much of it is called ribbon-jasper. It is found in Siberia and Egypt, but it is rare in most lands and of great value, for it is so hard the ordinary processes cannot break it off from the places where it has been deposited. The workmen bore holes into the rock of jasper; then drive into these holes sticks of dry birch wood, and then saturate the sticks and keep them saturated until they swell enough to split the rock, and the fragments are brought out and polished and transported and cut into cameos and put behind the glass doors of museums. The portraits of Roman emperors were cut into it. The finest intaglio ever seen is in the Vatican museum, the head of Minerva in jasper. By divine arrangement, jasper adorned the breastplate of the high priest in the ancient temple. But its most significant position is where it glows and burns and darkens and brightens and preaches from the lowest strata of the wall of heaven. Glad am I that the very first row of stones in the wall of heaven is jasper of many colors, and if you like purple it is purple, and if you like brown it is brown, and if you like green it is green, and if you like ochre-yellow it is ochre-yellow, and if you like vermilion it is vermilion, and if you like black it is black. It suggests to me that heaven is a place of all colors—colors of opinion, colors of creed, colors of skin, colors of taste.

But we must pass up in this inspection of the foundations of the great wall of heaven, and after leaving the jasper, the next precious stone reached is sapphire, and it sweeps around the city fifteen hundred miles. All lapidaries agree in saying that the sapphire of the Bible is what we now call lapis lazuli. Job speaks with emotion of "The Place of Sapphires," and God thought so much of this precious stone that he put it in the breastplate of the high priest, commanding, "The second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond." The sapphire is a blue, but varies from faintest hue to deepest ultramarine. It is found a pebble in the rivers of Ceylon. It is elsewhere in compact masses. Persia and Thibet and Burmah and New South Wales and North Carolina yield exquisite specimens. Its blue eye is seen in the valley of the Rhine. After a burial of thousands of years it has been brought to sight in Egyptian monuments and Assyrian cylinders. At Moscow and St. Petersburg and Constantinople, I have seen great masses of this sapphire commonly called lapis lazuli. The closer you study its veins, the more enchanting, and I do not wonder that the sapphire is called into the foundation of the wall of heaven. It makes a strong stone for the foundation, for it is the hardest of all minerals except the diamond. Sapphire based on jasper: a blue sky over a fiery sunset. St. John points to it in Revelation, and says: "The second, sapphire;" and this suggests to me that though our earth and all its furniture of mountains and seas and atmospheres is to collapse and vanish, we will throughout all eternity have in some way kept the most beautiful of earthly appearances, whether you take this sapphire of the second layer as literal or figurative. The deep blue of our skies and the deep blue of our seas must not, will not, be forgotten. If a thousand years after the world has gone to ashes, you or I want to recall how the earthly skies looked in a summer noon, or the mid-ocean in a calm, we will have only to look at the second row of the foundation of the wall of heaven. Oh, I am so glad that St. John told us about it! "The second, sapphire!" While we are living in sight of that wall, spirits who have come from other worlds, and who never saw our earth, will visit us, and we will visit them, and sometime we will be in converse about this earth when it was yet a-float and a-swing, and we shall want to tell them about how it looked at certain times, and then it will be a great object lesson for all eternity, and we will say to our visitor from some other world, as we point toward the wall of heaven: "It looked like that stratum of foundation next to the lowest." John, 21st chapter and 19th verse: "The second, sapphire."

A step higher and you come to chalcedony, another layer in the foundation of the wall and running fifteen hundred miles around the heavenly city. Chalcedony! Translucent. A divine mixture of agates and opals and cornelians. Striped with white and gray. Dash of pallor blushing into red and darkening into purple. Iceland and the Hebrides hold forth beautiful specimens of chalcedony.

But now we must make a swift ascent to the top of the foundation wall, for we cannot minutely examine all the layers, and so putting one foot on the chalcedony, of which we have been speaking, we spring to the emerald, and we are one-third of the way to the top of the foundation, for the fourth row is emerald. That I would judge is God's favorite among gems, because it holds what seems evident is his favorite, color on earth, the green, since that is the color most widely diffused across all the earth's continents—the grass, the foliage, the every-day dress of nature. The emerald! Kings used it as a seal to stamp pronunciamentos. The rainbow arounn the Throne of God is by St. John compared to it. Conquerors have considered it the greatest prize to capture. What ruthlessness when the soldiers of Pizarro pounded it with their hammers. Emeralds have had much to do with the destiny of Mexico. Five of them were presented by Cortez to his bride, one of them cut into the shape of a rose, another into the shape of a trumpet, another into the shape of a bell, with tongue of pearl, and this presentation aroused the jealousy of the throne and caused the consequent downfall of Cortez. But the depths of the sea were decorated with those emeralds, for in a shipwreck they went down off the coast of Barbary. Napoleon wore an emerald at Austerlitz. In the Kremlin Museum at Moscow, there are crowns and sceptres and outspread miracles of emerald. Ireland is called the Emerald Isle, not because of its verdure but because it was presented to Henry the Second of England with an emerald ring. Nero had a magnifying glass of emerald through which he looked at the gladiatorial contests at Rome. But here are fifteen hundred miles of emerald sweeping around the heavenly city in one layer.

But upward still, and you put your foot on a stratum of sardonyx, white and red, a seeming commingling of snow and fire; the snow cooling the fire, the fire melting the snow.

Another climb and you reach the sardius, named after the city of Sardius. Another climb and you reach the chrysolite. A specimen of this, belonging to Epiphanus, in the fourth century, was said to be so brilliant that whatever was put over to conceal it was shone through, and the Emperor of China had a specimen that is described as having such penetrating radiance that it makes the night as bright as the day.

A higher climb, and you reach the beryl. Two thousand years ago the Greeks used this precious stone for engraving purposes. It was accounted among the royal treasures of Tyre. The hilt of Murat's sword was adorned with it. It glows in the imperial crown of Great Britain. Luther thought the beryl of the heavenly wall was turquoise. Kalisch thought it was chrysolite. Josephus thought it a golden-colored jewel. The wheels of Ezekiel's vision flamed with beryl, and were a revolving fire. The beryl appears in six-sided prisms, and is set in seals and intaglios, in necklaces and coronets. It was the joy of ancient jewelry. It ornamented the affluent with ear-drops. Charlemagne presented it to his favorites. Beautiful beryl! Exquisitely shaped beryl! Divinely colored beryl! It seems like congealed color. It looks like frozen fire.

But stop not here. Climb higher and you come to topaz, a bewilderment of beauty and named after an island of the Red Sea.

Climb higher and you come to chrysoprasus, of greenish-golden hue and hard as flint.

Climb higher and you reach the jacinth, named after the flower hyacinth and of reddish-blue.

Take one more step and you reach the top, not of the wall, but the top of the foundations of the wall, and St. John cries out: "The twelfth, an amethyst!" This precious stone, when found in Australia or India or Europe stands in columns and pyramids. For color it is a violet blooming in stone. For its play of light, for its deep mysteries of color, for its uses in Egyptian, in Etruscan, in Roman art, it has been honored. The Greeks thought this stone a preventative of drunkenness. The Hebrews thought it a source of pleasant dreams. For all lovers of gems, it is a subject of admiration and suggestiveness. Yes, the word amethyst means a prevention of drunkenness. Long before the New Testament made reference to the amethyst in the wall of heaven, the Persians thought that cups made out of amethyst would hinder any kind of liquor contained therein from becoming intoxicating. But of all the amethystine cups from which the ancients drank, not one had any such result of prevention. For thousands of years the world has been looking in vain for such a preventitive amethystine cup. Staggering Noah could not find it. Convivial Ahasuerus driving Vashti from the gates could not find it. Nabal breaking the heart of beautiful Abigail could not find it. Belshazzar, the kingly reveller, on the night that the Chaldeans took Babylon, could not find it. Not one of the millions of inebriates whose skulls pave the continents and pave the depths of the sea could find it. There is no such cup. Strong drink from hollowed amethyst imbrutes the same as strong drink from pewter mug. It is not the style of cup we drink out of, but that which the cup contains which decides the helpful or damning result of the beverage. All around the world last night and to-day, out of cups costlier than amethyst, men and women have been drinking their own doom and the doom of their children for this life and the next. Ah, it is the amethystine cups that do the wildest and worst slaughter. The smash of the filthy goblets of the rummeries would long ago have taken place by law, but the amethystine chalices prevent—the chalices out of which legislatures and congresses drink before and after they make the laws. Amethystine chalices have been the friends of intoxication instead of its foes. Over the fiery lips of the amethystine chalices is thrust the tongue of that which biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. Drunkenness is a combination of apoplexy and dementia. The four hundred million victims of opium come out to meet the one hundred and fifty million victims of alcohol, and the two agents take the contract for tumbling the human race into perdition, but whether they will succeed in fulfilling the contract depends on the action of the amethystine cups, the amethystine demijohns, the amethystine ale pitchers, the amethystine flagons, the amethystine wine cellars. Oh, Persians! Oh, Assyrians! Oh, Greeks! Oh, Egyptians! you were wrong in thinking that a cup of amethyst would prevent ebriation. But standing on the top of is amethystine layer of the foundation the wall of heaven, I bethink myself the mistake that many of the ancient ebrews made when they thought that e amethyst was a producer of pleasant reams. Just wear a piece of amethyst ver your heart, or put it under your illow, and you would have your dreams lled with everything beautiful and en-ancing. No, no. The style of pillow will ot decide the character of the dream. The nly recipe for pleasant dreams is to do ight and think right when you are wide wake. Conditions of physical disease ay give a good man a nightmare, but man physically well, if he behave him-elf aright, will not be troubled with bad reams. Nebuchadnezzar, with eagle's own under his head and Tyrian purple ver it, struggled with a bad dream that nade him shriek out for the soothsayers nd astrologers to come and interpret it. Pharaoh, amid the marble palaces of Memphis, was confounded by a dream n which lean cows ate up the fat cows nd the small ears of corn devoured the even large ears, and awful famine was prefigured. Pilate's wife, amid clouds of richest upholstery, had a startling dream, because of which she sent a mes-sage in hot haste to a court-room to keep her husband from enacting a judi-cial outrage. But Jacob, at Bethel, with a pillow of mountain rock, had a blissful dream of the ladder angel-blossoming. Bunyan, with his head on a hard plank of Bedford jail, saw the gates of the celestial city. St. John, on the barrenest island of the Ægean Sea, in his dream heard trumpets and saw cavalrymen on white horses and a new heaven and a new earth. No amount of rough pillow can disturb the night vision of a saint, and no amount of ame-thystine charm can delectate the dream of a miscreant.

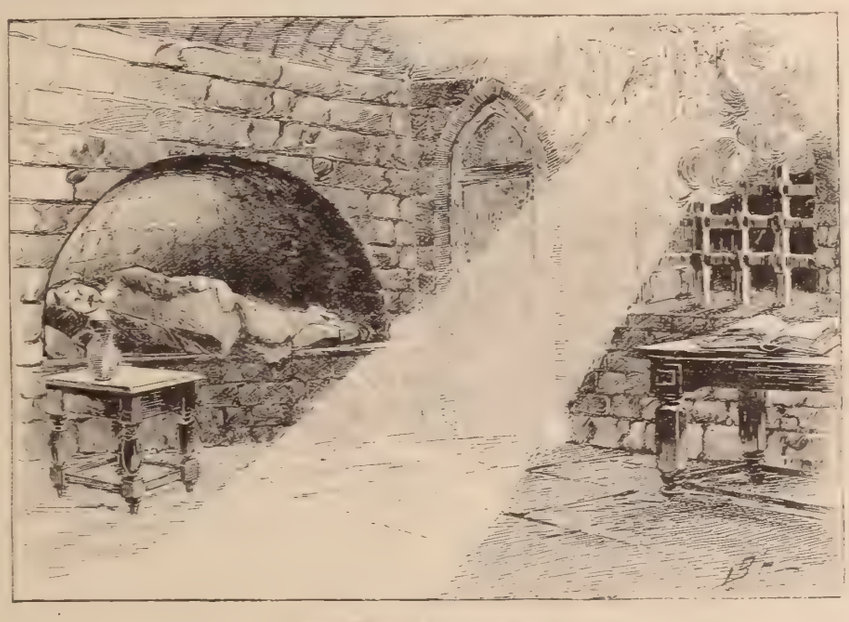
But, some one will say, why have you brought us to this amethyst, the top row of the foundation of the heavenly wall, if you are not able to ac-cept the theory of the ancient Greeks, who said that the ame-thyst was a charm against in-toxication, or if you are not willing to accept the theory of the ancient Hebrews that the amethyst was a producer of pleasant dreams? My answer it, I have brought you to the top row, the twelfth layer of the foundation of the heavenly wall of fifteen hundred miles of circling amethyst, to put you in a position where you can get a new idea of heaven; to let you see that after you have climbed up twelve strata of glory, you are only at the base of the eternal grandeurs; to let you, with enchantment of soul, look far down and look far up; and to force upon you the conclusion that if all our climbing has only shown us the foundation of the wall, what must the wall itself be; and if this is the outside of heaven, what must the inside be; and if all this is figurative, what must the reality be? Oh, this piled-up magnificence of the heavenly wall! Oh, this eternity of decoration! Oh, this opalescent, florescent, prismatic miracle of architecture! What enthronement of all colors! A mingling of the blue of skies, and the surf of seas, and the green of meadows, and the upholstery of autumnal forests, and the fire of August sunsets. All the splendors of earth and heaven dashed into those twelve rows of foundation wall. All that, mark you, only typical of the spiritual glories that roll over heaven like the Atlantic and Pacific oceans swung in one billow.

Do you not see that it was impossible that you understand a hundredth part of the suggestiveness of that twenty-first chapter of Revelation without going into some of the particulars of the wall of heaven, and dipping up some of its drip-ping colors, and running your eye along some of its wondrous crystallizations, and examining some of the frozen light in its turquoise, and feeling with your own finger the hardness of its sapphire, and shield-ing your eyes against the shimmering brilliance in its beryl, and studying the fifteen hundred miles of emerald without a flaw? Yet all this only the outside of heaven, and the poorest part of the out-side; not the wall itself but only the foot of the wall, for my text says: "The founda-tions of the wall of the city were garnish-ed with all manner of precious stones." Oh, get down your harp, if you can play one. Get down a palm branch, if you can reach one. Why it makes us all feel like crying out with James Montgomery:

When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold?

Oh, my soul! If my text shows us only the outside, what must the inside be? While riding last summer through the Emperor's park near St. Petersburg, Rus-sia, I was captivated with the groves, transplanted from all zones, and the flower beds, miles this way and miles that way, incarnadined with beauty, and the fountains bounding in such revel with the sunlight as nowhere else is seen.



BUNYAN'S VISION IN BEDFORD JAIL.

I said: "This is beautiful. I never saw anything like this before." But when I entered the palace and saw the pictured walls and the long line of statuary, and aquariums afloat with all bright scales, and aviaries a-chant with bird voices, and the inner doors of the palace were swung back by the chamberlain, and I saw the Emperor and Empress and princes and princesses, and they greeted me with a cordiality of old ac-quaintanceship, I forgot all the groves and floral bewitchment I had seen out-side before entrance. And now I ask, if the outside of heaven attracts our souls to-day, how much more will be the up-lifting when we get inside and see the King in his beauty and all the princes and princesses of the palaces of amethyst? Are you not glad that we did not stop in our ascent this morning until we got to the top round of the foundation wall of heaven, the twelfth row, the amethyst? Perhaps the ancient Hebrews were not, after all, so far out of the way when they thought that the touch of the amethyst gave pleasant dreams, for the touch of it this hour gives me a very pleasant dream. Standing on this ame-thyst, I dream a dream. I close my eyes and I see it all. We are there. This is heaven! Not the outside but the inside of heaven. With what warmth of wel-come our long-ago departed loved ones have kissed us. My! How they have changed in looks. They were so sick when they went away, and now they are so well. Look! Yonder is the palace of our Lord the King. Not kept a moment outside, we are ushered into the throne room. Stretching out his scarred hand, he says: "I have loved thee with an ever-lasting love," and we respond: "Whom have I in heaven but thee?" But, look! Yonder is the playground of the chil-dren. Children do not want a throne. A throne would not fit a child. There they are on the playgrounds of heaven—the children. Out of the sick cradle of earth, they came into this romping mirth of the eternal playgrounds. I clap my hands to cheer them in the glee. Yonder are the palaces of the martyrs, and before their doorway the flowers crimson as the bloody martyrdoms through which they waded up into glory. Yonder is Apos-tolic Row, and the highest turret is over the home of Paul. Here is Evangelist Place. Yonder are the concert halls in which the musicians of earth and heaven are taking part—Handel with or-gan and David with harp and Gabriel with trumpet and four and twenty elders with voices. And an angel of God says to me: "Where shall I take you? On what street of heaven would you like to live? What celestial habitation would you like to occupy?" And I answer: "Now that I have got inside the wall made up of all manner of precious stones, I do not care where you put me. Just show me where my departed loved ones are. I have seen the Lord and next I want to see them. But here are those with whom I toiled in the Kingdom of God on earth. They are from my old parishes at Belleville and Syracuse and Philadelphia and Brooklyn, and from many places on both sides the sea where I have been permitted to work with them and for them. Give them the best places you can find. I will help steady them as they mount the thrones. I will help you burnish their coronets. Take these my old friends to as good rooms as you can get for them in the House of Many Mansions, and with windows looking out upon the Palace of the Great King. As for myself, anywhere in heaven is good enough for me. "Hallelujah to the Lamb that was slain." But I awake. In the ecstacy of the moment my foot slipped from the layer of amethyst, that so-called producer of dreams, and in the effort to catch myself, the vision vanished. And lo! it was but a dream!

A BUDDHIST TEMPLE.

ONE of the most interesting books of the season is entitled The Japs at Home. It is written by Douglas Sladen and published in England, and describes entertainingly the life and customs of that peculiar people. The picture of a Buddhist temple on this page is from a drawing in Mr. Sladen, book and furnishes a very accurate idea of the ornate appearance of those houses of worship. This quaint edifice is the type of thousands of similar structures found all through China and Japan at the pres-ent day. The Buddhists are the greatest build-ers of temples and monasteries in the world. In the mountains of Thibet and Ceylon, in the islands south of Asia, in the provinces of China as well as in Niphon, those stately edifices stand in the most beautiful sites that could have been chosen for such a purpose. The immediate surroundings of the temple are garden spots of loveliness, and are cultivated with the greatest care by the religious attend-ants. In summer, they are the coolest retreats that can be found, and are specially attractive to Buddhist pilgrims on that account. The Buddhist priests in Japan depend largely on the revenues collected from the pilgrims and on gifts from the peasantry, having no income from the State, as a rule.

Buddhism was introduced from Japan and Corea 1,400 years ago, and many of the tem-ples still standing are very old. In some, high up in the mountains, monks have found homes for centuries past, their ranks being replenish-ed by recruits from different parts of the em-pire. Their lives are very monotonous, more so even than those of the Catholic priesthood; they eat, drink, take no thought of worldly affairs, chant their orisons at daylight and sing their vespers at sunset. Their is apparently little study or meditation in their lives, al-though there have been some beautiful exam-ples of enlightened Buddhists, who have add-ed to the riches of the world's philosophy. As a rule, however, the Buddhist monks have done nothing for the intellectual or moral de-velopment of Japan. Buddhism contains noth-ing to elevate mankind as the religion of Christ has done.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

"The day-spring from on high hath visited us to give light to them that sit in darkness . . . to guide our feet into the way of peace."

AFTER the darkness and hush of the night,
The shadows are chased by the day-dawn of light,
And the glorious morning bursts full on our sight;
But brighter than the morning,
Fairer than day,
Is Jesus my Saviour,
The life and the way.

Sorrow and weariness, doubting and fears,
All of life's troubles and all of earth's tears,
Will fade into gladness when Jesus appears.
For brighter than the morning,
Fairer than day,
Is Jesus my Saviour,
The life and the way.

Of earth the Redeemer, of heaven the King,
Angels and men now rejoicingly sing;
Unto him our hearts purest offerings we bring.
For brighter than the morning,
Fairer than day,
Is Jesus my Saviour,
The life and the way.

Ye who from the light of his love hold aloof,
Oh come in your manhood and come in your youth;
Acknowledge Christ Jesus, the way and the truth.
For brighter than the morning,
Fairer than day,
Is Jesus my Saviour,
The life and the way.

DEDICATING THE TEMPLE.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter. Ezra 6: 14-22. Golden Text, Ps. 122: 1.

WE have seen how, in the rebuilding of the Temple, the Lord sought to resume his old nearness to, and intimate contact with, his people. Just as in his deliverance of his people from Egyptian slavery, the direct intervention of God was the remarkable thing in their history, so was it now. The plagues of Egypt, the passage of the Red Sea, the bread from heaven, the water from the rock, the passing of the Jordan, the fall of Jericho, and the wondrous fact that forty years wear had not made their raiment wax old (Deut. 8: 4), was not more miraculous than God's raising up of Cyrus, the king of the mightiest heathen land of that day, for the restoration of his people to the land of promise. As long as their contact with God was maintained, the power of God went with them, even in the face of the greatest impossibilities. It was ever true of his people of old, as of his people now:

"Greater is He that is in You, than he that is in the world." (1. John 4: 4.) Zerubbabel was, no doubt, a gifted leader, but his power and talent told for nothing. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." Joshua, the high priest, probably, a very decided and spiritual man of God, but even when God commanded his prophet Zechariah that crowns of silver and gold should be made and placed upon the head of Joshua, it was not to glorify him. The angel that talked with the prophet said: "Speak unto [Joshua] saying: Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying: Behold the man whose name is the Branch, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord: even he shall build the temple of the Lord, and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." Both! Yes; the Branch and prophet, the king and the priest, Christ and his Church. Joshua was nothing except as his life set forth Christ. It is difficult to arrive at the exact meaning of the passage but, in any case, it means the union between God and man in the building of his temple of living stones to be "an habitation of God through the Spirit. He cannot dissociate his priestly cares from himself, or himself from them, wonderful, glorious, solemn, eternal union! No sooner did the people of the Lord take God's side, and leave him to deal with their enemies, than they found their enemies conquered, and actually turned into helpers of the work. (Ezra 6: 6-13.) When his children trust him, kings, peoples, enemies, difficulties, mountains, are disposed of with the greatest ease. "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will." (Prov. 21: 1.) "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God." When they had the decree of the powerful Cyrus on their side, and yet they allowed themselves to be discouraged by the persecution of their enemies, all went wrong. God did not raise up another Cyrus to make a yet stronger decree, but two prophets, two men who saw things from above, and who put God's claims before the people. His people must learn to understand him, then he could deal for them with men and things.

"And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo: and they builded and finished it." The power for God's building is not so much architectural talent; he is his own architect:—it [illegible] "master-builder," and a wise one. He built "according to the grace of God" which was given unto him, and the work which he built was not man's but "God's building." (1. Cor. 3: 9-10.) The prophets had more to do with the building of the temple than the workmen, because they maintained the contact with God which was the most essential requisite for the work. And consistently with this fact it is distinctly stated that the people builded, first, "according to the commandment of the God of Israel;" secondly, "according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes, king of Persia." God first, God's side of supreme importance! Oh when will his children learn this invariable law of his divine economy?

Is God really first with us? Have the prophets of the Lord, and have his messages in his Word more authority with us, and do we let them have more command of our time than men of business, or any earthly consideration? Alas! we have often seen that the consideration of involved in a new building for the service of God has made it of immensely more importance in the eyes of many of God's servants than the spiritual condition of the worshippers. "We must have our church," many say, "we are pledged to erect it, we have signed the contract; it must go on." But many a contract with God to live as living sacrifices, to come out from the world and be separate, to deny themselves, to take up their cross and follow him, to count all things but loss for his sake—is disregarded, put in the second place, and finally forgotten. It is good when the prophets in a Christian community have the leading place. "Despise not prophesyings," (1. Thes. 5: 20) is an exhortation which runs alongside that solemn one: "Quench not the Spirit." Prophets are those who are the Lord's messengers speaking in the Lord's message (Hag. 1: 13); they are only false prophets who speak their own message. To despise the Lord's message is to despise him who sends it. While the prophets, who "spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" were given their true place by the people, God could say to them: "My Spirit remaineth among you." Blessed is that church, blessed is that mission, blessed is that institution to which the Lord can say:

Money or Reputation

"My Spirit Remaineth among You."

The temple finished, the dedication must take place. God had looked after the money, they were not in debt, and they kept the dedication of the house of God with joy. No wonder; for they determined to be right with him. Instead of trying to stir up some rich heathen to come and patronize them, they went in strongly for a national sin offering, a burnt offering. The whole nation must come under the cleansing blood, the whole nation be represented by the burnt offering. Then they could worship, "the priests in their divisions and the Levites in their courses." This was a dedication after the heart of God: confession of, and purification from sin, a calling together of the worshippers for God to search, and try, and judge, and cleanse, and restore; this is a true dedication: this brings God into a building. There are beautifully built churches in which all the service is as cold and hard as the stones they are built with. There is nothing of God in the singing, it is all performed; nothing of God in the prayers, they are all manufactured; nothing of God in the preaching, it is all man-made; in it all. There are other places; some perhaps quite unsightly, where the very atmosphere is full of God, where every prayer, every hymn, every word, every silence, seems to say: God is here. This was the kind of dedication which took place in the temple at Jerusalem which God had caused to be rebuilt.

No Touch of God

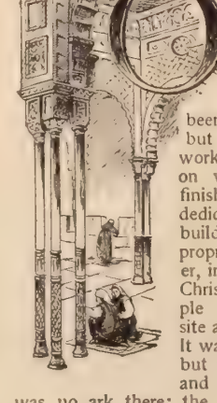
The passover, the great national feast, was kept. The priests and the Levites were purified together; all of them were pure, and killed the passover for all the children of the captivity, and for their brethren the priests, and for themselves. And the children of Israel which were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land, to seek the Lord God of Israel, did eat, and kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days with joy.

Confession, separation, cleansing, consecration: this is the true dedication of a house of God. The brick or stone work can be of no value to him who built the universe; but he seeketh to worship him human beings who will be his temple, and who will manifest the life of Christ in their mortal bodies. "The life was the light of men" in our Lord's time, and is so still. The outcome of the cleansing and purification of the people was joy, those who are right with God, and can count fully upon him are a happy people, no pangs of an uneasy conscience weigh them down, they are free as a bird which is escaped from the snare of the fowler. The Lord had made them joyful, and had turned the heart of the king of Assyria to them to strengthen their hands in the work of the house of God, the God of Israel. They had learned the precious truth that when God was for them none could be against them. And the money? there was no lack; it poured into the treasury. So will it ever be where God is honored and trusted.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.



OUR lesson to-day is one of a rejoicing people. After twenty years of waiting the temple was finished. Fifteen years had been spent in inaction, but having resumed work, the building went on vigorously and was finished in four years. The dedication of the new building took place appropriately at the Passover, in the year 515 before Christ. This second temple occupied the same site as that of Solomon. It was a larger building, but inferior in splendor and decoration. There was no ark there; the tables of stone, the pot of manna and Aaron's rod were all lost. The golden shields were gone, but they had been permitted to bring back the golden vessels of incense. Those who had seen the first temple must have lamented the sins which led to its destruction. So does the sinner who comes to God late in life and dedicates himself as God's living temple to his service grieve over the wasted energies and lost strength which are gone beyond recall. He dedicates an inferior temple, but it is the best he can do. Happy the child who in the days of his youth consecrates himself to God while his strength of mind and body are unimpaired.

Prospered through the prophesying. When the people had lost heart and discontinued their work for a long time, they were encouraged to resume and complete it by the words addressed to them by the two prophets. People would be more frequently helped in their duties if they applied to themselves the messages God's servants give. A poor woman once went to hear a sermon in which the minister spoke of false weights and measures, and the sin of using them. Being questioned as to what she remembered of the sermon, she said she had forgotten much that was said. "But," she added, "one thing I remembered—I remembered to go home and burn my bushel."

Builded and finished it. God had promised that they should complete the work that seemed as if it would never be done, so many and formidable were the difficulties in the way. That is so with all spheres of God's service. Men must not idly wait for God to fulfil his promise, but must work, and he will bless their effort and give them success. On the keystone of a bridge over a stream in a beautiful Scottish parish, are the words, "God and We." The tale is interesting. A girl in danger of perishing in a storm, when the stream was in flood, vowed that if God would save her life and help her in the future, she would build a bridge over the dangerous chasm. Her prayer was heard. She lived to build the bridge, and to leave an endowment for the poor of the parish. The inscription on the bridge gives the secret of success. It is not God alone; that would mean human idleness; or "We" alone; that would mean human presumption. It is not even "We and God;" that would be human pride; but "God and We" gives the Scriptural way of success.

The priests in their divisions and the Levites in their courses. There is a place and a work for every one in God's service. No matter how humble and obscure one may be ther is something he can do. That duty shoul be found out and done. He who does it i doing something far better than envying th position of the minister or missionary, an criticising the way they do their work "Men," says a great writer, "are like work men, set each by the architect upon som single bit of carving. One has given him t fashion a fragment where incompletenes breaks a promise of beauty. Another has se him only level lines and surfaces of blank mo notony. To one it falls to carve a head with out a body; to another, a lovely face; to an other, a grotesque visage; to most, pattern seemingly of little grace or meaning. But th task of each demands long labor and utmos care. At last, the various blocks are put to gether, and lo, there rises a glorious cathedral filling eye and heart with its majesty and love liness, stirring the soul with heavenward mo tion, destined to draw to it, and shelter within itself, one generation after another of devou worshippers. So the temple of the living God the heavenly Jerusalem, is building through the ages. Whoever, in high place or lo place, is living the life of fidelity and love, i carving a stone for the fabric."

The Children of the Captivity kept th Passover. To them it must have been lik the Passover kept by their ancestors whe they came out of Egypt—the first of all th Passovers. In the year 1830 on the night pre ceding the first of August, the churches o Jamaica, W. I., were filled with colored peo ple. An edict had been passed that on Augus 1, every slave should be free. The night wa passed in singing and prayers of thanksgiving They did not go to bed all night. Some o their number were sent to the top of the high est hill to look for the dawn. As the firs rays of the rising sun shot above the horizo they shouted the news to others on the plai and so the glad word passed from one to an other until it reached the churches and th joyful cry, "We are free," went up with gla acclaim to God for his goodness.

All of them were pure. The defilement o captivity and of association with the heathe had been taken away by the appointed means before they joined in the ceremony and ate th passover. Half-and-half Christians never ac complish much. Sin must be put away an the whole heart single in its desire to serv God before a man can be signally used of Go in his service. Some brittle gold, having bee accidentally melted with a quantity of wel refined and tough gold, was found to hav rendered the whole mass brittle with a highl crystalline fracture, and therefore useless fo coinage. The impurity causing brittleness in th whole 75,000 ounces was a small fraction o an ounce, probably one three-hundred-thou sandth, or less, of the original weight. So, i metallurgy as in morals "a little leaven leaven eth the whole lump."

Such as had separated themselves. Go wants his people to be separate from th world. They are in the world and associate with it in business, but they must be separat in spirit and their connection with it shoul always be used to draw others to Christ's ser vice. Every Christian should take care to le it be known in whose service he is. A famou picture by Millais represents a young Protest ant talking to a lady on the eve of the massa cre of St. Bartholomew. She is binding aroun his arm the symbol of the Romish Church s that when the soldiers who are going to sla the Protestants see it they will think he is Catholic and leave him unharmed. The youn man is kissing her for love, but with his dis engaged hand he is tearing the badge from h arm refusing to be numbered with the Papists even to save his life. Moses, doubtless, love Pharaoh's daughter for saving his life and ca ing for him through boyhood and youth, bu he refused to be called her son.

The bell of a church in the Isle of Wight as tonished the people a few Sundays ago b giving out a clear musical note. Its note be fore that time had been dull and harsh. Th people said that it was cracked and they tol how nearly a hundred years ago, when th bell was first hung in the steeple an awfu storm raged and the lightning struck the spi and cracked the bell. That explanation ha been given to strangers for many a year an it sufficed. But one day, recently, one of th church officials went up into the belfry to e amine the bell. He found that it was no cracked at all, but its vibration was stoppe by a large block of wood which had been di lodged in that old time storm and was restin on the bell. When it hung clear it gave forth its true tone. So a bad companion, or an ev habit may prevent the ringing utterance a fo lower of Christ should give for him. The goo work comes from "such as have separate themselves."

RAINING CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

oon and evening are devoted to practical mis-onary work. The ladies are each assigned ork for the week, which consists largely f visititing the poor and sick—each being al-otted a particular territory in the poorest arts of the North-side. They have also more r less teaching in the Sunday Schools and issions. In this way, a great deal is done oward relieving the suffering and brightening he lives of the poor, distributing garments mong the thinly clad in the winter and plan-ing health-giving and recreating trips to the ountry in the warmer months.

The plan of work in the Men's Department much the same as in the Woman's Home. The nen, of course, do the roughest of the mission-ry work. They take a little folding organ and o in parties of three or four to saloons, and, voiding the wary bar-keeper, call out:

"Want a song, boys?"

They are seldom refused the privilege of inging, for the class of men whom they un-ailingly find there, are always ready for some liversion. After a few temperance songs have een sung, with the unusual vigor of those who know they are working for the right, the ingers find opportunities to talk with many a runkard and lead him out of the path of ruin.

The Woman's Home is kept spotlessly lean and neat and the visitor at the Men's Department is surprised to see the students erving the meals in a style that would do redit to professional waiters.

Passing back of the Woman's Home to the nain building, a visitor finds many things o admire. The entrance to this building opens nto a hall where a handsome oak stair-case eads up to the men's dormitories and the pri-vate departments of Mr. Moody, Mr. Torrey, Mr. McGranahan and Mr. A. T. Gaylord, the Business Manager. On the main floor, to the ight of this stairway, is the men's parlor, which presents a homelike and cosy appear-ance. Opening off the parlor is the music oom, and back of it a large dining-room and erving-room, where there are many conveni-ences for keeping the meals warm, and wash-ing the dishes, and where the students study the art of table-serving. To the left of the entrance is a reception-room where the eye of the visitor is at once attracted to a long, an-tique oak table, standing conspicuously in the centre. On either end of the table are the in-itials D. L. M.; indeed, one sees everywhere references to the godly man who founded the school. Mr. Moody, however, is very modest about receiving the credit of the work.

The building is arranged in the form of a hollow square, and thus light is obtained in every room. Two new stories have lately been added to accommodate the increased number of occupants. The expenses of the students are made as light as possible, and thus many who are anxious to become participants in the good work, and to go out as teachers and ministers, are enabled to study. The Institute has a constant, call for workers to go to all parts of the world, and missionaries have been sent to China, Africa, Turkey, South America, Bulgaria, Japan, Persia, Burmah, and also to the North American Indians. Other schools of the kind are now being established, Mr. Moody's plan being to have similar insti-tutions all over the country.

In answer to hundreds of inquiries as to "what this Institute is," we may answer in Mr. Moody's own words: "It is a school where the Bible is studied under competent teachers, both of America and Great Britain, and where training is given in all kinds of practical Christian work, and where the stu-dents are taught music to fit them for Gospel service. Every student is required each day to do personal work in missions, tents, homes, and elsewhere, under competent supervision."

It seems a pity that there are not more of these schools. There are thousands of young men and women who are eager to be ener-getic workers in the Christian field, and who desire to fit themselves as teachers. The har-vest is ripe and waiting but the laborers, even yet, are far too few.

Some of the scenes enacted at the meetings are especially interesting. In the big tent on Milwaukee Street, during the season just closed, Mr. Scheveria has been holding meetings to crowds of from 1,000 to 2,000, who are seat-ed on canvas benches. As the audience enters, they present a motley appearance. First, a hesitating group of ragged little ones, then some young "toughs," with mischief in their faces, are passed from one usher to another. Next a mother with a baby in her arms, a laboring man in colored shirt and no collar, and fathers and mothers with their little ones. The bluecoat of a policeman seen at the door makes it easy to preserve order. A Gospel hymn opens the meeting, and how these peo-ple sing! A solo from an Institute worker, full of the Gospel message, then a hymn, a duet, a prayer, and the evangelist begins to speak. Tenderly, lovingly, he deals with the people —unsparingly he deals with their sins. After the address, there is more singing—possibly a solo by some little girl—and then the speaker invites those who wish to turn from a life of sin to rise. Here and there men and women in the crowd rise to their feet. The main audience is dismissed, but the seekers are requested to stay, and usually hundreds remain. The work-ers thread their way among them, sitting down by those who have risen, and trying from the Word of God to show the way of salvation, often finding among those who linger deep conviction of sin, without the courage to rise and manifest the interest felt. At a late hour, after once more singing the Lord's songs, the meeting closes. This is a fair illustration of the general character of the Institute's tent-work in Chicago.

Two young girls were found in the back of the tent one night, one of whom was crying. The evangelist spoke to her about her soul's salvation. She had nothing to say. A night or two later he again spoke to her, when she an-swered, "I am only a rumseller's daughter." "But Jesus loves rumsellers' daughters and is ready to save them." She answered, "I can never forgive you, you called my father a thief, and that he stole the joy and peace out of our home, and stole manhood and money from the customers." "Well, isn't that true?" She looked up into the face of the evangelist, and bursting into tears, said, "Oh, yes, it is true."

She was urged to take Christ as her Saviour and try to bring in father and mother, and in a groping fashion tried to do so. The next night an Institute lady was on her knees with those two girls, and so manifest was the pow-er of God that it seemed as if the whole place about them were holy. Later the girl met the evangelist and said, "It is all right now. I am trusting Jesus and my friend is, too."

The tent-work has now been in operation six years, and is under the direct superinten-dence of Rev. R. A. Torrey. During the com-ing season, on account of the crowds that are expected to visit Chicago while the World's Fair continues, the number of tents will be in-creased.

Mr. Torrey is thirty-three years old, and is a native of New Jersey. He studied at Yale Theological Seminary. He is a very earnest and energetic Christian and was for some time a worker at Mr. Moody's meetings in the East. Entering the Congregational ministry, he had charges at various places. For a time he pur-sued his studies abroad under distinguished professors, and on returning to this country, became Superintendent of the City Mission-ary Society at Indianapolis. He was called by Mr. Moody in 1889 to assume the Superin-tendency of the Bible Institute in Chicago, where his skilful management and organizing powers have been of the greatest service in successfully directing the training of the stu-dents, and in pushing the spiritual work into avenues hitherto uninvaded by the pioneers of the Gospel. His aids are all consecrated men, peculiarly fitted for the duties of their various posts and who have contributed materially to the success of the Institute.

DESOLATED HEATHENISM.

A Swiss journal publishes a letter from Del-agoa Bay on the east coast of Africa. It is sent by Mr. Grandjean who has just returned there from a journey in Gazaland. He gives sad ac-counts of the ravages wrought by King Gun-gunyana in that region. The country he des-cribes as beautiful, but an unnatural and awful stillness reigned wherever he went. The vil-lages were deserted and only a few old or sick men remained to tell the story of the raids in which Gungunyana's followers had killed the men and carried off the women and children of the region. The few who were spared, on hearing that a boat had come up the river, fearing some new enemy, fled from the villages to the neighboring hills. On one occasion an old man in his terror tried to flee, but on dis-covering that Mr. Grandjean was not one of Gungunyana's men, he cried out to the others: "Come back; he is a missionary! He will not catch you. He will tell us the words of God." About fifteen persons returned and gathered about Mr. Grandjean, who says: "Surprise and joy and incredulity were depicted by turns up-on their faces when I told them their country also should have the Gospel and that peace should reign there. The simple statement that the inhabitants would one day labor with the assurance that they should themselves eat the harvest appeared to them extraordinary." This account corroborates the statement made by the Church Missionary Society's agents who have visited the northern section of Gaza-land. It is distressing to think of the desola-tion and woe which King Gungunyana has caused throughout one of the fairest regions of Africa

WONDERFUL LOVE.

(Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the receipt of the beautiful Oxford Teacher's Bible from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office.)

WONDERFUL things in this Bible are told,
Wonderful words that can never grow old;
Wonderful story of God's love for all,
Wonderful love in the Saviour's call.

Wonderful things that a sinner may know,
This wonderful plan to save us from woe;
A wonderful gift to poor fallen man,
A wonderful God prepared the great plan.

Love for the fallen one, wonderful thought;
Wonderful price, from heaven it is brought.
Paid on the Cross by the Wonderful One
Who gave his own blood for our sins to atone.

Wonderful story, I'll read it once more:
Wonderful promise God's love to restore;
Though fallen in sin, salvation is free;
Rejoice and be glad, 'tis heaven's decree.

SHOW YOUR COLORS.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

I WAS riding on the train through the eastern section of North Carolina. Noth-ing can be flatter than that portion of the country, unless it be the religious ex-perience of some people. The rain was pouring down fast, and, for a person so inclined, not a better day and place for the blues could be found. Looking out of the car windows, brought nothing more interesting to view than pine trees, bony mules, and razor-back hogs. Groups of men, white and black, gathered at each station to see the train arrive and depart. Each passenger that entered, brought in more damp, moisture, and blues.

Two men at last came in and took the seat in front of me. Shortly after, one of them took a bottle from his pocket, pulled the cork, and handed the bottle to his companion. He took a drink, and the smell of liquor filled the car. Then the first one took a drink, and back and forth the bottle passed, until at last it was empty and they were full. Then one of them commenced swearing, and such blasphemy I never heard in all my life. It made the very air blue—women shrank back, while the heads of men were uplifted to see where the stream of profanity came from. It went on for some time, until I began talking to myself. I always did like to talk to a sensible man.

"Henry, that man belongs to the devil."

"There is no doubt about that," I replied.

"He is not ashamed of it."

"Not a bit ashamed."

"Who do you belong to?"

"I belong to the Lord Jesus Christ."

"Are you glad or sorry?"

"I am glad—very glad."

"Who in the car knows that man belongs to the devil?"

"Everybody knows that, for he has not kept it a secret."

"Who in the car knows you belong to the Lord Jesus?"

"Why, no one knows it, for you see I am a stranger around here."

"Are you willing they should know who you belong to?"

"Yes; I am willing."

"Very well, will you let them know it?"

I thought a moment and then said, "By the help of my Master, I will."

Then straightening up and taking a good breath, I began singing in a voice that could be heard by all in the car:

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins:
And sinners plunged beneath that flood,
Lose all their guilty stains.

Before I had finished the first verse and chorus, the passengers had crowded down around me, and the blasphemer had turned round and looked at me with a face resembling a thun-der cloud. As I finished the chorus, he said:

"What are you doing?"

"I am singing," I replied.

"Well," said he, "any fool can understand that."

"I am glad you understood it."

"What are you singing?"

"I am singing the religion of the Lord Jesus."

"Well, you quit."

"Quit what?"

"Quit singing your religion on the cars."

"I guess not," I replied, "I don't belong to the Quit family; my name is Mead. For the last half hour you have been standing by your master; now for the next half hour I am go-ing to stand up for my Master."

"Who is my master?"

"The devil is your master—while Christ is mine. I am as proud of my Master as you are of yours. Now I am going to have my turn, if the passengers don't object."

A chorus of voices cried out: "Sing on, stranger, we like that."

I sung on, and as the next verse was finish-ed, the blasphemer turned his face away, and I saw nothing of him after that but the back of his head, and that was the handsom-est part of him. He left the train soon after, and I am glad to say I've never seen him since. Song after song followed, and I soon had other voices to help me. When the song service ended, an old man came to me, put out his hand, and said, "Sir, I owe you thanks and a confession."

"Thanks for what?"

"Thanks for rebuking that blasphemer."

"Don't thank me for that, but give thanks to my Master. I try to stand up for him wher-ever I am. What about the confession?"

"I am in my eighty-third year. I have been a preacher of the Gospel for over sixty years. When I heard that man swearing so, I wanted to rebuke him. I rose from my seat two or three times, to do so, but my courage failed I have not much longer to live, but never again will I refuse to show my colors anywhere."

SUNRISE.

THE Bible tells of an army who pitched their tents toward sunrising. It would be wise for us all to do the same. Let our tents open toward the east instead of toward the west. The world is going on toward six o'clock in the morning instead of six o'clock at night. Instead of listening for the night-hawk and the whip-poor-will on the edge of the darkening woods, let us be watching for the getting up of the lark. Oh, for more tents pitched toward sunrising!

There are many who think society and the world are rapidly going to pieces. Drunkenness will drown the cities; fraud will swamp the government; free-loveism will whelm the family institution. So you pitch your tent toward the dark ages. But we look toward the east, and lo! Scotland is burning, and Ireland is burning, and soon all the earth will be burning with the bonfires of Christian victory! The submarine telegraph will some morning announce that a nation has been born in a day. We are only just planting our batteries on the coast of China, Japan, India, and Africa, and when the Lord once opens the fire all along the line, you will see such a complete rout as the Midianites experienced when they mistook the splitting of Gideon's pitchers for the smashing of everything. Day-dawn for the dark places of our own land! Day-dawn for all the islands of the sea! Day-dawn for all the continents! Stand out of our way with your soporifics, and give us a few drops of double distilled exhilaration! We pitch our tent toward the sunrising.

PEACE ON EARTH.

THAT was a beautiful thing when the Germans had fifty tons of gun-metal that had been captured in war transformed into church-bells. This is the best possible use for cannon. They may not in that way may make as much noise, but the sound they do send forth will be more melodious and grateful. How much transformation will be necessary before we can turn our arsenals into asylums and our fifty-four pounders can so change tone and shape as to be fit for our church towers?

There is an enormous amount of fight in human nature. Two urchins at school with fists lifted in juvenile pugilism, one of them coming off with black eye and the other with torn coat, are Von Moltke and MacMahon on a small scale. Lord Wellington while looking at the Eton boys wrestling on the play-ground, said, "It was there that the battle of Waterloo was won." The fight is born in us and nothing but divine grace can take it out. In literature, art, science and theology is the same spirit of combat. Closterman, the painter, viciously denouncing the pictures of Godfrey Kneller, the Church of England pounding John Wesley, the Edinburgh Review caricaturing Washington Irving, the battle of quills, the battle of crayons, the battle of chisels, the battle of base-viols, show in all ages the spirit of fight. We want a hundred Christmas days to dawn at once. We want fewer things to kill men, and more things with which to save them: and as spears are gone out of date so that we cannot turn them into pruning-hooks, we want by some command of the King all the gun-metal of the earth changed into church bells, and then good strong arms to ring them for a thousand years with "Peace on earth, good will to men."

OUR CHILDREN.

THE grasp which the child has over the parent's heart is seen in what the parent will do for the child. Storm and darkness and heat and cold are nothing to you, if they stand between you and your child's welfare. A great lawyer, when yet unknown, one day stood in the court-room and made an eloquent plea before some men of great legal attainments; and a gentleman said to him afterward: "How could you be so calm standing in that august presence?" "Oh," said Erskine, "I felt my children pulling at my skirts crying for bread." What stream will you not swim, what cavern will you not enter, what battle will you not fight, what hunger will you not endure for your children? Your children must have bread though you starve. Your children must be well clothed though you go in rags. You say: "My children shall be educated though I never had any chance." What to you are weary limbs, and aching head, and hands hardened and callous, if only the welfare of your children can be wrought out by it? Their sorrow is your sorrow, their joy your joy, their advancement your victory. And O, when the last sickness comes, how you fight back the march of disease, and it is only after a tremendous struggle that you surrender. And then when the spirit has fled, the great deep is broken up, and Rachel will not be comforted because her children are not, and David goes up the palace stairs crying: "O Absalom, my son, my son, would God I had died for thee, O, Absalom, my son, my son."

There is not a large family, or hardly a large family, in any land to-day that has not bent over such a treasure and lost it. In the family fold is there no dead lamb? I have seen many such cases of sorrow. There is nothing sad about a child's death save the grief in the parent's heart. You see the little ones go right out from a world of sin and suffering to a world of joy. How many sorrows they escape, how many temptations, how many troubles! Children dead are safe. Those that live are in peril. We know not what dark path they may take. The day may come in which they will break your heart; but children dead are safe—safe forever.

THE LAMP ABOVE THE GRAVE.

IT is a grand thing to go to sleep at night, and to get up in the morning, and to do business all day feeling that all is right between my heart and God. No accident, no sickness, no persecution, no peril, no sword can do me any permanent damage. I am a forgiven child of God, and he is bound to see me through. He has sworn he will see me through. The mountains may depart, the earth may burn, the light of the stars may be blown out by the blast of the judgment hurricane; but life and death, things present and things to come, are mine.

Yea, farther than that—it means a peaceful death. Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Sigourney, Dr. Young, and almost all the poets have said attractive things about death. There is nothing beautiful about it. When we stand by the white and rigid features of those whom we love, and they give no answering pressure of the hand and no returning kiss of the lip, we do not want anybody poetizing around about us. Death is loathsomeness, and midnight, and the wringing of the heart until the tendrils snap and curl in the torture, unless Christ be with us. I confess to you to an infinite fear, a consuming horror, of death unless Christ shall be with me. I would rather go down into a cave of wild beasts or a jungle of reptiles than into the grave, unless Christ goes with me.

Will you tell me that I am to be carried out from my bright home and put away in the darkness? I cannot bear darkness. At the first coming of the evening I must have the gas lighted, and the farther on in life I get the more I like to have my friends around about me. And am I to be put off for thousands of years in a dark place, with no one to speak to? When the holidays come, and the gifts are distributed, shall I add no joy to the happy time?

Ah, do not point down to the hole in the ground, the grave, and call it a beautiful place; unless there be some supernatural illumination. I shudder back from it. My whole nature revolts at it. But now this glorious lamp is lifted above the grave, and all the darkness is gone, and the way is clear. I look into it now without a single shudder. Now my anxiety is not about death; my anxiety is that I may live aright, for I know that if my life is consistent, when I come to the last hour, and this voice is silent, and these eyes are closed, and these hands with which I beg for your eternal salvation to-day are folded over the still heart, that I shall only begin to live.

Death at last may lay siege to your spirit, and the shadows of the sepulchre may shake their horrors in the breeze, and the hoarse howl of the night wind may be mingled with the cry of despair, yet you will shout in triumph from the ramparts, and the pale horse shall be hurled back on his haunches. Safe in the refuge! To this castle I fly. This last fire shall but illumine its towers; and the rolling thunders of the judgment will be the salvo of its victory.

MINISTERS' REST.

IT is a great folly for ministers of the Gospel to do all their resting in summer vacation. Sabbath being to the pastor a day for hard work, he must insist on getting a free day somewhere else in the week. Let it be Monday, or Wednesday, or Saturday, if you choose; but have one day of entire mental quietude. Every pastor must have a weekly rest. When so much is to be done, it requires the force of a mighty resolution to stop twenty-four hours; but better do that than stop altogether. The great sin of many of the clergy of this day is that they get no day of entire rest. The scrupulous abstinence from work of all kind one day in seven would result in more service for God. Our pastors would have a steadier pulse, clearer brain, stronger efficiency, and longer life.

Some of the pastors are dying through sheer indolence. They are too lazy for methodic exercise. They cannot make up their minds to put on their hats and start for the fields. They imagine that lounging is recuperation. No. The stream does not stop and stagnate because it has got past the millwheel, and has got through grinding corn. It skips and jumps and runs all through the meadows, and so is the better prepared for the next mill-wheel and the next grinding of corn. What our pastors most need is not a summer vacation, but a vacation fifty-two times a year.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GIRLHOOD AND WOMANHOOD.

TO cover the whole range of a woman's life, one must needs write of babyhood, girlhood, womanhood, wifehood, motherhood, grandmotherhood, and sainthood. That is about the order of God's usual call to the gentler sex; but now I write of girl and womanhood alone.

Ruth or Orpah—Which?

Three women stand together, in a strange, far-off land. It's a queer little group, and like as women often do, they are weeping. One of them, the oldest, has a very sore heart; ten years ago she came to this land with a husband and two sons; famine drove them away from their home. They found food, but alas, for this poor heart, a greater famine came, and three graves mark the ground where sleep her dead, Elimelech, Mahlon, and Chilion. The reaper Death has stolen the wheat of her wifehood, and carried off the harvest of her motherhood. Husbandless and childless, Naomi stands there in the land of the Moabites, facing the homeland again; for the grain is growing once more, and bread from one's own table is sweeter than from another's. Sorrow, too, is not so bitter, nor the wine of astonishment so awful, when

"At Home."

Be it cold, be it cheerless,
Be it childless and lone;
For hearts full of anguish
There's no place like home.

So to Bethlehem, Judah, she turns her face. It's long, long before the One who comforted those with heart-aches, came. Over thirteen hundred years before he was born; and, too, the "Widow's Chapter," Isaiah 54, was not written till six hundred years after Naomi's sorrow.

Mahlon and Chilion, her boys, had both married Moabitish girls. The name of the one was Orpah and the name of the other Ruth. They, too, are widows now; each of them has a grave, where she put away a husband and hope. Naomi is bidding them good-bye, and bids them return, each to her mother's house, saying: "The Lord deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead and with me."

The love of Naomi, their mother-in-law, for them, begat love in return, and standing now together, with a common sorrow, they weep.

Now comes the test of love. It always comes. Ruth, you and Orpah face a future big or little, as your choice is, this hour, by the side of Naomi.

The story is a sad one and a glad one. Orpah kisses her mother-in-law, and returns to her people and her gods; "but Ruth clave unto her."

"Return thou after thy sister-in-law." Ruth said, "Entreat me not to leave thee or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

It is written, that all this was at the time of the barley harvest; true, but it was more of a sowing than of a reaping time, as we shall see.

Ruth sowed wheat. Orpah sowed chaff.

From the hour when Orpah kissed Naomi and turned away, her name and place are forgotten; but Ruth, is blessed amongst women. Wherever the story of the Bible goes, this name, this character goes, standing for virtue, love, endurance, and goodness, and mothers weave the woof and warp of thought around her that the darling one may be like unto the one who became the grandmother of David.

Hearken, girls! Shall your life prove to be a Ruth or Orpah—which?

Naomi stands for Christ, and two classes are truly represented by these two women.

The Christlike and the Christless. All know that the status of womanhood is the status of civilization; and no girl in this Christian country but will give at least the kiss of recognition unto Christ; for all the privileges you enjoy are by the blessings of his life.

Go to the Orient where Jesus holds no sway. What is the condition of girlhood, of womanhood? There—thousands will tell you, and literally believe it, that woman has no soul. She is counted, on that line, with the cows of the field. All you enjoy here in the blessings of society, is secured to you by the uplift Christ gave to your sex.

(To be Concluded.)

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

IS IT THE LAND OF OPHIR?

MASHONALAND, the new and fertile section of Central Africa which is now being opened up to civilization and Christianity, is proving a land of wonders. Its ruined cities are attracting the attention of antiquarians and scientists everywhere. Mr. J. T. Bent, an extensive author and traveler, who has lately made a tour of Mashonaland, has written a book on these wonderful ruined cities. The country contains evidences of a civilization that dates back beyond the reach of history. There are some who believe it to be Ophir of olden times, which was famous for its rich gold mines. The cities of Mashonaland seem to have been strongly fortified, if one may judge from the character of the ruins. On this page we reproduce from the Illustrated London News, a picture showing one of the peculiar large round towers found among the circular ruins at Zimbabwe. These towers were presumably built by some people who came from a distance for some special purpose and who took extreme precautions to fortify themselves against attack. It is inferred that they may have been gold-seekers from Arabia. No inscriptions are found to give the slightest clue to their nationality, but as there are traces of Semitic blood in the population of that part of Africa, it is not impossible that that fact may be sufficiently significant to help the ethnologists. If they were merely seekers after gold, it is not surprising that their identity has been lost. It is with nations as with individuals. The man who devotes his life to the pursuit of wealth passes away and is forgotten. Those whose memory the world cherishes are they who have rendered it the best service and of the righteous, God says he will "make their name to be remembered in all generations." (Psalm 45: 17.)

A Hint to Builders.

A COMMON mistake on the part of builders is pointed out in the current number of the Operative Builder. It says that in the selection of a kind of stone for building purposes it is well to pay attention to other qualities beside hardness. It is not always the stone that offers the greatest resistance to crushing, that is the most durable. Stone which is porous in any degree will not wear so long, however hard it is, as a stone which has a close and firm texture, as the rain or the moisture of the atmosphere penetrates it and when the frost comes it reaches deeper into the stone and disintegration is apt to take place. For a similar reason a plain smooth surface to the stone is better than a rough one, as the proturberances, however small, afford a convenient resting place for moisture and dust which often contains pungent acids. The most durable buildings are those built of stone of fine close texture with a smooth vertical face. The hint may be useful to other kinds of builders. The living stones which are being built into the temple of Christ should be impervious to worldly influences. He who endures best is he who, like his Master, does not fear when temptation approaches because it can find nothing to take hold of in him. (John 14: 30.)

Richer than He Seemed.

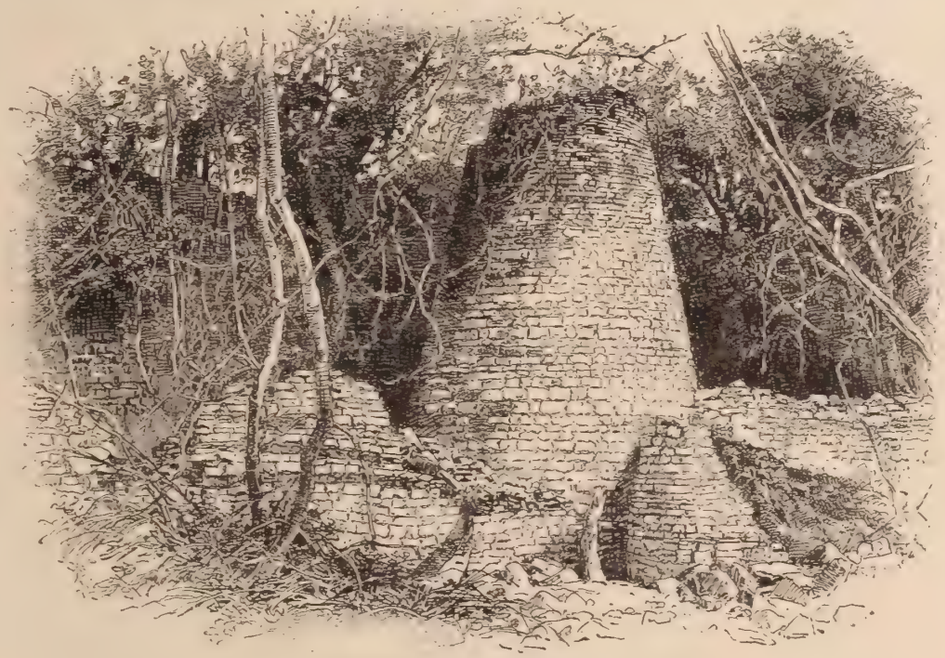
AN undertaker's assistants made a strange discovery at Stonington, Conn., on January 5. An eccentric, old man, who was well known in the town, died the previous day. He was apparently quite well in the morning and went about his work as usual, but about mid-day he left his work and went to the old house, where he had lived alone for nearly forty years, sat down in his chair and died almost instantly. A neighbor, looking in a few minutes after he entered the house, saw him sitting there dead. He had been an industrious man, working steadily in the quarries along the coast, always paying his way and living quietly, but spending little. His extreme carefulness in making his little purchases and his reluctance to buy new clothes, even when his old ones were worn and patched until they were scareely decent, led the neighbors to believe that he was very poor. None of them expected, when they heard that he was dead, that he had left enough money to pay for funeral expenses. The man, however, had to be buried, even if at the public cost, and an undertaker was summoned. There was some talk of burying him, dressed as he was, but finally his old, shiny, patched garments were removed, and then a discovery was made. Tied with soft, strong cords around his body next to his skin were seven savings-bank books, showing that the old man had deposits in each, aggregating thirty thousand dollars. If it had been known how much money the old man had, he would have been treated with more consideration and have had more friends. But no one suspected how large a fortune was under those old clothes. There are many men who are treated unceremoniously now because of their apparent poverty, who are more truly rich than the millionaires, but there is no fear of their treasure being carried to the grave with them. They are "rich in faith and heirs of a kingdom." (James 2: 5.)

A Misleading Signal.

A STRANGE cause is assigned for the recent railroad collision at Motthaven, N. Y. At the time of the collision a red light ought to have been shining from a certain signal post. If it had been shining and the engineer of the rear train had seen it and heeded its warning that there was danger ahead, the accident would not have occurred. The engineer, however, insisted that a white light showed, and concluding that the road was clear he went forward. It appears that the light is in a lantern of white glass, and attached to the signal-post is a metal disk with an aperture filled with red glass. The lever by which the switchman changes the switch is connected with the disk and the same movement that closes the switch causes the disk to cover the light and thus causes it to give a red gleam. An automatic signal in the lever cabin tells the switchman whether the switch is properly set. On the night of the accident the switchman set the switch and saw by the return signal that it was right. An investigation, however, after the accident, showed that, although the switch was right, the light was not. The door of the lantern had not been properly closed, so that when the lever attachment released the disk, it did not fall, but rested on the door of the lantern. Thus, there was the white light of safety where there should have been the red light of warning; and the engineer, knowing nothing of the hitch, went on and struck the train ahead. The chief merit of an automatic contrivance is that it is more reliable than human agency, but this incident shows that it may fail. Though we are continually improving our laws to prevent men being victimized, moral catastrophes are of daily occurrence. The really effective warning of danger is that of the voice of the preacher or Christian worker pleading with those who are on the way of destruction to turn to God and live. (1. Cor. 1: 21.)

Could not Prevent the Wedding.

AN appeal was made to Justice McMahon, in New York, on Jan. 12, by a young Italian, who wanted him to prevent his sister being married. The girl and her lover had been brought to court pending the justice's decision. The facts as stated by the girl's brother were that the two had been engaged in Sicily. The young man came to America two years ago, promising that as soon as he had saved enough money to provide a home, he would send for her. He got on well, and last November he sent the money to pay for the girl's passage. He sent it to her mother, formally asking her consent to the marriage. The mother wrote to her son, who was in New York, that she was sending his sister out, but he was not to allow her to marry, but get her a situation in some business house. When the girl arrived, the brother insisted on carrying out his mother's instructions, but the girl objected. Her lover, too, protested that as he had paid for her passage, he was entitled to have her for his wife. The brother feared they would evade his vigilance and get married in spite of him, so he invoked the aid of the law. The Justice, however, declined to interfere, and told him that as the passage-money had been accepted and used, the remainder of the arrangement ought to be carried out, if the girl was willing. She said she was, and the lovers went out of court and were married that morning. It was the girl's decision that settled the question, and her husband must have been glad that she was true and did not listen to the counsel of her mother and brother. It is much to be wished that a like fidelity was always manifested by members of the Church which is represented as Christ's bride. Though he gave his precious blood for them, they are sometimes tempted to take service in the world instead of giving themselves wholly to him. (1. Peter 1:18–19.)



PRE-HISTORIC ROUND TOWERS, AT ZIMBABWE, CENTRAL AFRICA.
Supposed to be the Ancient Land of Ophir.

A Disagreeable Duty.

A FARMER living near Atchison, Kans., has been placed in a dilemma, which owing to his kindly but weak nature, he finds decidedly unpleasant. The Atchison Globe says that sometime ago the farmer's wife wanted to invite some of her relatives to visit them, and her husband consented. The invitation was not accepted until Christmas, when they came. There were a man and his wife and five children and two dogs in the party. The farmer's wife has fallen sick and has been getting worse. The doctor finally said that she could not get well while there was so much noise about the house, and advised the farmer to get rid of the visitors. But the farmer "hated to say anything to them; they were her folks," he said, and it would be "mean to tell them they were not wanted." Yet the man loves his wife and is anxious for her recovery. At latest accounts the visitors were still there, and there was no diminution of the noise. It is not often that a husband will show so much consideration for the feelings of others when his wife's health is in question; but it is not at all uncommon to find a man evading a duty if it is disagreeable to him. The church has often suffered through those who are in charge of it not having the courage to tell some who are with it, but not of it, that they are hindering the work. (Ezra 4: 4.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelist E. P. Telford commenced a series of Revival services last Sunday in Jersey City, N. J., in Emory M. E. Church of which Dr. Lowrie is pastor. Mr. Telford has just finished a very successful work at W. Fitchburg, Mass.

Madame Tel Sono gave an address on January 15th to the Sunday School of the Brooklyn Tabernacle. This was her last service before her departure for England whence she will sail in May for Japan to begin her missionary work in her native land.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has been induced to continue his meetings at Jane St. M.E. Church, New York. The service on Sunday night, Jan. 15 was one of remarkable power. Persons in all parts of the house were crying out under conviction and many went away rejoicing in Jesus.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been having a wonderful time of blessing at Sioux City, Iowa. Every day the Opera House was crowded almost to suffocation and many were unable to gain admission. On January 4th, the majority of the business houses closed and a mid-week Sabbath was observed. At latest accounts seven hundred cards had been signed by persons pledging themselves in Christ's strength to live henceforth to his service.

Rev. A. B. Simpson sailed on Jan. 14 on the S. S. Servia for England, whence he will start on a tour of the mission stations of the Alliance in Palestine, India, China and Japan. He hopes to return by way of San Francisco and be back in New York by the middle of August. Farewell services were held in the Gospel Tabernacle prior to his setting out. Many prayers will be offered all over the country for his safety and health during his journey and for a blessing on his visits to the missionaries.

Mr. D. W. Potter of Chicago is in New York holding services at Trinity M. E. Church. He commenced on Jan. 15 and there was a remarkable outpouring of the Spirit the first day. No less than forty persons were at the altar and gave themselves to Christ. This is Mr. Potter's first work in the East, though he has done much work in the Northwest at St. Paul, Minn., Dayton, O., Sandusky, O., and other cities. He is an earnest consecrated business man well-known in Chicago and has been much blessed wherever he has gone.

There are in Japan 725 missionaries belonging to nearly forty Christian denominations, including the Roman Catholic.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Newcastle, Pa., have stirred the whole neighborhood. The First M. E. Church and the First Presbyterian Church were not large enough to hold the crowds which have flocked to hear the evangelist. The Bible Readings in the Y.M.C.A. have also attracted great throngs of young men. All the evangelical churches in the city are joining in the movement and Dr. Munhall has frequently had audiences of two thousand persons. Prof. Birch has charge of the musical exercises and a choir of 150 voices has been organized to assist him.

Dr. Edward Judson is holding the dedicatory services this week of his beautiful Memorial Church in Washington Square, New York. We have already published a picture of the church and a description of the work Dr. Judson is conducting there. It has awakened a deep interest among the pastors of the city by its original methods and the sublimity of its aims. The services continue all the week and Dr. Judson is being assisted by clergymen of several denominations. Dr. Henry C. Mabie, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Bishop Henry C. Potter, Dr. W. S. Rainsford, Dr. Geo. Dana Boardman and other eminent men are taking part in the exercises.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE ORDEAL OF A SOUL.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, January 22, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

"And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he might sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." Luke 22: 31, 32.

THIS text ought to be studied carefully as it is given in the Revised Version which runs thus: "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan asked to have you, that he might sift you as wheat: but I made supplication for thee, that thy faith fail not; and do thou, when once thou hast turned again, stablish thy brethren." There is no passage in that version, at least so far as I have examined it, which brings out at several points the exact thought of the original more clearly than does this one. Every one at all familiar with the Word of God in the original, in reading these two verses in the Revised Version will get the full flavor of the original text. This translation brings the reader very near to the lips of the great Teacher, and gives the thought nearly as he intended it should be received.

Apostolic Rivalry.

If you look at the 24th verse of this chapter, you will see that there was an unseemly and sinful strife among the disciples as to who should be the greatest. It is supposed by many that this strife gave occasion to the words that I have selected as the text this morning. If we go back and inquire concerning the occasion of the strife, we may accept one of two answers. It is supposed by some that it arose from the request preferred by the mother of James and John, that one of her sons should sit on Christ's right hand and the other on his left, when he should come into his kingdom. This request, it would seem, caused a strife more particularly between Peter on the one hand, and James and John on the other. Or, perhaps, the occasion for the strife may be found in what is recorded in the 16th and 18th verses of this same chapter. The disciples thought Christ spoke of a temporal kingdom, as their minds were full of ideas of earthly glory, and these ideas engendered worldly ambition and unholy strife.

As I have said, the strife was more especially between Peter on the one side, and James and John on the other. The younger disciples do not seem to have participated in this ambitious contention. These two sons of Zebedee were favorite disciples of Christ. Peter would be jealous of their position and influence he would plead his seniority; and the special promise which Christ had made to him, as a reason why he should be supreme rather than they. Christ had distinguished these three disciples by peculiar marks of his favor; and he now teaches them

A Needed Lesson.

He refers to himself and says that he is greatest who is humblest. This is our Lord's teaching evermore; this is our Lord's example evermore. Christ seems to say to them, "If you indulge this unholy spirit, the question soon will not be [illegible] shall be greatest among you, but the question shall be whether any of you belong to my kingdom." Christ seems to say to them, "If you indulge that spirit, Satan will soon get you all, and you shall belong to the [illegible] rather than to the kingdom of God."

Out, then, of this strife, caused either by one or the other of the occasions of which I have spoken, comes our text. It is quite possible that Peter was responsible for this contention and hence he is rebuked by name.

I ask you in the first place, to notice Christ's rebuke. "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you." You will observe in this warning that the apostle Peter is reminded of his natural weakness. It is observable also that this reminder comes partly in the very title which Christ uses in addressing him,—"Simon, Simon." That was Peter's old name; that was Peter's unconverted name; that was the name which he had before his call to discipleship; this you will see if you refer to the time when Christ first called Peter. Did you ever stop to think that Peter was the first convert that Christ made during his public ministry? He was Christ's first trophy among those who were to be numbered among his chosen twelve. He was the first person brought to Christ by one who was to be numbered among the twelve; and Peter's name at that time was not Peter but Simon; and Christ's prophetic words to Peter were that his name should be changed, and instead of being Simon, son of Jonas, it should be Peter, the rock. Those words were still prophetic, for Peter was not firm, not stable, not immovable. And you will remember that after Peter had denied his Lord, and was so

Severely Tested,

Christ does not call him Peter, but says, "Simon, lovest thou me?" So by the use of this name Christ reminds Peter of his natural weakness, of his old man, of his human frailty. "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan demanded or asked for you." The repetition of the name is a mark of personal love as well as of emphatic warning; it is love shown by the warning. We need often to be reminded in the same way of our old name and of our natural weakness. We profess to belong to Christ, we profess to have surrendered the whole territory of our being to the Lord Jesus; but we are obliged to confess that we often find that parts of the territory are still unsubdued, and so we are exhorted to watch and pray lest we enter into temptation. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

But the warning also reminded Peter of the wiles of his adversary. "Satan asked to have you." I give here the rendering of the new version, because it brings out the true thought, which is not even suggested by the version in common use. There we have "Satan hath desired to have you." That is simply an unspoken thought an unuttered desire. But the desire is not unspoken; it is earnestly and verbally voiced. "Satan asked to have you," or, as it is in the margin, "obtained you by asking," which is a still stronger expression; this is surely which is here announced. And it suggests the case of Job. When the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan came also; although Satan is a fallen angel, yet he is obliged to come into the presence of Jehovah to report. He charged Job with serving God for gain. God gave Satan leave to test Job up to the point of simply sparing his life. God still maintained control over Satan, practically saying, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." Satan is powerful but he is not omnipotent; he is wise but he is not omniscient. His power is limited, and it is delegated. Now we see from the original of our text, and also from the Revised Version, that a somewhat similar transaction took place in the case of Peter. Satan prayed that he might have all the disciples. He already had Judas; he nearly got Peter, and he desired all. He charged Job, as we have seen, with serving God for mercenary purposes; and now he brings the same charges against the disciples. He virtually says, "You want to be governors of a vast territory, you want to have great temporal power, and you are willing to serve the Lord for the loaves and fishes of worldly good." The real meaning of the word Satan is a deceiver, an adversary, and the word devil means an accuser, a slanderer. Satan slanders God to men, and men to God. He is represented in the book of Revelation as "the accuser of our brethren." And no doubt he is accusing you and me to Christ this morning, and is also misrepresenting Christ to us. We all need all the power of Christ to deliver us from Satan's wiles.

But, furthermore, Christ's warning to Peter illustrated the kind of temptation to which he was exposed. Peter stood then on the border of a great temptation and a great fall, and Christ saw his danger and solemnly and lovingly warned him. Satan's prayer was that he might sift the disciples as wheat. Now, we know that sifting is a cleansing and purifying process; it separates the chaff from the wheat. But I cannot think that Satan desired to remove the chaff and retain the wheat. There are two meanings to this part of Satan's prayer—he might have simply desired to bring the chaff to view, to prove, if possible, that there was no wheat, and that all was chaff; or another meaning is the more likely; it is that Satan desired now to annoy the disciples, to disturb Christ, and in the end to secure the utter apostasy of the disciples.

There was much in Peter that ought to be removed. There was much in Peter which perhaps we may not call positive sin, but which was An Element of Weakness.

Some one has said that Peter was too bulky and needed to be reduced in size. In spiritual life, "the half is often far more than the whole." As John Bunyan quaintly says, "Peter needed to be very much tumbled up and down." The "old man" was here brought into remembrance. This perhaps was helpful to Peter; it is helpful, occasionally at least, to us all. There is much in the process of growth that is not necessary after the growth has been secured. We use the word "chaff" as the synonym of what is worthless, but if you will look at the growing wheat you will see proofs of the divine wisdom in the protection of the grain by the chaff. We ought uot to despair when we find young Christians sometimes quite too much elated with pride; when we find them too bulky with chaff. There is a good deal of chaff in the best of men; but the Lord Jesus will blow it away with the wind of some sort of trial. I can name men who thirty or forty years ago were considered harsh and severe, bulky and inflated, who now are known to be sweet and mellow, soft and beautiful, reduced and humble.

Doubtless Christ intended to overrule Satan's temptation of Peter, so that the chaff of Peter's life should disappear, and so that the pure wheat should remain. We may be sure that this result was partly secured. He probably was the oldest of all the disciples; he probably was chiefly responsible for the strife. He must therefore, personally receive his Lord's rebuke. May we all learn the lessons Christ would teach us in all

The Trials of Our Lives!

I want you to notice in the second place, Christ's great encouragement to Peter—"but I made supplication for thee, that thy faith fail not"—this is the more correct rendering. O, how comforting it is to know that Christ makes supplication for us! Christ's prayers are a strong wall about his people. In that wonderful chapter of John, the true Lord's Prayer, the 17th, we have an illustration of Christ's intercessory prayer on behalf of his people. He prayed not only for the disciples who had witnessed his temptations, but for all who should believe on him through their word, and this petition included all true believers to-day.

I want you to observe that this is a personal prayer. There is a change in the pronoun between the early and latter part of the text. This personal and discriminating element in Christ's prayer and sympathy is tender and beautiful in his relations to his tempted and suffering ones. He comes into close personal relations with each one of us. You think that your circumstances and relations in life are peculiar, that no one was ever tried as you are, that no cross was ever so heavy as yours. Christ comes to you and says, "I know it all, I understand your case perfectly, and I have prayed for thee." It is beautiful to see how Christ came into contact with individuals all through his ministry. I could dwell long on this feature of his work and sympathy. I have often alluded to it. It is to me a very precious thought. For each bruised heart he has a special balm; for every burdened life he has special strength;

To Every Tempted Soul

he gives peculiar deliverance. This truth is delightfully brought out in the text. Satan asked for "you"—you all. The word in the original is in the plural; it included all the disciples as well as Peter. Then we read, "I have prayed for thee." The pronoun is now in the singular; a suggestive contrast surely this is between you and thee. The self-reliant Peter especially needed the prayer of Christ, and Christ prayed for him then as if he alone in the world needed his prayers. This is wonderful love and divine condescension! Was this special prayer for Peter because Peter was so sweet and beautiful in his character? Was it because Peter was more equable in his disposition, more loving in his nature, more charitable in his judgments? Far from it. Peter was at times egotistical, self-reliant, boastful, uncharitable, dogmatic. Was not the prayer chiefly because of his weakness, because of his inconstancy, because of his liability to fall? Was not his very weakness a plea to the heart of the Almightiness of Jesus Christ? Was not the painful future that was opening before Peter, a reason for Christ's prayer?

Our Lord also asks for a particular grace. He does not pray that Satan's power might be destroyed; he does not pray that the thorn should not enter Peter's flesh; he does not pray that he may not be tossed on the sieve. But he prays that his faith may not utterly fail; that he may not fall into Satan's possession and power. We have often been reminded that there are two ways by which we may be helped to carry our burdens. One is to make the burden lighter, and the other is to give us more strength. Christ seems to say, "No, no, Peter, Satan must sift you; but I have prayed that thy faith fail not entirely." Faith is the shield that will ward off the fiery darts of Satan. If faith stands,

The Man Will Stand.

It is easy to exercise faith in Jesus when the air is sweet, when it is perfumed with the breath of praise and prayer, when joy and peace reign in the home, and the sympathy of brethren is manifested in the church; easy when it is the rare month of June in heart, home and church. But when December comes and the winds are bleak, and "flecked with snow," and we are chilled to the bone; when business is bad and friends fail us, O, then it is hard to have faith. Now Christ prayed as being the most important grace of all, that Peter's faith fail not. What kind of faith? Faith in God, faith in purity, faith in love, faith in truth, in virtue, in honesty, in character and right, in a word, faith in God and in ourselves as his children, as the objects of his care and the heirs of his glory. We may be standing to-day on the border of a great temptation. O, Christ! Thou Son of God and Son of man! pray for us this morning. Keep us by thy grace. Bring us off more than conquerors!

There is just one other thought in connection with that prayer, and I have time now only to touch upon it,—Christ's prayer was prevailing prayer. It is as if Christ had said, "Satan is praying and I am praying; there is a contest here, Peter, for your soul." Peter's soul was in the public mart; It was in danger of being secured by Satan; but the Lord Jesus prays. It is a great comfort sometimes to know that the church is praying for us. The late James T. Brady came across the Atlantic in a steamer which encountered a violent storm. Standing on the deck of the steamer he was quiet and self-possessed in the midst of the terror of those about him. Someone asked him why he was so calm when other men on every side were praying and crying in such excitement. He replied, "Because I know that if the vessel should go down, the whole Catholic Church would pray for my soul." We would all say that this fact alone was not a sufficient reason for comfort, but it had weight with him. For years in my ministry I was greatly helped by the knowledge that daily. I knew every Sunday when I entered this pulpit that her prayers were ascending to God. And when she went home I was conscious of a great loss, conscious that an element of life and power must henceforth be wanting. At times there is a great hunger in my heart for her love and in my life for her prayers. But when I know that Christ, who himself said of his prayers to the Father, "I know that thou hearest me always," when I know that he prays for me, neither life nor death can have power to terrify me. It is certain that although there may be failings in a believer's faith, there shall not be failure of the believer's faith. Although his faith may be sadly shaken, it shall not utterly fall. If left to themselves Christians would certainly fail; but they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. Peter's case is no exception to this universal and blessed law. He was badly weakened, but he did not entirely fall. The prayer offered by Christ on his behalf was literally answered. Until I discovered from a study in the original the exact word translated "fail," I was troubled by between the prayer of Christ and the conduct of Peter. It once seemed to me as if the prayer had not been answered; it seemed as if Peter's faith did fail. But the more careful study recently given shows the perfect harmony there is between the prayer and the fulfilment. The word translated "fail" is a very strong word.

My Mother Prayed for Me

The Apparent Contradiction

It is the ordinary word fail with a preposition added which gives it the meaning of failing utterly, entirely, completely. This added meaning fully explains the whole case. Peter's faith did partially fail; but it did not fail utterly, he did not fall off; did not apostatize; did not forsake his Master fully and finally as did Judas. It is interesting to observe that the word here translated "fail" is used in classic Greek of the eclipse of the sun. We may say that Peter's faith was for the time under an eclipse, but though eclipsed it was not extinguished. Christ's prayer did prevail. Blessed are they for whom he is the Advocate: Blessed are they who are included in his prevalent intercession! Let all who listen to my voice now beseech Jesus Christ to become their Advocate with the Father!

The First Duty.

And now, very briefly, the last thought; Christ's practical command to Peter. "When once thou hast turned again, establish thy brethren." When a Christian man has wandered from God, he must return to God, or he cannot be either happy or useful. You can never return to the Christian path after wandering, where you ought to be had you continued on it. You must go back again and do your first works, if you have left your first love. He who goes away from God must go back to God. The technical ideas associated with the word "converted" obscure the true thought here. It is simply turned, turned back, from thy wandering, restored to duty after wandering in folly and sin. O that all who have wandered would to-day go back to God! Am I speaking to any who like Peter have denied their Lord? Who perhaps have crucified their Lord afresh in the house of his friends, and put him to open shame? O come back to your crucified Lord again. The Father waits to meet and greet you; and to put on your cheek the kiss of love and forgiveness.

You see there was an obligation attaching to the fact that Peter had been saved from his wandering, so that he was now to strengthen others. The thought is, "When once thou hast turned again, establish thy brethren." That is God's plan. Whoever receives consolation from God is to comfort others. This duty is not to be done in pride, not in ostentation; but in humility and in simplicity; not to honor yourself, but to glorify God. The bitter experience of wandering gives men power to help others who have wandered. God often overrules our sins that

We May Help Other Sinners.

If you would know the curse of drunkenness, you cannot learn it fully from me, because I have never known its power; but if I could put into this pulpit a man who had been its victim, his words would have a mighty power. I cannot tell you the awfulness of fire, because I have never been burned; but if I should come to you out of the fire, singed and blackened, I could then tell you of its terrible pain and power. I should know by a personal experience whereof I spoke.

Peter had been grieved at Christ's implied doubt of his fidelity, and had protested his own constancy even unto death. But although he continued for a while with Christ, when the first shade of personal danger fell upon him, he denied him with oaths three times repeated. But a little while after he went out into the gray dawn of the morning, weeping bitterly, and Christ did not see him any more until after his crucifixion and resurrection. If there was a broken-hearted man in Jerusalem during the awful period which followed the denial that man was Peter; and now the resurrection day comes and Christ appears, first to Mary Magdalene, and then to the other women; and sometime about noon or early afternoon, somewhere, somehow he appears to Peter. Doubtless Peter was on his mind and in his heart all the morning, for the angel told the women to go and tell the disciples "and Peter." Who gave the angel this message? Christ out of his loving heart. The Holy Spirit has drawn a veil over Christ's meeting with Peter. Perhaps the meeting was too tender, too sacred for the particulars to be given to the world. Oh how Peter would fall in his penitential tears at Christ's feet, and how Christ would forgive, cleanse and strengthen him! Wonderful moment! Blessed penitence and divine forgiveness! Oh wanderers, will you go back to Christ this morning? Will you now fall in deep humility at his pierced feet, telling out your penitence and receiving his full and free pardon? Then come back to the church, resume your neglected vows, and take your place at the table of the Lord; begin at once to work for others and thus strengthen the brethren. If you have never come to Christ before, come now. He will be your Saviour to-day, your Advocate with the Father, your Prophet, Priest and King.

ON THE THRESHOLD.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

ONCE I had a little brother,
But he crossed the stream;
Was his life, as they say mine is,
Only just a dream?
Can we meet no more where glory
Gilds the shining way?
Did he sink and sink forever
In the grave that day?

There's a great and gleaming city,
Where the Saviour dwells;
There we hear no sighs of parting,
And no sad farewells:
There a throne of glowing crystal
Stands above the stream;
There there is no one to tell us
Life is but a dream.

Over there my little brother
Stands and waits for me;
Over there the blessed angels
Sing of love that's free.
Tell me not the life I'm living
Only is a dream;
For I long to meet my brother,
Just across the stream.

So I stand upon the threshold
Of the great unseen,
And I wait for death to carry
Me across the stream.
There's a blessed hope in meeting
Dreams can never tell;
'Tis the hope of never parting
With a sad farewell. —J. N. GORTNER.

EVERY YEAR.

YES, the shores of life are shifting
Every year;
And we are seaward drifting
Every year;
Old places changing fret us,
The living more forget us,
There are fewer to regret us
Every year.

But the truer life draws nigher
Every year,
And its morning star climbs higher
Every year,
Earth's hold on us grows slighter,
And its heavy burdens lighter,
And the dawn immortal brighter,
Every year.

THE PREDICTED RESTITUTION.

What the Characteristics of the Millennium will be According to Scripture.

BY REV. CHARLES K. IMBRIE, D.D.

THIS Regeneration which takes place at the Millennium is to be preceded by a sweeping away of all moral evil from the earth—the almighty act of vengeance on the part of the King against the wicked powers of the earth. For almost every prophecy which portrays the coming glory, testifies to the "indignation of the Lord against all nations" (see the prophecy in Isaiah 24 to 27.) So also Christ testifies, that at his coming, "He will send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them who do iniquity." And also Ezekiel shows at length (chap. 39.) And so the Revelation testifies that Christ, attended by heaven's army, shall go forth in battle against the Beast and the False Prophet and their armies. (Rev. 19.)

The earth is to be purified by fire. Isaiah, the prophet, testifies: "The Lord will come with fire and with his chariots, like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many" (chap. 66: 15, 16.) The apostle Peter also testifies "that the elements shall melt with fervent heat," and thence the new heavens and new earth shall emerge. And lest any should doubt whether God can save any alive under such circumstances, the apostle points, in his second epistle, to Noah saved and to Lot saved amid a general destruction, in order to show that "the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of trial, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished."

After the desolating judgments with which the returning Lord and King will visit the nations, there will still be some left when the storm has passed by, who will doubtless form the source from which the nations will spring who shall dwell on the earth during the succeeding millennial era. For so Isaiah testifies as to this spared remnant in the midst of the widespread destruction on the earth (chap. 24: 5, 6, 13, 16, 21, 22.) And so Zechariah declares, also, that some shall escape of the nations destroyed of the Lord when they come against Jerusalem, and that these shall afterwards serve him (chap. 14: 16.)

This Regeneration shall be attended by the national repentance and conversion of the Jewish people, their gathering to their own land, and their perpetual residence there, exalted as a people to be a blessing in all the earth. This many passages already quoted declare (see Isaiah 61: 7-9; 60: 9-14.)

In the "Regeneration," therefore, there will be living men in the flesh, distinct from the glorified saints who rule with Christ, and these men will be organized as nations. For so Isaiah speaks of the remnant who are escaped of the nations after the Lord's judgment of the ungodly. So John speaks of the nations of the earth as walking in the light of the New Jerusalem.

To bring about this blessed condition of things the Spirit shall be poured out in an unprecedented manner on all flesh. So the prophet Joel declares (chap. 2: 28-32) pointing, by his predicted signs, to the end of this dispensation of the Spirit, and to the conversion of the Gentiles, a pregnant prophecy that takes in the whole Messianic time, as one vast period, the beginning and end of which are foreshortened into one and the same picture.

All the nations shall be holy. So Isaiah says to Israel: "All thy children shall be taught of God." "None shall say to another, know the Lord, for all shall know him." "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

The race, on earth then made holy, will continue on the earth, in perpetual generations. For so Psalm 72 intimates, as already quoted (ver. 5, 7, 8, 17.) So God declares that the earth will abide safe from destruction by flood under his everlasting covenant, throughout "perpetual generations." The curse shall be removed from the earth, and inanimate creation will participate in the joy of the "sons of God." So testify the prophets. Thus the Regeneration will be a blessed change affecting the whole earth and the race living upon it. The long winter has indeed stripped off the foliage and made it for a long time waste and barren. But the reviving spring is soon to come and bring forth a "summer" of glory.

The articles on Prophetic subjects by Dr B. O. Kinn ar which have from time to time appeared in our columns, have been issued in book form with a quantity of new matter on "the time of the end." The announcement of the book appears in our advertising columns this week.

SOLDIER AND STATESMAN.

IN the death of Benjamin F. Butler, which occurred in Washington last week, the country loses one of the gradually narrowing phalanx of men of strong character and ability who came into prominence during the troublous times of the Civil War. Benjamin Franklin Butler was born at Deerfield, Mass., in 1818. He received a collegiate education, studied and practiced law, and entered politics in 1853. He entered the Union Army as a brigadier-general at the outbreak of hostilities in 1861, was made a major-general in 1862 and served with distinction until the close of the war. In 1868 he went to Congress from the Fifth Massachusetts District and from that time until 1874 he was an active and prominent legislator. In 1882 he was elected Governor of Massachusetts, and in 1884 he accepted the Greenback nomination for the Presidency. Thereafter he devoted himself to law practice in his native State and so continued while he lived. The immediate cause of death was heart trouble.

Gen. Butler's career was full of peculiarities and surprises. Aggressive and resolute by nature, he made friends, money and worldly reputation at the bar. He carried the same character into his political life and on whatever side of a debate or political contest he happened to be engaged, his sturdy persistency won him the warm admiration of his friends and the bitter opposition of his enemies. During the Rebellion he produced a powerful moral effect on both North and South by declaring fugitive slaves coming within the Northern lines to be "contraband of war." This was really the first actual step toward emancipation.

Many incidents are related of Gen. Butler's kindly heart and generous nature, especially to the poor. It is not on record that he ever turned an impoverished client away for lack of a fee, and his charitable gifts, unostentatiously made and unheralded, were many. Though not a professing Christian, he had many excellent traits of character that will be remembered kindly by those who knew him best, and with gratitude by the nation he served well and faithfully in its period of trial.

SIN'S SNARES.

Written for The Christian Herald.

SIN caught my feet in countless snares
And flung me on the earth to die;
The Priest and Levite both passed by,
Intent upon their studied prayers.

Then came to me, ere hope was dead
One who unloosed my swollen feet,
And gave me drink and food to eat,
And soothed, with gentlest hand, my head.

Sight slowly came to my faint eyes,
And looking upward I could see
The Saviour bending over me,
And listening, heard him say, "Arise!"

I feebly to my feet arose;
I took his hand and soon grew strong;
And now throughout my whole life long
I'll follow him where e'er he goes.

I'll labor uncomplainingly,
Day in, day out, from morn till night,
When harvest fields are broad and white;
For he is wondrous kind to me.

JOY IN SERVICE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Feb. 5. Ezra 6: 16; Rom 14: 16-19.

JOY is not the element in the Christian life and service that it ought to be, and would be, if we realized more fully what the blessings involved really are. If one who had visited the poor in their homes, had witnessed their privations and sufferings and sympathized with them, acquired a secret which would remove poverty from the world, his heart would bound with joy as he went to impart it. If a beloved friend were in imminent danger of death by a fatal disease, and one witnessed his family stricken with grief at the approaching separation, with what joy we would carry to the family the news that a sure remedy had been discovered that would restore the loved one to health and strength. Who would not rejoice to be the bearer of a pardon to a repentant criminal on the eve of his execution? Yet the message of the Gospel is more than any of these. It is the news of eternal life, of godliness which is profitable for the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. Yet we often hold our peace, or speak of our secret in a perfunctory manner, as a duty that we ought to perform, but which it would be more pleasant not to do. It is not surprising that the world does not believe that religion is the glorious thing it really is, when there is so little joy in our life and service. It does not appear to the outsider a desirable thing when they who possess it are not evidently happier for its possession. If we try to conceive of what society would be if Christianity were withdrawn and the whole world were given over to godlessness, the blessings of its influence become apparent. But when we go farther than this and consider what our own lives would be if in our trials and sorrows and bereavement we were deprived of the comfort and support of personal religion, then we realize the value of the news it is our privilege to communicate. Then we can take up the song of the angels on that glorious night and say to all with whom we come in contact, we bring you glad tidings of great joy.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF DETROIT, MICH.

THE Y. W. C. A. IN NEBRASKA.

THE principle of associating young people in Christian work has taken hold and its value has been heartily appreciated in Nebraska. One form in which it has thriven is the Young Women's Christian Association. Miss Eleanor K. Brace writing from Lincoln to Faith and Works gives the following encouraging report of its progress: In addition to the parent Association, with its several departments, we now have a Young Woman's Branch, strong, helpful, energetic and enthusiastic. They have recently placed a piano in the Young Woman's Boarding Home. One needs only to see the bright faces clustered around it every evening to know that it is appreciated. But another item of greater interest is the occasion of this letter. Outlined against the blue hills, several miles distant, stands a stately building, the home of the Western Normal College, which has opened within the year and now numbers nearly a thousand students from many States. One day there came a request for the organization of a W. C. A. branch among the young women of the college. Our President explained to the college authorities the plan of the International Board to which we belong, and left them to decide if they would be identified with this body. They announced their desire to belong to the W. C. A. as represented by the International Board, consequently a Branch was organized in the college with a charter membership of seventy. The young ladies are much in earnest and they are being trained to take up their share of the world's work.

THE DETROIT Y. M. C. A.

AN energetic, active association is that of Detroit, Mich., a picture of whose building appears on this page. It added to its membership last year one hundred and twenty young men, some of whom had the best of all reasons for joining it, in the fact that during the year the Association had been their spiritual birth-place. At one of its recent meetings four young men took part in the exercises who not along ago were without Christ in the world, but were rescued through accepting an invitation to the rooms of the Association. It stands in a central position on the corner of Griswold Street and Grand River Avenue and is a commodious and well-arranged building. The cost of it, including the site on which it stands, was $150,000. It has a membership of 1,605, of whom nearly one-half are on the active list. It has a well-equipped gymnasium, a library of over eight hundred volumes and a large and well-furnished reading-room, of which over five hundred young men make use daily. Five educational branches are conducted with efficient teachers, besides the spiritual work, which is properly made the chief feature of the Association's work.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

IT is gratifying to notice the energy manifested by an Iowa League. At Shell Rock, recently, the members began an aggressive evangelistic movement, which promises good results. The town was mapped out in districts and the League was divided up in parties, each of which was assigned to a district. Families were visited and invited to the church, and in some instances religious services were held. A little later the outlying country districts were taken in hand and some interesting meetings were held in centrally situated farmhouses, to which people who had been notified by postal-card came from other farms. The young people were cordially received and invited to repeat their visit.—The League at Fairfield, Ill., also, has canvassed their town and is encouraged to continue the practice.—At Cleveland, O., the League at the Franklin Avenue Church has had entire charge of Revival services and has had the happiness of introducing many probationers.—At Lebanon, O., the aggressive work is chiefly concentrated on the students of the University, from among whom several bright active recruits have been enlisted. A committee of the League pays regular visits to the County jail and holds interviews with the prisoners in their cells.—At Carlisle, Pa., the League has 262 members. It has added a Chautauqua L. & S. circle to its other attractions, and forty members have joined it.—From all quarters testimony comes from pastors and people that the Epworth League is arousing in the young people an earnest, devoted Christian spirit, quickening their own spiritual life and interesting them in church work. In many churches the majority of the new probationers come either from the League or through God's blessing on its efforts.

A GREETING FROM DR. CLARK.

STEAMER CHINGTU, ON CHINA SEA
NEAR HONG KONG, November 11, 1892.

MY DEAR FRIENDS:—So often have I thought of you all while at the other ends of the earth from you that I am moved to write you a brief letter concerning some matters that have been much upon my mind. And first I wish to express my deep gratitude to God, who has made my journey thus far so much more encouraging and productive than I dared hope. Evidently "Christian Endeavor" means the same thing in Australia that it means in America. In God's hands Christian Endeavor is a world-wide movement, and is proving itself adapted not only to every evangelical denomination, but to every nation on the face of the globe. Thus our fellowship is extending and our brotherhood is to some extent answering our Lord's prayer "that they all may be one."

But the space of this letter will not allow me to write more of the things I have seen. In The Golden Rule and other papers I shall write to many of you full particulars of these things which interest us.

As I am looking forward to the Week of Prayer (it may have passed when you read this letter), I am hoping and praying, as I know you are, that this may be a year of great spiritual blessings and of many conversions. Let us do all we can to answer our own prayers, remembering the vow which so many of us took at New York last July "to endeavor to bring one soul to Christ during the year."

Again let me urge you to make this a year memorable for a missionary advance movement. Dedicate, will you not, Christian Endeavor Day, February 2, 1893, to this effort, and, so far as possible, let me ask you to have a Self-Denial Week immediately before that day, so that your Christian Endeavor Day thank-offering to missions may cost you something, and be in a sense "extra," over and above what you would otherwise give.

From the hundreds of replies that came to my office before I left home in regard to the proportion of Christian Endeavorers who attend their own Sunday evening and midweek services, I was glad to find that 85 per cent. of our active members attend regularly and habitually the Sunday evening service; and that 64 per cent. attend the midweek church service,—in each case fully twice as large a proportion as attended these services from the whole church, old and young. But let us not be satisfied with these figures. They are not as large as they should be. Let us not be satfied until all our active members are faithful in their support of all the other services of the church, as well as of our Christian Endeavor meetings, unless they are "prevented by a reason that they can conscientiously give to the Master."

Again praising God for his wonderful mercies to our cause during the past year, and thanking him, also, upon every remembrance of you all, and hoping to meet and greet many of you personally at our great convention in Montreal next July, I am, whether in Australia or Asia, Europe or America, Always your sincere and devoted friend, FRANCIS E. CLARK.

THE Jerusalem Y. M. C. A. which the missionary secretary for Egypt is visiting, shows signs of much activity and blessing. The secretary, Mr. Frank T. Ellis, of Mount Zion, is exerting himself for the formation and resuscitation of associations in several other centres of the Holy Land—Jaffa, Nazareth, etc.

The Family and Home Circle

A MESH AT A TIME.

JUST a mesh at a time, my child!
It's not so hard as you think:
Slip in the shuttle, draw up the loop
Without a knot or a kink
So, one by one, those tiresome holes,
That seem so many to mend,
Will all be done, though you'll hardly guess
Just how, when you come to the end.

Just a mesh at a time! Oh, child,
In this work-a-day world of ours
There are nets to mend, and fish to catch
For us all, with our varied powers.
If we may not be like the learned and great
That toil with the brain and pen,
We may do their work to whom Christ said,
"I will make you fishers of men."

A ROYAL WEDDING.

Queen Victoria's Granddaughter and the Future King of Roumania.

WHILE European skies are ominous with portents of war, it is pleasant to record an event that tells of happiness and peaceful affection. Such an event was the recent wedding, at the old Hohenzollern Castle of Sigmaringen, near Stuttgart, of Prince Ferdinand Victor Albert Mainard, heir apparent to the throne of Roumania, and Princess Marie Alexandra Victoria, eldest daughter of Prince Alfred of England and Marie Alexandrowna, daughter of Czar Alexander II. of Russia.

Princess Marie, the bride, is a girl of eighteen, of a warm, generous temperament, good-hearted and with many excellent qualities. Like all the other English princesses, she has received an education in which heart-culture has not been overlooked. Ferdinand, who was born in 1865, is the second son of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, the head of a great princely house of which Emperor William represents the younger branch. Carlos, King of Roumania, is his father's younger brother; but, having no heir, Ferdinand stands next in succession. He was made Crown Prince by royal decree three years ago.

Ferdinand some time ago caused no little perturbation in Roumania by his apparent determination to marry Mlle. Nellie Vacaresco, one of the ladies-in-waiting to the queen. King Carlos forbade the match, which, had it been allowed to take place, would probably have resulted in the resignation of his entire cabinet, who protested against it. The queen (who is widely known as Carmen Sylva, the eccentric poetess), was greatly mortified, since she had set her mind upon the marriage, and after the mandate prohibiting it, she left Roumania with Mlle. Vacaresco for a time and lived in Venice.

Sigmaringen, where the wedding took place, comprises besides the little town itself, an estate of fourteen square miles of country. Representatives of all the reigning houses in Europe were present in the little Lutheran chapel where, after the first formal cermony, the knot was tied by a clergyman of the Anglican Church. The young pair were pleasantly surprised at the outset of their wedded life to be invited by Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, to visit the Vienna Hofburg, before settling down to domestic life in Roumania. Thus England, Germany, Russia and Austria especially, and other European royalties by representation, came together in friendly relations when all thoughts of war and conquest must have for a time been banished from their hearts and thoughts and when the Gospel of love and good-will must have reigned supreme. Happy, indeed, would it be for Europe if such amicable relations could last!

The Sin of Fretfulness.

You will see in the world chiefly that for which you look, writes Dr. Talmage. A farmer going through the country chiefly examines the farms, an architect the buildings, a merchant the condition of the markets, a minister the churches; and so a man going through the world will see the most of that for which he especially looks. He who is constantly watching for troubles will find them stretching off into gloomy wildernesses, while he who is watching for blessings will find them hither and thither extending into harvests of luxuriance. Like most garments, like most carpets, everything in life has a right side and a wrong side. You can take any joy, and by turning it around, find troubles on the other side; or you may take the greatest trouble, and by turning it around, find joys on the other side. The gloomiest mountain never casts a shadow on both sides at once, nor does the greatest of life's calamities. The earth in its revolutions manages about right—it never has darkness all over at the same time. Sometimes it has night in America, and sometimes in China, but there is some part of the earth constantly in the bright sunlight. My friends, do as the earth does. When you have trouble, keep turning around, and you will find sunlight somewhere. Amid the thickest gloom through which you are called to pass, carry your own candle. A consummate fret will, in almost every instance, come to nothing. You will not go to such a merchant's store, nor employ such a mechanic, nor call such a minister.

A ROYAL MARRIAGE—PRINCE FREDERICK AND PRINCESS MARIE.

A Sunny-tempered Girl.

IF it is your good fortune to go to the World's Fair, be sure you see there the quilt made by a girl without any hands. It is said to be beautifully embroidered, with many dainty designs, though Miss Burdena Sweet, its cunning artificer, had both her hands amputated at the wrist. The disaster came to her about four years ago, in one of those terrible western blizzards whose very memory chills the blood. She was then eighteen years old, an industrious, merry-hearted girl, on her way to her brother's wedding. But the terrible suffering that took away her hands did not deprive her of her sunny cheerfulness, nor of her pluck and enterprise, nor even of her usefulness, as this quilt will prove to the world. She sews with a leather strap, on which a cushion is fastened, banded tightly to her right wrist. She pushes the needle with the strap, and pulls it out with her teeth. She can write, crochet, make button-holes, shell peas, sweep, run a sewing machine, and do many other things—without hands.

"The Christian Herald" in the Home.

WE are constantly in receipt of many letters from all parts of the world, telling us how welcome a visitor THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in the home circle. One of our readers, writing from Gainesville, Ga., says:

"I find great help in it; in fact, next to my Bible comes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; not having even a small library, I make a library of the paper itself, for I get a good deal of instruction. My chief object in life is to try and spread the good news of salvation, and I do not know of a better way than sending forth THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for I can put it in places where I could not go myself. I do not like to talk about myself; and you will find a good many mistakes in my grammar, but it is the best I can do; but I did not make a mistake when I came to Jesus! It is the best remedy I know for facial blemishes; it has cured me of a red nose, and bleared eyes and has taken the appetite for drink and tobacco from me. I am three years old in Christ, but I am forty-five years old naturally. I mention this because it makes my heart bound for joy when I read in the columns of your paper about the good men and women that are working so faithfully in the Master's vineyard to bring such as me to the loving Saviour."

A Father Who Always Helps.

I ONCE knew a young man, says a reverend writer, who by an unfortunate combination of difficulties found himself in financial straits, without knowing which way to turn or what to do to escape adversity. It so happened that his father learned of his difficulty and sent him a few words by telegraph that put joy in his heart as soon as he received the message. All the telegram said was, "Draw on me for what you need," but every word was the same as gold to the needy son, because he knew his father, and knew that he would never send him such a message as that unless he meant it. And so with his father's word in his hand he set out for a bank at once and proceeded to act upon it. How many heartaches and weary days it would save us, if we would only receive our Heavenly Father's words with the same faith. There would not be so many precious promises in the Bible for God's children if it were not intended that they should use them. "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man." No matter if that man be our father.

A Helping Hand to Young People.

I HAVE a friend who is pastor in a country parish, says a writer in The Advance. Like all country churches this one is continually sending its young men to the cities. On a recent Sabbath I heard him say in public, "If any of my people are going away, I shall be glad to give them a letter to the pastor of the church which they will attend." It has been his custom for years to do this for any who wished it, and sometimes he sends in addition through the mails a letter to the same pastor, asking him to look up and take an interest in a person or family going from his congregation, whether members of the church or not. A young man recently went from his church to a Southern city. The Year Book showed that there were three Congregational churches in the city. So he wrote a letter of introduction to each of these two pastors, and gave both to the young man. In less than a week a cordial letter came from one of them in which was this sentence: "If pastors, whose members come southward, would follow this excellent plan, we should lose fewer of our own people, and the opportunity to extend courtesies would be oftener afforded than now." I am permitted to pass the suggestion on for the benefit of other pastors, and other young men and women and migrating families.

CHILDHOOD'S FAITH.

THERE is no need of trying to implant faith in a child's nature, for it is there to begin with, writes H. Clay Trumbull. But there is need of training a child's faith, so that it shall be rightly directed and wisely developed. Every child has the instinct of faith, as surely as it has the instinct of appetite. The inborn impulse to seek nourishment is not more real and positive in a normal child, than is the impulse in such a child to cling to and to trust another. Both instincts are already there, and both need training.

The faith here spoken of is that faith that rests on a person, not that miscalled "faith" which applies to an assent to a series of dogmas. True faith, indeed, always rests on a person. Any other use of the term is only by accommodation, and is liable to be misleading. One of the best definitions of Christian faith is, "That act by which one person, a sinner, commits himself to another person, a Saviour." Even before a child is old enough to learn of a Saviour, the instinct of faith is one of the child's qualities. While the instinct of faith is innate in the child, a knowledge of the One on whom his faith can rest with ultimate confidence is not innate. A knowledge of God comes to man by revelation; and whoever has responsibility for a child's moral training, has the duty of revealing to that child a knowledge of God. But a child can understand God, and can grasp a true conception of him, quite as easily as the profoundest philosopher can. A child does not need to be led by degrees into a knowledge of God. As soon as he is capable of learning his voice can be heard by his loving mother or his loving father in another room, he is capable of learning that his voice can be heard by a loving Father whom he has never seen; who is always within hearing, but never within sight; who is the loving Father of his father and mother, as well as of himself and of everybody else; who is able to do all things, and who is sure to do all things well.

If you plainly tell a child that God knows what is best for us, better than we know for ourselves, and that, while God is glad to have us come to him with all our wishes and all our troubles, we must leave it to God to decide just what he will give to us and do for us, the child is ready to accept this statement as the truth; and then his faith in God is not disturbed in the slightest degree by finding that God has decided to do differently from his request to God in prayer. On every side, children are being taught to have faith in prayer, rather than to have faith in God; and, in consequence, their faith is continually subject to shocks which would never have disturbed it if it had been trained to rest on God.

THE COMING DAY.

"The redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion: and everlasting joy shall be upon their head; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away." Isa. 51: 11.

OH, the day of joy that's coming,
When the reign of sin is o'er,
And this earth renewed and ransomed,
Paradise shall bloom once more.

Righteousness and truth forever
Fill the world with love and light,
And the reign of wrong and error
Vanish in the endless night.

Eyes that wept shall shine with rapture,
Hearts once broken sing for joy,
And the peace that passeth telling
Fill each heart without alloy.

Ay, that day is coming, coming.
Sing, my soul, rejoice and sing,
Like a "bride prepared" to meet him,
Who is coming as thy King.

A STORY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HOME

[illegible] "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XIII.

THE QUESTION OF DIVORCE.

HAVING so flippantly greeted MacGregor, Dora skipped off to her room, with an exhibition of indifference. MacGregor left to himself, stamped his foot, gnashed his teeth, clenched his fist, and tramped into his room, growling that it was a beastly shame! She appeared to have forgotten him in three weeks! She put him on a level with Frick, as an acquaintance."

After silence and solitude had calmed him a little, up spoke common sense, "What would you have? Should this woman greet you as a lover? Is she not married? What right have you to expect to hold to her a different relation from that of Frick or any other? Would it not be a thousand pities, if being married to Denham, she loved you? Would she rise or fall in your esteem if she appeared to care for you other then as an ordinary friend? Are you right to stay here and tempt her to love you, by showing your own love? What good in praying 'deliver us from temptation' and yet open-eyed going into temptation? Go back to your rooms in Buffalo; keep out of this fair woman's way; be an honest man, else you are unworthy of anyone's love. Get to work. Work is a good antidote for misplaced love."

The first supper-bell rang. MacGregor went into the hall and met the chief.

"Hullo, MacGregor!" said John Cardiff, "What's wrong?"

"The wrong is that I'm a fool," said MacGregor. "Send me as far off as you can, will you, on the hardest work you can scare up for me?"

"All right," said John Cardiff, "pack your luggage to-night. I was wondering whom I should send into Michigan for three or four months. It will be cold enough there before you get away, to freeze all the nonsense out of you."

The evenings were now chilly, and a wood-fire blazed on the hearth of the sitting-room of Hotel Marot. Around this fire the family gathered when all the little ones had been escorted up-stairs by the nurse. Mrs. Cardiff would sometimes have preferred to go up-stairs, too. She was not a woman who cared for conversation; but then it was necessary for her to stay below and restrain the too vigorous expression of the chief's opinions. She therefore sat knitting or tatting, and betimes, remonstrating.

"This evening," said John Cardiff, "I have seen a man: A true man is not such a common sight that one need not congratulate oneself on meeting him. He is strong, and knows how —

[illegible]

He gave a little look which none but Tom MacGregor caught; but it refreshed the young man, as cold water does a thirsty soul.

"I wish," continued the chief, "that there were more true men; that all men were true, then affairs would go more smoothly in this world. I find, by an editorial in a newspaper, that one day last month one Court granted sixty divorces, another ten, another twenty-five; another forty, and finally, one a hundred and ten. Cases were stated where a couple had been divorced from, and remarried to each other, two or three times. Yet the Scripture expressly says if that is done, 'Such a land shall be greatly polluted.'"

"What," said Frick. "Suppose they see that in an hour of anger they have made a mistake. Is there no room for repentance?"

[illegible]

said the Chief.

"But not re-marry?"

[illegible]

"I also in this editorial, remarked a case where one woman had been divorced and married four times, and three women living in the same town all married to one man and from whom each had been divorced. Now shall not God, the Covenant-Keeper, surely visit vengeance on such a land as this."

"Mr. Cardiff," remonstrated his wife, "you do discuss such objectionable themes."

"It is time somebody discussed them," cried the Chief.

"But, my dear, not before the young people."

"What good of discussing these themes before Mr. David Rupert or Aunt Lois? Or before Margaret and Richard? Do you and I need warning? I trust not. But these young folks have their lives before them and all their mistakes to make. I want to save them from some enormous ones."

Mrs. Cardiff sighed and knit a round or two on a silk mitten. The Chief would pursue his objectionable way.

"If you are wishing for good men, as a preventive of divorce, why not wish for the reasonable women, too," said Aunt Lois. "I presume there is wrong on both sides, and women are as much to blame as the men."

"I doubt if they are as much, or as often to blame," said Richard. "Of course, in some cases they are the only ones to blame or they are equally to blame, but in the majority of cases, man is the transgressor in one way or another. By neglect, desertion, unkindness, or the constant exasperation of small annoyances he wears out the affection which he might have fostered. What does this incompatibility mean, but irritation arising from a thousand little worries and slights and spites, which finally accumulate into a mountain of misery too great to be borne? I think if men were manly, considerate, attentive, grateful for the multitudinous little attentions they constantly receive from their wives, that we should hear little of incompatibility. A man aggravates and irritates his wife, year after year, by a thousand little nettle stings of neglect or annoyance, and when she has exhausted all her stock of patience and affection, the cry is—incompatibility! There are some folks whom no one can be compatible with, not even themselves."

"I ask for information," said Frick, when the laugh produced by Richard's vehemence had quieted. "What is the chief fault—of these little faults, on which married life is wrecked?"

"Selfishness," said Cardiff, "one or the other, the man generally, takes up the notion that the home is entirely for his own use, behoof and pleasure. The other people in it are simply there to wait upon his whims. Prompt to blame, and almost never thinking to praise; finding fault; loading other people with all his own trivial annoyances. 'We'll have this. I like it.' 'We'll not go there. I don't like it.' 'I want quiet.' 'I hate company.' 'Shut that door, the draught is on me.' 'Find my things.' 'Close that window I don't like it open.' 'Open that door, I'm warm.' 'This is too cold, that is too hot.' Querulous complaining forms the staple of conversation. If this has been an idol, the gilding is soon worn off, and the poor clay is very apparent."

"Thank you," said Frick, "I have often seen such men and I believe you are right."

"I know I am," said Mr. Cardiff. "It is often thoughtlessness. Men do not mean to be selfish but they don't think."

Tom MacGregor had sat silently listening and stealing a look at Dora now and again. He wondered if she meant to hurt him by that remark she made when they met. Perhaps she meant it in kindness to save him from indulging vain hopes. If there was no hope for him it was well he should know at once. But he felt that he should never forget her.

It was getting late and a silence fell on the party which was broken by Dora and Philippa rising to retire. Then Tom rose, too. Holding out his hand to Dora, he said: "I am going away on the early train with the Chief, and am not coming back. I am going to Michigan, to stay until spring."

"I'm glad he is going," said Dora to herself, after she and Philippa were in bed. "I'm sure he liked me a great deal I make up my mind now, never to get acquainted so well with any other young man. I might learn to like him a great deal, or some other such dreadful thing might happen."

Then she fell to wondering what life might have been, if she had waited until now, without trifling with love and marriage, and had met some brave, honorable, generous, true fellow, like Tom McGregor for instance, and had become a happy, trustful wife. Would she not have been glad to have her own home—like Mrs. Cardiff—to have someone who loved her better than all the world beside, as Richard did Margaret?" She gave a great unconscious sigh.

"Dora, are you awake?" said Philippa.

"Yes."

"Dora—I have been thinking—do you mean to get a divorce?"

"No! I have done one wrong, that is bad enough, I will not try to mend it with another."

"Dora. If you were divorced, you could marry a nice person—like—say, Tom McGregor."

"I don't care enough for being married, to commit a wrong for the sake of it," said Dora, "and I should not think a man would be very happy with a woman, when he reflected that somewhere around the world she had another husband."

"Well, nothing would induce you ever to see that man again"

"No, nothing!" said Dora with great energy.

When John Cardiff came to Hotel Marot a day or two later, he said, "Dora, I have an invitation for you. Will you accept it?"

"First tell me from whom it is."

"It is from Edgar Sayce. He says he would give anything if you would go there for a little while to cheer up Nora. She gets lonely lying in the room all day, with nothing to do, and no company but Mrs. Jenkins. Mrs. Jenkins is the best creature in the world, a model nurse and housekeeper, and takes splendid care of Robbie, but she don't know how to amuse either Robbie or Nora; she attends strictly to business, and her business is not telling stories or singing songs, or making bright little jokes. Nora misses your daily call, Clara"—to Mrs. Cardiff. "Sayce says the other friends are not as thoughtful and considerate as you are."

"Poor Nora was always so selfish she made very few friends and her family all live so far away in New York and Washington. She had a sister with her for a while, but her sister was so much like herself, that she did her harm rather than good," said Mrs. Cardiff.

"And helpless and nervous and hopeless as she is," said Cardiff, "for the first time Edgar Sayce now really loves her. Her present condition does not jar on him as her lazy, luxurious selfishness did. Her misfortunes and sufferings arouse his sympathy, his tenderness, the paternal element which is largely developed in Sayce. It is wonderful how devoted he is to her, and how he thinks of her, and for her, and contrives little pleasures for her."

"There's one thing," said Mrs. Cardiff, "his home is really far more comfortable and his child is better taken of than ever before. He is not constantly irritated by little omissions or great selfish neglects."

"And now, Dora, as we have discussed our neighbors, will you go there and make matters more lively for a while?"

"Yes, indeed, Mr. Cardiff."

"Stay a week, and then bring Robbie out here for a fortnight, it will do him good, and his mother will enjoy him more when she gets him back," said Mr. Cardiff.

Dora went to the city next day. Before she appeared at Mrs. Sayce's she had bought one or two books, light amusing reading, a few new dainties from the confectioners, and a couple of games and puzzles. She also armed herself with a new illustrated Mother Goose, and a nursery story for Robbie.

"Dear me," said Nora softly, "how fresh you look—just as if it wasn't a hot day—and how briskly you came up stairs. I never can walk again!"

"Don't let us think of that. Who knows, doctors are not always right; some day you may astonish them all. Guess what this is, something real delicious! And now while you eat it, and I show Robbie this game let me tell you all the news about everybody and everything; and then I have a book to read to you."

"I don't care much about being read to."

"You'll like me to read to you; and I shall be sure to choose amusing things. I'm going to contrive a table for you so that you can play some new games I have."

"I don't care for games."

"These games are quite new, easy and amusing. Let me tell you what I heard of a young girl, who was hurt just as you are, five years ago. She belongs to a poor family in the country, and she makes most of her own living."

"Oh, she cannot."

"Indeed she does. I read about her various contrivances for tables, and book-rests and so on, and I laid them up for you to help you entertain yourself."

"Dora, you're in mourning—what for? Is, is that man you married, dead?"

Dora turned white. "I don't know. I have never heard anything of him. My Uncle Barlow is dead."

"And why are you in black for him? Did he leave you his money?"

"He left me some money. I am in black for him, because he was very kind to me, and like a father, and it seemed respectful, and Eloise and I were his only relations."

"Now you've got money, I suppose you'll not be a governess."

"For a while I shall. I don't like to be idle, and I think it is a duty to be useful."

"What slaves some folks are to that word duty. I never could see why Edgar made so much of it! It never seemed to mean much to me. But do you know I like Edgar better than ever I did since we were first married? When we were lovers, we did not see much of each other, I lived in New York, and he lived here. When we were first married he was always admiring my appearance, and my dress. Then he began to find fault. I couldn't see what was wrong, I was just the same as I had been, but he grumbled so much. If I hadn't been so good-tempered I suppose we should have had trouble. But now he never finds any fault, and he tries to please me, and brings me things, and do you know I think he is really fond of me."

"Of course he is," said Dora. "Mr. Cardiff said so last night."

Nora looked gratified. "He comes in and sits with me, and tells me things about his business, which I didn't at all understand—and offers to read the paper to me. I can't bear the paper, it is very dull stuff I think."

"Suppose," said Dora, "that you remember all he tells you about business, and think hard about it, and learn to understand it, and understand the paper. It would be nice to be real company for him when he comes in to sit with you."

"Company," sighed Nosa, "you can't guess how little company I have, now your folks are away. Hardly any one comes in. Calls used to bore me, and I hardly ever made them, now I wish I could have the chance to go."

"Suppose we fit up your room attractively with flowers and pretty things and you begin to give little teas here for three or four at a time? How would that do? We must try and make up a little now we have the chance."

Dora remained a few weeks with the invalid and before she left her had brought some little brightness into her dreary life. Not much, for Nora's disposition could not be changed, but she was led to make an effort and was surprised to see how much happier she was. Then Dora went back to her duties at Mr. Cardiff's and resumed the even round of her daily life.

A year, two years passed away. Tom MacGregor had not in these years felt sure enough of himself to return to the circle of enchantment which surrounded Dora Maple. He had convinced himself that John Cardiff's view of the situation was the right one; he cared for no other wife than Dora, and as she was not to be had, he decided to forget her as far as possible and live single.

Sometimes he caught himself wishing that Pierce Denham had broken his neck as he tore down the mountain after the fugitive Dora. But then he might by virtue of the mutilated harness, have felt himself responsible for Denham's death!

Finally Tom came home again. Frick was to be married, and McGregor was in demand as best man. He came. He had been busy in South America and in Australia. He had grown and developed and improved in every way. A strong man, a noticeable, handsome, trust-inviting man was Tom McGregor, when he and Dora met at Frick's wedding. Dora looked at him and was glad that he had gone away, and hoped that he would go again. O, why had she at seventeen thrown away all her chances of happiness! O, folly of an hour, to repent of for a lifetime!

Tom looked at Dora in all the bloom and loveliness of her twenty-second year, and concluded that if he was to be a true disciple of Sir Gallahad he had better set out on his travels on the morrow.

"What a grand looking couple McGregor and Miss Maple make," said Frick's mother to Margaret Rupert. "They seem born for each other. Are they blind, that they don't fall in love with each other?"

"That Miss Maple is a regular icicle," said Frick's sister.

Poor Dora! if she was an icicle, she was an icicle melted into a warm rain of tears, when she was alone that night.

Subscriber. 1. What is the belief and worship of the Jews of the present day? Do they offer sacrifices anywhere? 2. What is the best help one can get in his work as teacher of a Bible class in the Sunday School?

1. The Jews of the present day are divided into two great parties which are widely separated in belief and practice. The Orthodox Jews observe the dietary laws and the feasts and fasts prescribed in the Levitical law. They still look for a Messiah and expect a return to their own land. The Reformed Jews have abandoned the dietary laws, are not expecting a Messiah, nor a return to Palestine. They regard themselves as a race, not as a nation. Like the Orthodox Jews, they practice circumcision and are generally opposed to inter-marriage with Gentiles. They regard Jesus as a great teacher who, being in advance of his time, died a martyr's death, but they reject his claim to divinity. No sacrifices have been offered since the destruction of the Temple. 2. There are many expositions of the lessons published, but none so able or practically useful as those published weekly in the Sunday School Times of Philadelphia.

C. Mynatt, Hall's Cross Roads, Tenn. 1. What is the most concise and reliable history of the Christian Church? 2. Is "the Lord's Day" mentioned Rev. 1: 10, Saturday or Sunday?

1. That by Philip Schaff published by Funk & Wagnall's, New York. 2. Probably Sunday. It was identified by the name of the Lord's Day in the writings of the early Fathers and the name was doubtless in use in the time of John.

Mrs. Geo. Waldron, Addison, Vt. Has the Gospel been preached to all the nations on the earth?

Although there may be, and doubtless are, tribes in remote parts of the world—in Central Asia, Central Africa, or the regions beyond Kamschatka, and lying south of the Pole—who have not yet come under Gospel influences, the Word can be said to have been preached to every nation known to exist at the present day. The Gospel is now printed in nearly 150 different languages and spoken by missionaries and others in still more.

William Hatch, Farley, Iowa. Was Christ born on Dec. 25? The fact of shepherds being in the fields at the time make it unlikely.

There is nothing in the New Testament to guide us in fixing the date. The festival of Christmas does not appear to have been observed in Apostolic times or those immediately after the apostles. The fact of the shepherds being in the fields, however, does not disprove the contention of Christ having been born on Dec. 25. In the climate of Palestine there would be nothing to prevent them being in the fields at that time.

Jame W. Morrow, Greenville, Tenn. Possibly the guides might point out the pillar, but the identification would not be worthy of belief. To your question as to the finger, we answer, no it would not come back.—J. J. Allen, Grand Junction, Colo. It has been published several times in this journal. The last time on October 5, 1892.—Mrs. P. W. Whitener, Newtown, N. C. You can get card and all particulars by writing to Mr. C. A. Jamison, 209 North Monroe St., Peoria, Ill.—Mrs. J. Murley, Montserrat, Mo. Conviction came on the road and there was complete surrender, but his mind must have been in a confused state until in the city he had further teaching.

J. D. F., Howard, Kan. Is the command in Acts 15: 29, as to abstinence from things strangled, still in force?

There is a difference of opinion on the question. The majority of Christians, however, regard it as obsolete. The primary occasion for the decree was to establish harmony in the early Church. It was intended to prevent Gentile Christians from unnecessarily offending their Jewish brethren by a practice peculiarly offensive to them. The occasion which gave rise to the command having passed away, the command itself has not been generally observed in modern times. Some Christians, however, still are very careful to obey it.

R. W. Hastings, Independence, Oreg. If the Father and the Son are one, how can the Father know of the date of an event of which the Son is ignorant?

Christ explicitly stated the fact (Mark 13: 32.) In what way or to what extent, if at all, the incarnation limited the divine attributes cannot be defined. Although Christ said (John 10: 30), "I and my Father are one," yet he said, too, "My Father is greater than I" (John 14: 28) and the fact of his praying to his Father indicated that in the days of his flesh there was a distinction between them that is incomprehensible to us. As we cannot explain the mysterious connection in our own being of the mind and the brain, we cannot understand the greater mystery of the Trinity.

A. H. Briggs, Chicago, replying to the inquiry of C. M. Yarmouth, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Jan. 11, sends the following: I find this hymn in an old collection, used by the M. E. Church at an early day, previous to 1850. I could almost repeat it from memory, as I sang it many times in Central New York, when I was a young man, before I was converted. It was a favorite of my mother.

Oh, tell me no more of this world's vain store,
The time for such trifles with me now is o'er;
A country I've found where true joys abound,
To dwell I'm determined on that happy ground.

The souls that believe in Paradise live.
And me in that number will Jesus receive;
My soul, don't delay—he calls thee away,
Rise, follow thy Saviour, and bless the glad day.

No mortal doth know what he can bestow,
What light, strength and comfort; go after him, go!
So onward I move to a city above,
None guesses how wond'rous my journey will prove

Great spoils I shall win from death, hell, and sin,
'Midst outward affliction shall feel Christ within:
And when I'm to die, receive me, I'll cry,
For Jesus hath loved me, I cannot tell why.

But this I do find, we two are so joined.
He'll not live in glory and leave me behind:
So this is the race I'm running through grace,
Henceforth—till admitted to see my Lord's face.

"At Gettysburg my ankle was smashed by a bullet. The wound has caused me great suffering, breaking out in terrible sores at intervals. Physicians made two amputations. At last my blood became poisoned and sores broke out all over my face and body. One day I read about Hood's Sarsaparilla and decided to try it. Soon my wife in dressing my leg, said the wound looked better and in a few months, thank God, the sores all over my body healed, and now four years later, have never shown any sign of reappearing." MENACED BY INDIANS.*

A STORY is told of General William Clarke, engaged in his time in the work of safeguarding the settlers' lives and interests among the roving Indians of the western plains, which shows that difference of race sets up no barrier to the sway of a personal magnetism. Clarke was unmistakably a strong man, upright, kindly, full of resource, and brave as pioneer needed to be in wilds that swarmed with wily foes. As a rule he managed very well by diplomacy. But an occasion arose that put him in ugly straits. It seemed as if sanguinary strife must inevitably break out, and the situation was peculiarly awkward, because, when the crisis came, the General had at his command only a handful of men and in his commissariat very scanty supplies. The Indians were aware of both these facts, and were exultant accordingly. They meditated cutting off the whole band of white men by a treacherous massacre. For the moment they failed to reckon with the force of General Clarke's personality. Yet this strange power thwarted their hate. The General called a council with the Indians, and, contrary to all precedent and etiquette, the savage warriors appeared on the scene fully armed. Clarke was ill-prepared to resent the menace, but though as yet silent, he lost nothing of his grim, calm dignity. The Indian chief drew from under his blanket a rattlesnake's skin stuffed with powder and ball and flung it towards the General. It was a dramatic declaration of war, and at any instant the tomahawks might leap into the air. Clarke had in his hand only an ordinary riding whip. With this he curiously turned the snake-skin over and over, and drew it nearer. Already his demeanor was producing its effect. A weird stillness prevailed, until at length the white leader had succeeded in coiling the heavy skin around his whip; then with an adroit movement Clarke cast the symbol of war back to the chief, and said quietly, "If the Indians want war they can have war." The unflinching courage, the wonderful mesmerism of individuality, mastered the fierce braves. They were cowed. Their vindictive passion was held in leash by an inexplicable moral influence. This, and the belief that recruits must be near, or the General would have been less daring, caused them to withdraw from the council and the fort, and so the thunder clouds rolled away; not a blow was struck.

It is the same mark of manliness, taking a slightly different shape, that has caused the character and career of Andrew Marvell to be so often quoted as an example to youth. A sturdy defender of political honesty in a corrupt time, Marvell did not mind being singular for conscience's sake. He could not trim and pare his convictions to the popular pattern. He was himself every inch a man. The ministers of the second Charles attempted to bribe him. Marvell was member for Hull, and much too careful for the taste of his constituents' interests. An old school-fellow, now Lord Treasurer Danby, was the selected go-between. Danby called at Marvell's house, discoursed on various topics, and at leaving slipped an order on the treasury for a thousand pounds into his friend's hand. Marvell called him back and said bluntly as he returned the paper, "The ministry may seek men for their purpose; I am not one."

Fatal Negligence.

There was, some years since, a rich banker in a great English city, a man who was noted for his large gifts to charities, and for his kindly disposition. He was hurriedly asked one day to go to the succor of an unfortunate shoemaker who had attempted suicide. The appeal [illegible] had goaded the father to the rash act. The banker went to the indicated house, and came face to face with a sad scene of which to his startled surprise his own conduct turned out to be a cause. "It is not my husband's fault," said the weeping wife, "my husband is a hard-working, sober man. But we have been without work for days, for he could neither get work nor the money for that which he had done. To-day he went for the last time to collect a debt due by a rich family, but the gentleman was not at home. My husband was weak from fasting, and it ended—that way." The banker hurried to his own house, opened his desk, and took out a file of bills that should have been punctually paid, but through sheer carelessness were not. Amongst them was an account made out in the name of the poor cobbler he had just visited. It was the rich man's neglected debt that had nearly done an irretrievable mischief.

Livingstone in a Crisis.

Grit was one of the qualities that made David Livingstone great. His first notable journey of exploration into Central Africa is a marvelous chapter in the romance of perseverance. "I say what that man has done is unprecedented," was the judgment passed afterwards by Sir Thomas Maclear. Fever was upon him, enemies were on every side, the country was unknown and perilous, yet Livingstone pressed forward and reached his goal. To the last stage success was uncertain. The spirit of mutiny was rampant amongst the servants and the escort. "Some of my men proposed to return," says Livingstone, "and the prospect of being obliged to turn back from the threshold of the Portuguese settlements distressed me exceedingly. After using all my powers of persuasion, I declared that if they now returned I should go on alone; and returning into my little tent, I lifted up my heart to him who hears the sighing of the soul. Presently the head-man came in. 'Do not be disheartened,' he said, 'we will never leave you. Wherever you lead we will follow. Our remarks were only made on account of the injustice of these people" (rapacious surrounding tribesmen). Others followed, and with the most artless simplicity of manner told me to be comforted 'They were all my children; they knew no one but Skeletu and me, and would die for me; they had spoken in bitterness of spirit, feeling they could do nothing.'" The tedious journey, with its twenty-seven attacks of fever, its heavy toil and wearing anxieties, reduced the brave traveler to a skeleton. But by faith in God and dogged determination he conquered.

THE STORY OF A SONG.

BY H. B. GIBBUD

WE all want to do big things, we long for great talents, and instead of using what we have, we stand idly wishing we could preach like Moody or sing like Sankey, and souls are slipping by us and down to hell—

Lost for want of a word,
A word that we might have spoken.

I heard Mr. Sankey say, that when Mr. Moody and he were holding meetings in a certain place, the church was filled, and a great multitude gathered outside. In order that all might hear the singing, the organ was placed on the steps of the church, and Mr. Sankey sang the famous, "Ninety-and-Nine."

On a distant hill-side a man was sitting on a veranda, out of sorts with his wife and daughter, because they had gone to the meeting.

He had no interest in such things.

As he sat there, one verse of the song carried by the breeze reached his ears:

None of the ransomed ever knew
How deep were the waters crossed: [through
Nor how dark was the night that the Lord passed
Ere He found His sheep that was lost.

It was an arrow that pierced his soul and led to his conversion. What a grand thing to sing the Gospel, and win souls in that way! But we need not be able to sing like Mr. Sankey to win souls, as the following story will show:

One of the workers at the Rescue Mission, sat at the window sewing. She is not a grand singer; in fact, scarcely ever sings in the meeting, but alone by herself sings the Gospel songs. She was singing:

Oh to have no Christ, no Saviour;
How dark this world must be.

When she had finished, she heard some one calling and saw two girls looking over a neighboring fence.

One said, "Won't you please sing that again?"

I am afraid some of us would have begun to make excuses, and say we were not singers, etc., but this good soul sang it over again, praying God to bless the song, and then went to talk with them. She recognized them as inmates of a place of wickedness, and asked permission to call on them. They would not grant this, but the next day one came to the Mission, and threw herself into the arms of the singer.

"I have been so unhappy," she said, "since I heard you sing; you remind me of my mother, and the days when I was innocent and good; I had a good home, but quarreled with my mother, ran away, and got into a life of sin; I am tired of it. Won't you pray for me?"

They had prayer, and the poor wandering one was led to the Saviour. She said,

"I'll never go back to that place again; I'm going to the poor-master, and ask him to send me home."

The worker furnished the money to pay her fare to her home in a neighboring city, and she went away rejoicing. This was some time ago. Last week, the girl accompanied by her father, paid a visit to the Mission. She was happy in Christ, and had led eleven souls to him, her father and mother being among the number. Her father was full of praise and thanksgiving to God for what he had done to his erring child and the rest of his family, and tears ran down his cheeks as he thanked the singer for the song and for the help she had been to his daughter.

Her desire is to work among the fallen, from whom she has been rescued. What encouragement for weak workers!

Let us sing a song to some poor soul, speak a word, give a tract, or visit some sick and dying one, lead some one to Christ.

God says, in 1 Cor. 1:27-28, that there are five things he will use, namely, "Foolish things, weak things, base things, despised things and things that are not to bring to nought things that are." God will take "a worm to thrash a mountain."

The trouble with us is, we want to be some "lord of the forest," and are not willing to be the worm. Put yourself in God's hands to be used, and he will use you.

If we use what talents we have he will give us more. "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath." It is either use or lose.

A JESUS HOUSE IN AFRICA.

The name sounds quaint, but very significant. It is the name given by the natives of a Western African village to the little building Mr. Woodside, of the American Board, is rearing near Chysamba. He writes: "I spoke in one of my previous letters of our desire to build a house at the ombala. We went up the other day and spoke to the king about it. He very readily gave his consent, and said I should come the next day and he would show me where to build. I did so. He selected a spot in Muenekalia's enclosure, near where we have been holding our Sunday services. We could hardly have chosen a more desirable spot ourselves. As I was leaving the ombala that day one of the old men came out and called to me as I passed his place. He said he just wanted to greet me, and then asked me if I had been up to the king's, and if he had shown me where to build the onjo ya Yesu (the Jesus house.) That is the name they have already given to the house we propose to build."

MAJOR WHITTLE IN IRELAND.

A DUBLIN journal says: the American evangelists have brought to a close the most successful mission that has ever been held in Wexford. Major Whittle, assisted by Miss Whittle and Mr. Stebbins, has held meetings in the Young Men's Christian Association. Large audiences attended twice each day.

When it was announced that he was coming many timid people feared that the scenes which disgraced the town on his visit over nine years ago would be re-enacted. Then there was a riot, houses were wrecked, police had to be drafted in to keep order, and great expense was incurred in making good the damage done by the mob. On this occasion everything was changed, and with one solitary exception not an offensive act or word was offered to anyone connected with the undertaking. The occasion referred to was on Sunday. About three o'clock the Major and his party went along the quay giving books and tracts to all who took them, and were received most courteously by the people, except by one respectably-dressed man, who, putting out his hand for a book, took it, tore it in pieces, and, flinging the torn fragment into the face of the giver, turned round to receive the applause he no doubt expected, but which the people, with one accord, refused to give, showing their disapproval in no uncertain way.

On Tuesday evening the large hall of the association was crowded to excess, and the singing of Miss Whittle, who was assisted by a choir of forty voices, and the singing and playing of Mr. Stebbins, were greatly appreciated. The Major was in his best form, and before closing asked a blessing on all—on the Protestant ministers, the parish priests and all whose exertions were for the good of the poor. On Wednesday the mission party left for Dublin, being accompanied to the railway station by a large number of friends, who joined in wishing them a speedy return.

AT LAST.

CHRIST will be the living splendor,
Christ the sunlight mild and tender,
Praises to the lamp we render,
Ah, 'tis heaven at last!

Broken death's dread bands that bound us,
Life and victory around us;
Christ the King himself hath crowned us,
Ah, 'tis heaven at last! —BONAR.

COLUMBUS AND US.
HE discovered America 1492.
WE discovered Griffith 1891.
You never heard of Griffith? Now, that's what hurts us. Every one seems to know about the discoveries of Columbus, but many are surprisingly ignorant about ours—Not every one, though, for we sold 1100 Griffith lots last year to over 600 people living in 50 different States, Territories and Provinces of North America. That doesn't denote utter darkness in the public mind on CHICAGO'S FACTORY SUBURB, does it?
Our mail of September 3d, 1892 brought in purchases from residents of New Hampshire, Florida, Texas and Washington. That must mean that Griffith has advantages equally recognizable in the White Mountains or the Rockies; on the Staked Plains or in the Everglades. Some of these advantages are:
Two Fuel-Oil Pipe-Lines, Three Trunk Railroads, The Chicago Outer Belt Line, Lots $150 and up; payments $5 and up.

"SHUDDER NOT TO PASS THE STREAM,"

SONGS OF THE JORDAN.

"VENTURE ALL THY CARES ON HIM."

HONORED and sacred above all other rivers, the Jordan is inexpressibly dear to the Christian as it is not only closely associated with the events of our Saviour's life on earth, but is the accepted type of the "river of life and death" that flows between the material and the spiritual worlds. To the pilgrim to Palestine it is, next to Jerusalem and Bethlehem, the object of deepest interest and veneration. As he stands upon its banks, which are glorified at many points along its course with the richest vegetation, he calls up the many memorable events recorded in Scripture concerning it: the crossing of Naaman; the baptisms of John and Jesus, and many other instances that invest the river with memories so sacred as to stir the emotions of all hearts. He traces its course, now rushing swiftly between high, precipitous banks, sterile and rock-fronted, and anon flowing gently and peacefully over a broad channel between deep borders of verdure, fragrant with the odor of flowers and spices, or through ancient forests resounding with the notes of the nightingale, the bulbul, and the turtle-dove. These frequent transitions from narrow rapids, rocky channels and forbidding surroundings to a broad and noble stream, such as is shown in the photograph, with banks splendid with vegetation and color, are referred to in Scripture as the "swellings of Jordan," since at such points the river attains its full width and uninterrupted volume in its course southward to the Dead Sea. Even yet, its wooded banks are the haunts of the lion, the leopard and the jerboa, while the coney is found among its rocky fastnesses almost as numerous as in the days of David and the prophets.

There are many fordable places in the Jordan, for, compared with most of the rivers of our own land, it is a comparatively small and shallow stream. It is, however, the great river of the Bible. Thrice were its waters rolled back by the power of the Almighty, and it was on one of those occasions, when the Ark of the Covenant, followed by the hosts of Israel passed over, that the Jordan was for the first time immortalized in song:

Jordan was driven back.
What ailed thee, Oh, thou sea, that thou fleddest?
Thou Jordan, that thou was: driven back?

Since that day the harps of many nations and kindreds have been attuned to sing the praises of the sacred river of Palestine. Prophets, psalmists, crusader-minstrels, and Christian poets have in turn embalmed in immortal verse and song its glories and its memories. In the later centuries, it has been the inspiring theme of the singers of the Cross. The hymnology of the Jordan is almost universal. It

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE SUNSHINE OF RELIGION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Prov. 3: 17, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness."

YOU have all heard of God's only begotten son. Have you heard of God's daughter? She was born in heaven. She came down over the hills of our world. She had queenly step. On her brow was celestial radiance. Her voice was music. Her name is Religion. My text introduces her. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

But what is religion? The fact is that theological study has had a different effect upon me from the effect sometimes produced. Every year I tear out another leaf from my theology until I have only three or four leaves left. In other words, a very brief and plain statement of Christian belief.

An aged Christian minister said: "When I was a young man, I knew everything; when I got to be thirty-five years of age in my ministry I had only a hundred doctrines of religion; when I got to be forty years of age, I had only fifty doctrines of religion; when I got to be sixty years of age, I had only ten doctrines of religion; and now I am dying at seventy-five years of age, and there is only one thing I know, and that is, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." And so I have noticed in the study of God's Word, and in my contemplation of the character of God and of the eternal world, that it is necessary for me to drop this part of my belief and that part of my belief as being non-essential, while I cling to the one great doctrine that man is a sinner, and Christ is his Almighty and Divine Saviour.

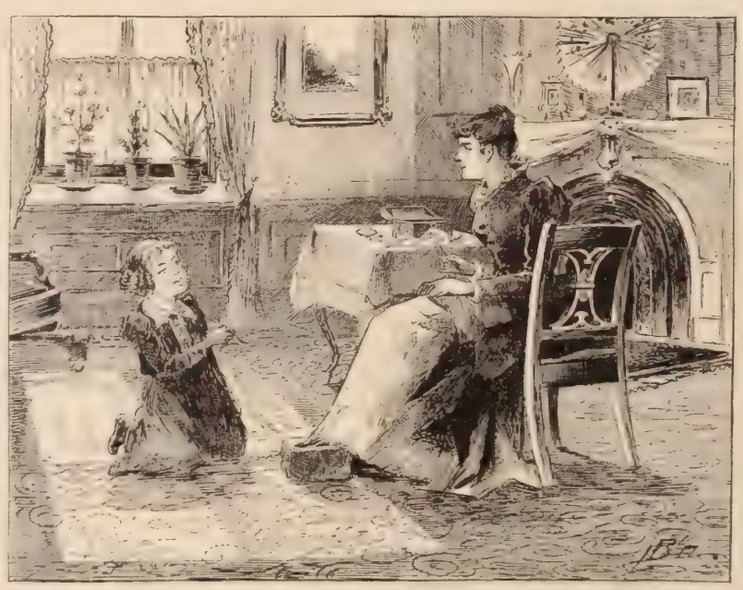
Now, I take these three or four leaves of my theology, and I find that in the first place, and dominant above all others, is the sunshine of religion. When I go into a room I have a passion for throwing open all the shutters. That is what I want to do this morning. We are apt to throw so much of the sepulchral into our religion, and to close the shutters, and to pull down the blinds, that it is only through here and there a crevice that the light streams. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is a religion of joy indescribable and unutterable. Wherever I can find a bell I mean to ring it.

If there are any in this house this morning who are disposed to hold on to their melancholy and gloom, let them now depart this service before the fairest and the brightest and the most radiant being of all the universe comes in. God's Son has left our world, but God's daughter is here. Give her room! Hail! Princess of Heaven. Hail! daughter of the Lord God Almighty. Come in and make this house thy throne-room.

In setting forth this idea, the dominant theory of religion is one of sunshine. I hardly know where to begin, for there are so many thoughts that rush upon my soul. A mother saw her little child seated on the floor in the sunshine, and with a spoon in her hand. She said: "My darling, what are you doing there?" "Oh," replied the child, "I'm getting a spoonful of this sunshine." Would God that to-day I might present you with a gleaming chalice of this glorious, everlasting, Gospel sunshine!

First of all, I find a great deal of sunshine in Christian society.

I do not know of anything more doleful that the companionship of the mere funmakers of the world—the Thomas Hoods, the Charles Lambs, the Charles Matthews of the world—the men whose entire business it is to make sport. They make others laugh, but if you will examine their autobiography, or biography, you will find that down in their soul there was a terrific disquietude. Laughter is no sign of happiness. The maniac laughs. The hyena laughs. The loon among the Adirondacks laughs. The drunkard dashing his decanter against the wall, laughs.



"I'M GETTING A SPOONFUL OF SUNSHINE."

There is a terrible reaction from all sinful amusement and sinful merriment. Such men are cross the next day. They snap at you on exchange, or they pass you, not recognizing you. Long ago I quit mere worldly society for the reason it was so dull, so inane, and so stupid. My nature is voracious of joy. I must have it.

I always walk on the sunny side of the street and for that reason I have crossed over into Christian society. I like their mode of repartee better, I like their style of amusement better. They live longer. Christian people, I sometimes notice, live on when by all natural law they ought to have died. I have known persons who have continued in their existence when the doctor said they ought to have been dead ten years. Every day of their existence was a defiance of the laws of anatomy and physiology; but they had this supernatural vivacity of the Gospel in their soul, and that kept them alive. Put ten or twelve Christian people in a room for Christian conversation, and you will from eight to ten o'clock hear more resounding glee, see more bright strokes of wit, and find more thought and profound satisfaction, than in any merely worldly party. Now, when I say a "worldly party," I mean that to which you are invited because under all the circumstances of the case it is the best for you to be invited, and to which you go because under all the circumstances of the case it is better that you go; and leaving the shawls on the second floor, you go to the parlor to gve formal salutation to the host and the hostess, and then move around, spending the whole evening in the discussion of the weather, and in apology for treading on long trails, and in effort to keep the corners of the mouth up to the sign of pleasure, and going around with an idiotic he-he about nothing, until the collation is served, and then after the collation is served, going back again into the parlor to resume the weather, and then at the close going at a very late hour to the host and hostess and assuring them that you have had a most delightful evening, and then passing down off the front steps, the slam of the door the only satisfaction of the evening.

O young man! come from the country to spend your days in city life, where are you going to spend your evenings? Let me tell you, while there are many places of innocent worldly amusement, it is most wise for you to throw your body, mind, and soul into Christian society. Come to me at the close of five years and tell me what has been the result of this advice. Bring with you the young man who refused to take the advice, and who went into sinful amusement. He will come dissipated, shabby in apparel, indisposed to look any one in the eyes, moral character eighty-five per cent. off. You will come with principle settled, countenance frank, habits good, soul saved, and all the inhabitants of heaven, from the lowest angel up to the arch-angel and clear past him to the Lord God Almighty, your coadjutors.

This is not the advice of a misanthrope. There is no man in the house to whom the world is brighter than it is to me. It is not the advice of a dyspeptic—my digestion is perfect; it is not the advice of a man who cannot understand a joke, or who prefers a funeral; it is not the advice of a worn-out man, but the advice of a man who can see this world in all its brightness; and considering myself competent in judging what is good-cheer, I tell the multitudes of young men in this house this morning that there is nothing in worldly asssociation so grand and so beautiful and so exhilarant as in Christian society.

I know there is a great deal of talk about the self-denials of the Christian. I have to tell you that where the Christian has one self-denial the man of the world has a thousand self-denials. The Christian is not commanded to surrender anything that is worth keeping. But what does a man deny himself who denies himself the religion of Christ. He denies himself pardon for sin; he denies himself peace of conscience; he denies himself the joy of the Holy Ghost; he denies himself a comfortable death pillow; he denies himself the glories of heaven. Do not talk to me about the self-denials of the Christian life. Where there is one in the Christian life there are a thousand in the life of the world. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness."

Again: I find a great deal of religious sunshine in Christian and divine explanation. To a great many people life is an inexplicable tangle. Things turn out differently from what was supposed. There is a useless woman in perfect health. There is an industrious and consecrated woman a complete invalid. Explain that. There is a bad man with thirty thousand dollars of income. There is a good man with eight hundred dollars of income. Why is that? There is a foe of society who lives on, doing all the damage he can, to seventy-five years of age; and here is a Christian father, faithful in every department of life, at thirty-five years of age taken away by death, his family left helpless. Explain that. Oh! there is no sentence that oftener drops from your lips than this: "I cannot understand it. I cannot understand it."

Well, now religion comes in just at that point with its illumination and its explanation. There is a business man who has lost his entire fortune. The week before he lost his fortune there were twenty carriages that stopped at the door of his mansion. The week after he lost his fortune all the carriages you could count on one finger. The week before financial trouble began people all took off their hats to him as he passed down the street. The week his financial prospects were under discussion, people just touched their hats without anywise bending the rim. The week that he was pronounced insolvent, people just jolted their heads as they passed, not tipping their hats at all; and the week the sheriff sold him out all his friends were looking in the store windows as they went down past him.

Now, while the world goes away from a man when he is in financial distress the religion of Christ comes to him and says, "You are sick, and yonr sickness is to be moral purification; you are bereaved: God wanted in some way to take your family to heaven, and he must begin somewhere, and so he took the one that was most beautiful and was most ready to go." I do not say that religion explains everything in this life, but I do say it lays down certain principles which are grandly consolatory. You know business men often telegraph in ciphers. The merchant in San Francisco telegraphs to the merchant in New York certain information in ciphers which no other man in that line of business can understand but the merchant in San Francisco has the key to the cipher, and the merchant in New York has the key to the cipher and on that information transmitted there are enterprises involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now the providences of life sometimes seem to be senseless rigmarole, a mysterious cipher but God has a key to that cipher, and the Christian a key to that cipher, and though he may hardly be able to spell out the meaning, he gets enough of the meaning to understand that it is for the best. Now is there not sunshine in that? Is there not pleasure in that? Far beyond laughter, it is nearer the fountain of tears than boisterous demonstration. Have you never cried for joy? There are tears which are eternal rapture in distillation.

There are hundreds of people in this house who are walking day by day in the sublime satisfaction that all is for the best, all things working together for good for their soul. How a man can get along through this life without the explanation is to me a mystery. What! is that child gone forever? Are you never to get it back? Is your property gone forever? Is your soul to be bruised and to be tried forever? Have you no explanation, no Christian explanation, and yet not a maniac? But when you have the religion of Jesus Christ in your soul, it explains everything so far as it is best for you to understand. You look off in life, and your soul is full of thanksgiving to God that you are so much better off than you might be. A man passed down the street without any shoes, and said: "I have no shoes; isn't it a hardship that I have no shoes? Other people have shoes; no shoes, no shoes," until he saw a man who had no feet. Then he learned a lesson. You ought to thank God for what he does, instead of grumbling for what he does not. God arranges all the weather in this world — the spiritual weather, the moral weather as well as the natural weather. "What kind of weather will it be to-day?" said some one to a farmer. The farmer replied, "It will be such weather as I like." "What do you mean by that?" asked the other. "Well," said the farmer, "it will be such weather as pleases the Lord, and what pleases the Lord pleases me."

Oh! the sunshine! the sunshine of Christian explanation. Here is some one bending over the grave of the dead. What is going to be the consolation? The flowers you strew upon the tomb? Oh no! The services read at the grave? Oh no! The chief consolation on that grave is what falls from the throne of God. Sunshine, glorious sunshine. Resurrection sunshine.

Again: I find a great deal of the sunshine of this Bible and of our religion in the climacteric joys that are to come. A man who gets up and goes out from a concert right after the opening voluntary has been played, and before the prima donna sings, or before the orchestra begins, has a better idea of that concert than that man has who supposes that the chief joys of religion are in this world, We here have only the first note of the eternal orchestra. We shall in that world have the joy of discovery. We will in five minutes catch up with the astronomers, the geologists, the scientists, the philosophers of all ages who so far surpassed us in this world. We can afford to adjourn astronomy and geology and many of the sciences to the next world, because we shall there have better apparatus and better opportunity. I must study these sciences so far as to help me in my work; but beyond that I must give myself to saving my own soul and saving the souls of others, knowing that in one flash of eternity we will catch it all. Oh! what an observatory in which to study astronomy heaven will be—not by power of telescope, but by supernatural vision; and if there be something doubtful ten million miles away, by one stroke of the wing you are there, by another stroke of the wing you are back again, and all in less time than I tell you, catching it all in one flash of eternity.

And geology! What a place that will be to study geology, when the world is being picked to pieces as easily as a school-girl in botanical lessons pulls the leaf from the corolla! What a place to study architecture, amid the thrones and the palaces and the cathedrals—St. Mark's and St. Paul's rookeries in comparison.

Sometimes you wish you could make the tour of the whole earth, going around as others have gone; but you have not the time, you have not the means. You will make that tour yet, during one musical pause in the eternal anthem. I say these things for the comfort of those people who are abridged in their opportunities—those people to whom life is a hum-drum, who toil and work, and toil and work, and aspire after knowledge but have no time to get it, and say, "If I had the opportunities which other people have, how I would fill my mind and soul with grand thoughts!" Be not discouraged my friends. You are going to the university yet. Death will only matriculate you into the royal college of the universe.

What a sublime thing it was that Dr. Thornwell, of South Carolina, uttered in his last dying moments! As he looked up he said, "It opens; it expands, it expands." Or as Mr. Toplady, the author of "Rock of Ages," in his last moment, or during his last hours, looked up and said, as though he saw something supernatural, "Light!" and then as he came on nearer the dying moment, his countenance more luminous, he cried, "Light!" and at the very moment of his departure lifted both hands, something supernatural in his countenance as he cried, "Light!" Only another name for sunshine.

Besides that, we shall have all the pleasures of association. We will go right up in the front of God without any fright. All our sins gone, there will be nothing to be frightened about. There our old Christian friends will troop around us. Just as now one of your sick friends goes away to Florida, the land of flowers, or to the South of France, and you do not see him for a long while, and after a while you meet him, and the hollows under the eyes are all filled, and the appetite has come back, and the crutch has been thrown away, and he is so changed you hardly know him; you say, "Why, I never saw you look so well." He says, "I couldn't help but be well. I have been sailing these rivers and climbing these mountains, and that's how I got this elasticity. I never was so well." O, my friends! your departed loved ones are only away for their health in a better climate, and when you meet them they will be so changed you will hardly know them; they will be so very much changed, and after a while, when you are assured that they are your friends, your departed friends, you will say, "Why, where is that cough? Where is that paralysis? Where is that pneumonia? Where is that consumption?" And he will say, "Oh! I am entirely well; there are no sick ones in this country; I have been ranging these hills and hence this elasticity. I have been here now twenty years, and not one sick one have I seen,—we are all well in this climate."

And then I stand at the gate of the celestial city to see the processions come out, and I see a long procession of little children with their arms full of flowers, and then I see a procession of kings and priests moving in celestial pageantry—a long procession, but no black-tasselled vehicle, no mourning group; and I say, "How strange it is! where is your Greenwood? where is your Laurel Hill? where is your Westminster Abbey?" And they shall cry, "There are no graves here." And then listen for the tolling of the old belfries of Heaven, the old belfries of eternity. I listen to hear them toll for the dead, but they toll not for the dead; they only strike up a silvery chime, tower to tower, east gate to west gate, as they ring out, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

Oh! unglove your hand and give it to me in congratulation on that scene. I feel as if I would shout. I will shout Hallelujah! Dear Lord, forgive me that I ever complained about anything. If all this is before us, who cares for anything but God and Heaven, and eternal brotherhood? Take the crape off the door-bell. Your loved ones are only away for their health in a land ambrosial. Come Lowell Mason; come Isaac Watts; give us your best hymn about joy celestial.

What is the use of postponing our heaven any longer? Let it begin now; and whosoever hath a harp, let her thrum it; and whosoever hath a trumpet, let him blow it; and whosoever hath an organ, let him give us a full diapason. They crowd down the air, spirits blessed, moving in cavalcade of triumph. Their chariot wheels whirl in the Sabbath sunlight. They come. Halt! armies of God! Halt! until we are ready to join the battalion of pleasures that never die.

O, my friends! It would take a sermon as long as eternity to tell the joys that are coming to us. I just set open the sunshiny door. Come in, all ye disciples of the world who have found the world a mockery. Come in, all ye disciples of the dance, and see the bounding feet of this heavenly gladness. Come in, ye disciples of worldly amusement, and see the stage where kings are the actors, and burning worlds the footlights, and thrones the spectacular. Arise ye dead in sin, for this is the morning of resurrection. The joys of heaven submerge our soul. I pull out the trumpet stop. In thy presence there is a fullness of joy; at thy right hand, there are pleasures forevermore.

Blessed are the saints beloved of God,
Washed are their robes in Jesus' blood;
Brighter than angels, lo! they shine,
Their glories splendid and sublime.

My soul anticipates the day,
Would stretch her wing and soar away;
To aid the song, the palm to bear,
And bow, the chief of sinners, there.

Oh, the sunshine, the glorious sunshine, the everlasting sunshine!

THE VOICE OF THE MASTER.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

WE have heard his voice in the morning,
When tenderly over the hills
The first faint gleam of sunrise
Kissed valleys and murmuring rills;
And it said, in the softest of whispers:
"I love thee; now what will you bring
This day as a token of service
And love, to thy Friend and King?"

And oh, how we answered the whisper
With joy and with eyes ashine:
"Much fruit will I bring, dear Master,
To prove I am wholly thine."
But earth, with its joys, pressed closely,
And murmured, "There's time and to spare!"
We listened, and lo! in the twilight
No offering of love was there.

Then again came the tender whisper:
"I love thee; what gift wilt thou lay
At the foot of the Cross, in token
That thou art mine own, this day?"
And we vowed, while tears were streaming:
"My all I will lay at thy feet."
We meant what we said, but the tempter
Came wooing with promise so sweet.

Of glory, and honor, and pleasure,
We listened, not meaning to stay,
Afar from our King till the gloaming
Had ended the long, bright day.
But, waiting, and tasting, we tarried
'Till twilight was drooping her wing,
And not one gift had we carried
To lay at the foot of the King.

Once again came the tender whisper,
As sunset was dyeing the West
In the chill of the early autumn,
When the meadows in russet were dressed:
"I love thee; what gift wilt thou bring me
To show that thy love answers mine?
The long, fruitful summer is ended:
No sheaves in my garner are thine."

We answer: "If thou wilt but help me,
Wilt grant me thy strength and thy might,
Even yet some proof that I love thee
I'll bring ere the fall of the night.
But hold me, dear Master, and fill me
With love from thine own throbbing heart;
That I may be strong for thy service,
Nor yield to the tempter's art."

Oh! help us, dear Father, to bring thee
Some fruit as the proof of the love
Our lips are so fond of repeating—
Give courage and strength from above!
And spare us from hearing the sentence
While heaven with music is rife,
As slowly the darkness o'erwhelms us:—
"An empty and useless life."

THE LATE BISHOP BROOKS.

The Distinguished Massachusetts Divine Passes Away—His Splendid Career.

IN the death of the Rt. Rev. Phillips Brooks, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts, the Christian Church in the United States sustains a severe loss. He was born in Boston in 1835, and came of a line of distinguished ancestors, being a descendant of John Cotton, the famous Puritan minister of the seventeenth century. He was educated at the Boston Latin School and subsequently at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1854. After a short experience as a teacher, he entered the ministry, first taking a course of theological study at the Episcopal Divinity School of Alexandria, Va. His first charge was as rector of the Church of the Advent in Philadelphia, from which he afterwards went to the Church of the Holy Trinity in the same city, returning in 1869 to Boston, as rector of the famous Trinity Church.

Few clergymen in America attained such high eminence in Christian work as Phillips Brooks, who was long known as the best pulpit orator of the Broad Church Episcopals in this country, and whose fame won him hosts of warm admirers in Europe as well. During his vacations, when he visited England, he preached in St. Botholt's Church in the Chapel Royal, London, in Westminster Abbey, in

THE LATE BISHOP PHILLIPS BROOKS.

Christ Church by invitation of Dean Stanley, and in almost every one of the grand Christian temples of Great Britain. Tall, (he was over six feet in height), and of splendid physique, he possessed a rich, sonorous voice and a magnetic style of oratory that carried his audience with it, in a resistless and impetuous torrent. His discourses were characterized by a clearness of logic and a unique force of argument seldom found in or out of the pulpit. During the years of his service as rector of Trinity Church—which was built and decorated expressly for him, at a cost of over $1,000,000—its pulpit grew to be a moral influence which was felt throughout the Union. His Christianity was of the broadest character, and he was always ready to aid other religious organizations and even to preach the Word in their churches. He had the widest sympathy with every effort that had the elevation or evangelizing of the masses as its object. As a result of this liberal spirit he was in almost universal demand as a platform speaker and pulpit orator; indeed, these outside demands were much greater than those of his own parish. He was a most conscientious correspondent and devoted several hours every week-day to answering letters from all parts of the world, a great proportion of them being from entire strangers.

In April 30, 1891, he became Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts, succeeding Bishop Paddock. The office brought him no greater remuneration; indeed, his income became smaller. The duties included the oversight of many churches, a larger burden than he had as rector of Trinity. But his untiring energy and systematic industry accomplished what a less vigorous, less consecrated shepherd of so vast a flock would not have dared to undertake.

Bishop Brooks belonged to a clerical family, three of his brothers having been ordained in the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He has published a number of books, chiefly compilations, sermons and lectures, among them being a volume of "Lectures on Preaching," delivered before the Yale Divinity School in 1878; "The Influence of Jesus," a series of lectures delivered in Philadelphia in 1879; "Baptism and Confirmation," written in 1880, and others. His writings and lectures have been widely disseminated and rank high in theological literature.

NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter
Neh. 1: 1-11. Golden Text, Ps. 30: 10.

CAN we ever thank our God enough for leaving on record for us some glimpses of the inner life of his children? Had we been permitted to listen when Abraham, Moses, David, Elijah, etc., prayed, and God spoke back to them, should we not have esteemed the privilege above anything earthly which we have known or experienced? God has permitted that some of the prayers of his children should form part of that holy, blessed Book which is able to make us wise unto salvation. (II. Tim. 3: 15.) And this for a practical end. He would have us to "be followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." (Heb. 6: 12.) One of the victories of the men of faith was that they "obtained promises" (Heb. 11: 33); and God places this in the same category as "subdued kingdoms . . . stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire," etc.

Real Prayer

is an intelligent entering into the revealed will of God, and uniting with it. Elijah would have been guilty of the worst presumption in praying for the resurrection of the widow's son, if he had not been quite sure beforehand of the will of his God. Even when Moses withstood God, and God had to say to his interceding servant: "Let me alone," Moses knew beforehand (Ex. 3:, 19: 4-6), that he had purposed to deliver his people, and to bring them into the land of Canaan, and that anything which seemed to contradict his own Word must be a test of his servant's faith.

Eleven years had elapsed since the dedication of the rebuilt temple. Ezra had come up to Jerusalem, he was "a ready scribe in the law of Moses, which the Lord God of Israel had given; and the king granted his request," that he might go up to Jerusalem "according to the hand of the Lord his God upon him." This man had "prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments." (Ezra 7: 6, 9, 10.) To seek, to do, to teach! This was one of God's anointed ones indeed; and the knowledge of God increased among his people. At the same time, the heart of king Artaxerxes was turned towards the people of God; so that he furnished them with money, remitted all taxes levied on the priests and Levites, and gave orders that the law of the God of Israel should be taught and enforced. Ezra was a man of faith, and trusted his God for all the needs of his journey and was ashamed to depend on man (Ezra 8: 21-23); and thus the knowledge of God increased among the people, and a great work of cleansing and of consecration took place. (Ezra 9: 10.) Only eleven years, and the people were spiritually they had made progress, but like the children of God in all times, they were a tried people. Nehemiah, one of the captive Jews, had obtained the office of cupbearer to the king Artaxerxes who had been twenty years upon the throne when Hanani and other Jews just arrived from Judea paid a visit to [illegible]. Naturally Nehemiah asked after the welfare of the Jews in Palestine and after the beloved city Jerusalem, and received the sad reply: "The remnant that are left of the captivity there are in great affliction and reproach; the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates are burned with fire."

It was a matter of importance to Nehemiah how it went with the city of his God. His own position was an honorable one, and lucrative; as far as the world was concerned he was well situated. But it was Babylon, not Jerusalem, the city of the world and not the city of the great king; and his servant took pleasure in her stones, and favored the dust thereof. It went to his heart, and took hold of him: he "sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted and prayed before the God of heaven." There are some believers who think that God has a kind of satisfaction in efforts which we make to pray, to fast, to be sad, and grieve over sin, etc., as though we could some way propitiate the Lord by something proceeding from ourselves. There are so many who cannot understand

Quiet Waiting upon the Lord.

They think if they spend time with God they must be talking to him all the time, and when they have given him a large amount of information which he knew better than they did before, they assail him with a whole host of petitions, which are mostly bows drawn at a venture; many of them extravagant and unreasonable demands, for which they have no warrant in the word of God. Of course they remain in a state of the greatest uncertainty as to whether their prayers will be answered or not. But is this prayer? Is it dealing with God? or is it beating the air? Into whose hands are such prayers committed? Are they definitely or unmistakably placed in the hands of God? If they were, there could not be this uncertainty; "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass" (Ps. 37: 5), something will come of it. How many prayers of human manufacture are never really committed to God, never accompanied by a trust in him, and therefore he cannot bring to pass the matter in question! How many think only of what they want, of the words they utter, of the fervency with which they prey; and God is hardly in their thoughts at all! He sees that those who pray thus are not really dealing with him at all.

Nehemiah's prayer came out of his going apart to wait upon his God about his people at Jerusalem. He began by taking the measure of the God he had to deal with: "O Lord God of heaven, the great and terrible God." Therefore certainly capable of all things here on earth. No self pity, no complaint, but free open confession in which he took a personal part! Had there been any special departure from God since the time of the dedication of the temple? On the contrary there had been a separation unto the Lord as never before; the Levites and the priests had separated themselves from the people of the lands and divorced the heathen wives which they had taken. Why then this confession? There had been a real searching, and learning, and laying to heart of the Word of God among the people. Nehemiah undoubtedly had studied the Word in Babylon as his brethren did in Judea. And as the holy light of God's two edged sword pierced to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit and of the joints and marrow, and discerned "the thoughts and intents of the heart" (Heb. 4: 12), the man of God saw sin where he had not seen it before, and in the presence of his God he was broken and humbled at what came out in that all revealing light. "The spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made" (Isa. 57: 16), says our holy God, and that is no real intercourse with God which does not bring us broken to his feet. Nehemiah pleads no excuse, no palliation. We have dealt very corruptly, and have not kept the commandments . . . which thou commandest thy servant Moses." And then he pleaded the promises by which his God had bound himself, and said,

"Remember them, O Lord."

The Revised Version here is very forcible; in his quoting of God's promises: "though your outcasts were in the uttermost part of the heaven, yet I will gather them from thence, and will bring them into the place that I have chosen to place my name there." Gathered by God, brought into place by God, covered with his name, this is our prerogative in Christ. "Now these are thy servants, and thy people whom thou hast redeemed by thy great power, and by thy strong hand." Then he pleaded, "Prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man."

Little did Artaxerxes know, when Nehemiah, by virtue of his office, presented wine to the king while his face was full of sadness, that the God of heaven, with whom he had been communing, was there unseen, turning his heart whithersoever he would, yet so it was. "Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick?" said the king. "This is nothing else but sorrow of heart." "Let the king live forever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire?" "For what dost thou make request?" was the king's reply. Could it be? Had God so overruled that he had only to frame his petition, and it should be granted? The very greatness of God's answer to prayer only made his servant more dependent upon him. "So I prayed unto the God of heaven, and I said unto the king: "If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favor in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me to Judah, to the place of my fathers' sepulchres, that I may build it." A bold request, but divinely authorized: and God justified it, and morover gave Nehemiah courage to request government letters to the rulers of the province and to the keeper of the forest that the expenses of his journey and the timber needed for the work might be forthcoming. God had shewn him during that time of waiting on him how far he might go, and he knew that he was on safe ground. He had not to think of how such requests might appear to the king, or how any of the courtiers might regard it. He had to deal with God more than with man, and God stood by him. "The king granted me according to the good hand of my God upon me." Such is real prayer—so really, so willingly, so wondrously does God answer!

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A Persian Cup-bearer.

ABOUT seventy years after the events of our last lesson, some of the Jews who had settled in Jerusalem were in Persia, probably on business, and had an interview with Nehemiah, a Jew who held the position of cup-bearer to the king. We are not to suppose that he was in any sense a domestic servant; the office was similar to the modern one of a Lord-in-waiting at a European court, which is conferred as a distinction on a man of high birth. The king was Artaxerxes, the son and successor of Xerxes, the Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther. Nehemiah asked these Jewish travellers how the people in Palestine were getting on. The report was a sad one. The people were in great affliction. We are not told anywhere in the Bible what the events of the greater part of that seventy-year period were, nor what had brought the people into that condition; but that the travellers told Nehemiah the facts we infer from his prayer, which is the subject of the lesson.

I was in Shushan the Palace. It was a dangerous place for a godly man to be. He would be surrounded by wicked men and many temptations. It requires special grace to live faithful to God in such a place. Some visitors were down in a coal-mine. On the side of the gangway grew a plant. It was perfectly white. They were astonished that, amid the coal-dust, this little plant should be so pure and white. A miner who was with them took a handful of dust and threw it upon the plant, but not a particle adhered. Every atom of dust rolled off. If God can keep that herb in the coal mine pure and white can he not keep the heart as white as snow?

The wall is broken down and the gates burned. Gangs of robbers from the surrounding country could come in and kill and murder and destroy. There was no peace nor security. A garden without a wall is in a bad condition; dogs may enter it and spoil the flower-beds; but worse than all is to have a mind and heart without walls where evil thoughts and imaginations enter freely and pollute it. An aged Christian minister who did much good all his life, once said in talking to young men. "Be careful what talk you listen to, and what books you read. One day when I was a boy at school a companion put an infamous book into my hands. I had it only fifteen minutes before I returned it to him, but that book has haunted me like a spectre ever since. I have often asked God on my knees to obliterate from my mind the words I read there; but I shall carry with me to the grave the spiritual damage I received in those fifteen minutes."

"You have seen," said Spurgeon, "the great reservoirs provided by our water companies, in which the water to supply thousands of houses is kept. Now the heart is the reservoir of man, and our life is allowed to flow in its proper season. That life may flow through different pipes—the mouth, the hand, the eye; but still all the issues of hand, of eye, of lip derive their source from the great fountain and central reservoir, the heart; and hence there is great necessity for keeping this reservoir in a proper state and condition, since otherwise that which flows through the pipes must be tainted and corrupt."

I wept and fasted and prayed. That was Nehemiah's way of acting when a great sorrow fell upon him. Sometimes consolers who come to us in trouble, tell us to "bear it like a man." The manly way of bearing trouble is not to curse and swear, not to spend the time in repining but to do the best left to us to repair it. Nehemiah was going to remove this trouble, but first of all he spent some time in confession and prayer, and doubtless through that prayer the king was influenced to favor his desire, and so the help that he most needed was afforded him. "There is no use in keeping the church open any longer; you may as well give me the key," said a missionary in Madras, as in the course of a journey he passed through a village where once so many of the natives had professed Christianity that a little church had been built for them. But the converts had fallen away, returned to their idols, and there only remained faithful the one poor woman, to whom now the missionary was speaking. "Oh, sir," she pleaded most earnestly, "do not take away the key! I at least will still go to the church and go on praying that God's light may visit us again." So the missionary left her the key, and presently the time came when he preached in that very church crowded with repentant sinners; the harvest of the God-given faith of that one poor Indian woman.

God that keepeth covenant. This is a grand description of character. It is sometimes forgotten both as to his promises and threatenings. When in trouble people do not go to him though he has promised to help them. They forget that he is God who keepeth covenant. When people sin, knowing that God has warned them that he will punish the sin, they, too, forget that he is God who keepeth covenant. It is a God-like characteristic to be particular about keeping covenant. While the late English General, Sir. William Napier, was walking one day in the environs of a town, he saw a little girl, of about five years of age, who was sobbing bitterly, while gazing in dismay at the remains of a broken dish lying at her feet. "I was bringing my father his dinner," she said, "and I shall be beaten when I go home for having been so careless." But on seeing the benevolent expression on the old soldier, a ray of hope revived, and she said to him, with all the naivete of youth, "Can you not mend it for me?" The general could not undertake to do that, but he said he would give her the money to buy another, and took out his purse for that purpose. Unfortunately, it happened that there was no small change in it, and so he promised to come back there the next day, at the same hour, and give her the promised sum; and the child went away quite comforted, and trusting to his word. On going home, the General found an invitation to dinner for the following day in a distant town to meet some friends whom he was very desirous of seeing. But he could not avail himself of the invitation without disappointing the little girl. Under these circumstances he declined the invitation on the score of previous engagement, thus preferring to lose the pleasure of seeing his friends to breaking faith with the little girl who had trusted him.

If ye turn to me I will gather you. God has a father's heart. When his children have done wrong and confess it with sorrow, he is ready to forgive and receive them. A father had a stubborn son, who ran away from home with a large sum of money. Some time afterwards the old man received a message saying that he was sorry for what he had done. The son was then in a miserable house, ill and neglected. The father thought, "Shall I go to see him there?" At length, he went. He was horribly disgusted when he entered the house. But when he looked upon the bed, and saw the young man asleep, he noticed his eyelash tremble, and then there came from under it a tear. This moved the father's heart, and he said, "I am his father; he is my child!" The old man put from his mind his disgust at the whole surroundings, and, awaking his son, looked tenderly upon him, saying, "My poor boy, will you come home?" The wretched youth whispered, "Father, if you can forgive me, take me away from here." It was a sad coming home, but all the way the old man said, "He is my boy!" and the youth said, "It is my father!"

Happy "Good-Will Farm."

How God has Prospered a Humble Plan to Rescue and Help Needy Boys.

EVERY man and every woman has a mission to perform. To some, the realization of this truth comes early in life, to others late, and to many, alas! seemingly not at all. There are many bright souls among us in whom the spirit of helpfulness is so graciously developed that their lives become a ministry to others. Of such it may be truthfully said that when they have passed beyond the memories of their good works Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust.

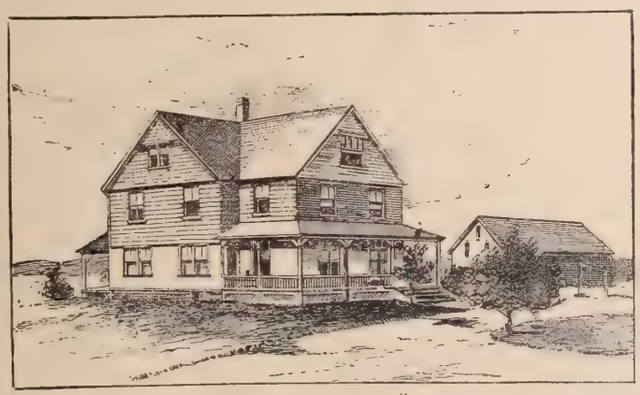
Such men and women are an influence for time and eternity.

The Rev. G. W. Hinckley of East Fairfield, Me., several years ago, while traveling in that State, conceived the idea of providing for deserving and needy boys what he had lacked in his own boyhood. His early years had been a hard struggle and he was in a position to appreciate the dangers that surrounded growing lads in similar circumstances. "Since I was fifteen or sixteen years of age," he says, "every important step that I had taken in life has been influenced by the wish to help the boy in need or in danger. So when I entered the Normal School in Connecticut and three years later entered the ministry and then resigned my pastorate in the state of Connecticut, I believed that each of these steps was bringing me toward the accomplishment of my purpose in life. Work in the mission rooms in Hartford, Conn., and among needy boys in other places, served to strengthen this purpose. I resigned the pastorate of a church in Windsor, Conn., and came to Maine, and made my headquarters in Bangor to engage in Sunday School work under the American Sunday School Union. I had been in doubt as to where the work which I had undertaken should be carried out, but upon receiving the commission from the American Sunday School Union I had not a doubt that somewhere in the State of Maine I would find the foundation for my work."



"GOOD-WILL COTTAGE."

As the plan matured in his mind, he cast about for a site on which to begin his experiment. His first step was to pledge to the work all his income above what was needed for his actual personal necessities. In 1885 he began to save and with the aid of friends who knew of the project, soon had the nucleus of a fund for the purchase of a small farm. Then followed an experience which is best told in his own words:

"In order to settle the matter once for all whether, with my slender means, I would be able to accomplish my purpose, I asked a token from God. I covenanted with him that I would take the neediest boy I could find into my own home, clothe him, feed him and send him to school one year. If in addition to one-tenth of my own income which I would devote to his needs, I should receive unsolicited gifts enough to meet all his expenses and could have at the end of the year $100 left in the bank as a surplus with which to begin further operations, I would never again question that God would bless my undertaking if I should have the courage the start out with it. At the end of the year all the lad's expenses had been met, and I had $200.65 in the bank, so I had received a double token. I then spoke to some of my friends about the matter and they asked why I didn't tell people of my purpose and needs. I thought if I could say I had $500 toward such a project I would then be willing to talk about it. In February 1888, I had $500. Then I said if I only had $1,000 I would dare say something, but it seemed absurd to talk of such a matter when I had so little towards it. One morning a Bangor lady informed me that she had so arranged her papers that I would receive the interest on $500, invested at 6 per cent. for my boy's fund, during her lifetime and at her death the $500 would become a nucleus of an endowment fund for my proposed work for boys. So I had my $1,000, and began to think it time to do something."

Soon after, he succeeded in securing a farm in East Fairfield. It had a dwelling and two somewhat dilapidated barns, but these were repaired and brightened. In the work he had the assistance of several clubs of children called Good-Will Clubs and in honor of their willingness to aid in the work, the place was named after them—The Good-Will Farm. It is pleasantly situated on the west bank of the Kennebec river, six miles from Fairfield. In a few weeks, Good-Will Cottage was ready for occupation and fifteen boys from the Children's Home in Boston came on for a six weeks' vacation. Mr. Hinckley, although he undertook their support during that time, had not a dollar in the treasury; but like Dr. Cullis, Pastor Spurgeon and George Muller, he had faith in the Almighty Banker, and sufficient money came in from friends to pay all the bills and even to leave a small balance in his hands.

His first boys, who were to become permanent inmates of the Home, were taken from this party. With Miss Hinckley, his sister, as matron and Miss Gertrude Higgins of Fairfield as her assistant, he took up housekeeping on absolute faith. Soon four more boys were added, all of the really needy and deserving class. Then Christian men and women throughout New England began to take an active interest in the project. The Home was incorporated and soon memberships were in demand, and funds were generously contributed. At the present time there are over 100 annual members contributing.

More boys came and the work enlarged so quickly that it was found necessary to build more accommodations. There are now three cottages at Good-Will Farm, each with its happy family of bright boys who are being trained to habits of industry and a Christian life. These boys, whose ages range from seven to fourteen, have four terms of school each year, three in the classes and one on the farm. They are taught to perform their duties promptly and faithfully. Last Summer the older boys did nobly on the farm, raising eighty bushels of grain, one hundred of potatoes, eighteen of turnips and other vegetables besides cutting twenty-five tons of hay. As many duties as possible are divided among the boys, each duty lasting two weeks. Besides farm work, indoor work, and the hothouses, there are tool-houses for those who have mechanical tastes, where the rudiments of a trade may be acquired. The boys also print and issue a paper, entitled The Good-Will Record.

The boys who are now being trained on Good-Will Farm are neither criminals, invalids, nor imbeciles, but lads who from various causes are in danger of drifting into immoral lives. Some have dissolute parents, others are orphans, while still others have acquired vicious habits; but all are intelligent and healthy. Home life at the farm is modelled as closly as possible after the average New England Christian household. What will become of those boys after they leave the Good-Will Homes? They will enter different walks in life. They will not leave the old homestead the same day or year. One by one, as they came, so they will go into the world to fill such positions as, with the aid of good friends, they can obtain. The fact that they came from a Christian home, from country living, and the sparsely settled districts, are all in their favor. So if these boys go to the city, one by one, or to the large villages, they will meet the city boy on his own ground. Trained, equipped for life, they will go out, some to the farm, some to the carpenter's bench, some to the pulpit. And the world will be brighter and better because Good-Will Farm was consecrated to the cause of needy boyhood.

SONGS OF THE JORDAN.

is by no means confined to the languages of modern civilization, for in many Oriental tongues its fame is celebrated; but it has remained for the followers of the lowly Nazarene to give to the Jordan that tuneful immortality which no other river on earth has received. The Hindus have chanted, in mournful cadence, the splendid sadness of the yellow Ganges; the Damascenes sang of Abana and Pharpar; the Nile, the Tigris, the Euphrates have all been equally celebrated by nations now passed away. One of the later poets has written of the valley:

Where Alph, the sacred river ran,
Thro' caverns, measureless to man,
Down to a sunless sea.

But those strains have perished with the singers, while the songs of the Jordan have grown in volume and intensity with the passing centuries, and to-day, jubilant and triumphant, they stir the Christian heart throughout the world.

Without a trace of sadness, they partake rather of the nature of the heroic chant of Miriam and the children of Israel, after their passage in safety across the Red Sea; for the Jordan is to the true believer what the narrow arm of the Arabian Gulf was to the hunted tribes of Israel—a stream on the thither side of which lies safety and blessedness. It has entered so much into the songs, the prayers, the rejoicings and the contemplations of Christian people that it may be said to have become a fixed and a very precious type, indicative of the boundary between the present life and the life to come.

One of the noblest and most inspiring of the songs of the Jordan is that penned, about a hundred years ago, by Samuel Stennett, D.D., an English divine, member of a family noted for its piety and consecration:

On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wistful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.

Stennett's beautiful lines have cheered and inspired the hearts of innumerable Christians the world over. It is related of an aged lady, Miss Barbara Jewitt, that on the day of her death she was sitting in the chair in which she had sat for three weeks, and broke out into singing in a loud tone the words of this hymn. Her relatives were alarmed, for she had only been able to converse in whispers for weeks. She sang half an hour and urged her friends to join with her. "Sing on! Sing on!" she called to them; and then, as though turning to angelic spirits, she said, "Stay, stay, I am not ready yet." Even when sight failed her, she still urged her friends to come nearer and keep on singing. At last she fell back in her chair and her pure spirit fled.

Jordan was also a favorite theme with Isaac Watts. The great hymn-writer frequently alludes to the sacred stream as typifying the boundary between this life and the life above. He sings:

Sweet fields beyond the swelling floods
Stand dressed in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood
While Jordan rolled between.

In his hymn on the "Miracles in the Wilderness," Watts writes of the Israelites that

Jordan beheld their march and fled
With backward current to his head.

Dr. Doddridge strikes this exultant strain:

Our grateful souls, on Jordan's shore,
Shall raise one sacred pillar more;
Then bear in his bright courts above
Inscriptions of immortal love."

Toplady thus beautifully adjures the dying Christian:

Shudder not to pass the stream,
Venture all thy cares on him;
Him whose dying love and power,
Stilled its tossing, hushed its roar.

Charles Wesley too had a similar idea when he wrote:

One family we dwell in him
One church above, beneath
Though now divided by the stream,
The narrow stream of death;
One army of the living God
To his command we bow,
Part of his host have crossed the flood
And part are crossing now.

And Phœbe Cary, one of the sweetest Gospel poets, gives us this picture in her famous hymn, "One Sweetly Solemn Thought:"

Nearer the hidden stream,
Winding through shades of night,
Rolling its cold, dark waves between
Me and the world of light.

Jesus! to thee I cling:
Strengthen my arm of faith;
Stay near me while my way-worn feet
Press through the stream of death.

H. W. Lanning wrote in a similar strain:

The Jordan is rolling between me and home;
I stand on the margin, the summons has come.

Nearly sixty years ago, Rev. David Nelson of Connecticut, wrote the familiar hymn—which Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was wont to declare the sweetest in the world—whose chorus runs:

For O we stand on Jordan's strand,
Our friends are passing over;
And, just before, the shining shore,
We may almost discover.

Rev. John Atkinson expresses the same beautiful idea in a charming hymn which Mr. Hubert P. Main has set to popular music:

We shall meet beyond the river,
By and by, by and by;
And the darkness shall be over,
By and by, by and by:
With the toilsome journey done,
And the glorious battle won,
We shall shine forth as the sun,
By and by, by and by.

Miss Fannie Crosby, the blind writer of many of our most beautiful spiritual songs says of the Jordan in her hymn entitled, "Jesus Keep Me Near the Cross":

Near the Cross I'll watch and wait
Hoping, trusting ever,
Till I reach the golden strand,
Just beyond the river.

And in the well-known hymn, "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," R. Palmer sings:

When ends life's transient dream;
When death's cold, sullen stream
Shall o'er me roll;
Blest Saviour, then in love,
Fear and distrust remove:
O bear me safe above—
A ransomed soul.

Thirty years ago, "In the Christian's Home in Glory," was a favorite revival hymn, and is still sung in many churches. The chorus contains these lines:

On the other side of Jordan
In the sweet fields of Eden,
Where the tree of life is blooming,
There is rest for you.

In his familiar hymn, "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah," H. Williams thus expresses the feelings of the dying Christian:

When I tread the verge of Jordan,
Bid my anxious fears subside;
Bear me through the swelling current,
Land me safe on Canaan's side.

And Rev. J. Haskin, conveying the same idea, writes thus comfortingly of the crossing of the river:

I know I'm nearing the holy ranks,
Of friends and kindred dear,
For I brush the dews on Jordan's banks,
The crossing must be near.

Many others, too, whose names have been forgotten, though their strains have lived, have sung of the Jordan. Among those unidentified lyrics, the following fragments deserve to be recalled:

Over the river from shore to shore.
Mortals each moment are passing o'er;
From every land and from every clime
Passing the limits and bounds of time—
Ask you whereto can their mission be?
All for the boundless eternity.

A similar sentiment is thus expressed by another poet:

We too, shall come to the river's side,
One by one, one by one;
We are nearer its waters each eventide;
Yes, one by one.

And here follows a harbinger of the heavenly peace:

When we pass through yonder river,
When we reach the farther shore,
There's an end of war forever,
We shall see our foes no more.

And this a foretaste of the jubilation to be enjoyed by Christ's redeemed:

He in his own body,
Hath opened a Fountain;
To cleanse all our sins,
Tho' high as a mountain—
Hallelujah to the Lamb,
Who brought us a pardon;
We'll praise him again
When we've passed over Jordan.

A most comforting strain is this, by still another unknown Christian singer:

Over Jordan! over Jordan!
Yes, we'll rest our weary feet,
By the crystal waters sweet,
Over Jordan, over Jordan;
When the peaceful shores we'll greet
Over Jordan.

And the high hope of the believer is thus quaintly expressed by another writer:

When we pass o'er death's dark river,
We shall see Him as he is,
Resting in His love and favor
Owning all the glory His.

Who can forget this beautiful picture in "Gates Ajar":

Beyond the river's brink we'll lay
The cross that here is given,
And bear the crown of life away,
And love him more in heaven.
Oh, depth of mercy! can it be
That gate was left ajar for me?

The negroes of the Southern States, during the exciting days of the war, found expression for their emotions in a memorable hymn, which is still sung at their camp-meetings:

Roll, Jordan, roll,
I want to go to Heaven when I die,
To hear Jordan roll.
Oh brothers, you ought to have been there,
And here's my Lord a-sitting in the kingdom—
Roll, Jordan, roll; etc.

Such is a glimpse of the Jordan, as celebrated in Christian song.

DANGEROUS PLEASURES.

SYBARIS was a great city, and it once sent out three hundred horsemen in battle. They had a minstrel who had taught the horses of the army a great trick, and when the old minstrel played a certain tune the horses would rear and with their front feet seem to beat time to the music. Well, the old minstrel was offended with his country, and he went over to the enemy, and he said to the enemy: "You give me the mastership of the army and I will destroy their troops when those horsemen come from Sybaris." So they gave the old minstrel the management, and he taught all the other minstrels a certain tune. Then when the cavalry troop came up and the old minstrel and all the other minstrels played a certain tune, and at the most critical moment in the battle when the horsemen wanted to rush to the conflict, the horses reared and beat time to the music with their forefeet, and in disgrace and rout the enemy fled. Ah! my friends, I have seen it again and again—the minstrels of pleasure, the minstrels of dissipation, the minstrels of godless association have defeated people in the hardest fight of life. Frivolity has lost the battle for ten thousand.

How many people in America have stepped from the ball-room into the graveyard! Consumptions and swift neuralgias are close on their track. Amid many of the glittering scenes of social life in America diseases stand up right and left and balance the chain. The breath of the sepulchre floats up through the perfume, and the froth of Death's lip bubbles up in the champagne.

THE DEAR BISHOP.

MY mind goes back to the time when Bishop Brooks and myself were neighbors in Philadelphia. He had already achieved a great reputation as a pulpit orator. The first time I saw him was on a stormy night as he walked majestically up the aisle of the church to which I administered. He had come to hear his neighbor as I often afterward went to hear him. What a great, and genial soul he was! He was a style of man that people in the street stopped to look at, and strangers would say as he passed, "I wonder who that man is?" Of unusual height of stature, and with a face beaming with kindliness, once seeing him he was always remembered. But the pulpit was his throne. With a velocity of utterance that was the despair of swiftest stenographers, he poured forth his impassioned soul, making every theme he touched luminous and radiant.

All the world knows what he thought about everything that is worthy of thought. Putting no emphasis on the mere technicalities of religion, he made his pulpit flame with its power. He was the especial inspiration of young men, and the disheartened took courage under the touch of his words and rose up healed. It will take all time and all eternity to tell the results of his Christian utterances.

But the giant is dead. He puts off the robes of the Bishopric and puts on the robes of eternal triumph. We hail the conqueror! The salutations of heaven met him at the gate. Honored on earth he is crowned in heaven. Other men have been adorned by the office of a bishop, he adorned the office. We are glad that we ever knew him, that we ever heard him, and that for many years we have loved him. There were some who thought that there was here and there an unsafe spot in his theology. As for ourselves we never found anything in the man or in his utterances that we did not like. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is kindness, and Phillips Brooks was as grand an exponent of that as any man we ever knew. All intelligent Christendom mourns his going. We shall not see his like again. His name will be held in everlasting remembrance.

BLESS THE DENTISTS!

WE remember seeing a dentist's advertisement in which he promised to pull teeth without pain, and giving the list of some of our best clergymen whom he had relieved of distressing molars. May the remaining incisors and bicuspids of these brethren be spared, and the time be long distant when Solomon's description shall apply to them, "The grinders cease because they are few."

We now seriously call the attention of all young clergymen to the importance of ecclesiastical dentisty. When a minister's teeth begin to decay, his theology, is apt at the same time to suffer. Poor teeth result in poor mastication; poor mastication in poor digestion; poor digestion in poor spirits; poor spirits in poor theology.

Keep out of your mouth all poisonous dentifrices; do not wear off the enamel with pen-knife or pin; annually submit yourself to the inspection of a wise dentist; twice a day at least, with strong brush, keep your mouth as pure as the Gospel that drops from your lips. An untidy minister, neglectful of a full-length bath, his finger-nails unscraped, his knuckles begrimed, his collar looking as if it had lost its way to the wash-tub, and his teeth tobacco-stained, is as disgusting to us as the Egyptian mummies in the British Museum.

There might seem to be some excuse for the wicked postponement of dentistry if it were as excruciating as it used to be. In boyhood, after our crying all night, laudanum and camphor and everything else having failed, father took us to the village doctor. The doctor led us to his back piazza, and we sat down on the step. Whether we were promised candy or a ride or a pair of new boots, we do not remember, but suffice it to say the inducement did not seem adequate to pay for the sufferings proposed. The doctor brought out a long pair of forceps. There were in its very looks twists and grips and clutches which made the toothache instantly stop. Then we argued the uselessness of extraction, because it did not ache a bit. They did not allow us to finish the argument. We were never more logical in our life. We had laid down the two propositions of a syllogism. First, painless teeth ought not to be extracted; secondly this is a painless tooth; but before we could draw the conclusion the doctor had begun to draw the tooth. We sitting on the step, and he standing back and above us, took our head between his knees, one knee tight against each ear. The memory of those knees will never fade away from us. They seem to us the ne plus ultra of all knees. He had hard work to get into our mouth, for it was full of exclamation, or what the boys call "holla," a word so expressive that we never found its synonym. But getting his hand on one side the unrestrained yell, and his turn-key on the other, he went at it. At last the cold steel was laid aside the sore gums, and while we were clutching the doctor's arm, and biting his fingers as hard as we could, and kicking indiscriminately in all directions, and giving him a look as much as to say, "Old fellow, if I live to get over this, won't I give it to you," the doctor, with knees still more tightly braced, gave one resolute pull, and it seemed as if the roots of the neck had given way, and the jaw-bone had forsaken its socket, and everything, down to the last joint of the toe, had been dislocated, grubbed out, smashed, caved in, and annihilated with a general convulsion.

The operation was successful. The dentist only did his duty, and has been for some years in the good place where teeth never ache and they never use forceps; but my memory of him is not ecstatic. We do not take him into our hope of future recognition. We can think of five hundred people whom we would rather meet than he.

But in this day things are made easy. According to the advertisement, tooth-drawing has passed into the luxuries, and the dentist's chair is almost as easy as the editor's. You can take the cholo-form and see visions.

CHOICE OF ASSOCIATES.

IF you have a choice when you go out in the world as to whether you will be associated in business circles with men who love God, or those who are hostile to the Christian religion, you might better sacrifice some of your financial interests and go among the people of God than risk the interests of your immortal soul. Jehoshaphat knew it was unsafe for his men to go in one boat with the men of Ahaziah, and you cannot have business associations with those who despise God, and heed not his commandments. I admit the fact that a great many men are forced into associations they despise, and there are business circles in which we are compelled to go which we do not like, but if you have a choice, see that you make an intelligent and safe one.

This principle is just as true in regard to social connections. Let no young man or woman go in a social circle where the influences are vicious or hostile to the Christian religion. You will begin by reproving their faults, and end by copying them. Sin is contagious. You go among those who are profane, and you will be profane.

It is always best to keep ourselves under Christian influences. It is not possible, if you mingle in associations that are positively Christian, not to be made better men or women. The Christian people with whom you associate may not be always talking their religion, but there is something in the moral atmosphere that will be life to your soul. You choose out for your most intimate associates eight or ten Christian people. You mingle in that association; you take their counsel, you are guided by their example, and you live a useful life, and die a happy death, and go to a blessed eternity. There is no possibility of mistaking it; there is not an exception in all the universe or ages—not one.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GIRLHOOD AND WOMANHOOD.

WHERE there is no Gospel, woman is the plaything of man, unto him as his gun, his horse, or his dog. Let the story of the Zarillia, the harem, the Zenanas, be told; why, you know how in China, for instance, when a girl-babe is born, there is no joy: nothing but lamentation and tears.

No, no! You cannot help giving at least the kiss of recognition to Christ. But it's not an Orpah I want you to be, but a Ruth. Listen! and let me tell you some things I know.

First—To be a Ruth, means for you to be a Christian; not only to give Jesus, the Christ, the kiss of loving faith, but the life of love's following. To say unto him, "Whither thou goest I will go: . . . thy people shall be my people, thy God my God." It means all the depth, and length, and breadth, and height of that beautiful Psalm, the forty-fifth, which may well be called the "Woman's Psalm of the Bible."

To be a Ruth, to be a Christian, is to shine brighter than the stars, and keep thy lustre, when they have gone to sleep forever.

Tell me—wilt thou be a Ruth? It is with thee to choose. Like Orpah, you may give but a simple kiss of recognition, and then return to the world of sinful pleasure, and grow up godless, instead of godlike; or you may be all I plead for. But I must stop my preaching and tell that tale I set out to give.

It's about a girl in her teens, just coming into full bloom of years, where character is fixed. But she was not a Christian, and she knew she ought to be. So when the preacher one day asked all who would be followers of Christ, she, with some others, said modestly, but earnestly, "I will." Then and there she became a "Ruth," though her name was Mary. She married a noble man; made a beautiful wife, and a true home. Unto her were born six children; and it's about one of them I want to tell you. She called him "Laddie," though that was not his name; but he was bad — he went astray — he was the prodigal—the black sheep. Years passed by, he got away from the truth, from the church, from the Bible, from prayers, from all that's good. One day he thought of suicide, or rather one night. Everything was so dreary and black; and in that hour, what was it that saved him? His mother. The thought of her, her hopes, her prayers, her love; that, and that alone, kept him from the waters rolling by. Had she not said, "Laddie, thee can never get away from mother's prayers, nor thy mother's God; and some day thee will work for Jesus, too." And true it was; for there the full force of her life, her faith, her petitions, her love, met him and turned him to the path that led to the Cross; and to-day he writes unto you for that was my mother, and I'm "Laddie." Had she not been a Ruth, I might have been in the bottomless pit this hour.

See you now, why I plead?

Maybe this story of "Ruth or Orpah" will go deeper in your heart if I tell you a wee bit more.

Back there in the days gone by, there were five young men who played together, who fished together; they rode and laughed and gunned together; all had about the same hopes for a long life. Now, where are they?

Bob—well, big-hearted Bob sleeps 'neath the sod: his grave watched by his widow and his boy. And George—he, too, is in the grave. Eddie, the bright, smart fellow, engaged to be married to the finest girl in the town: where is Ed? Ah! well, there is a woman who mourns him, a widow at heart: for she married him not; for the angels came and called him home. And Will, the fourth, where is he? Gone! Gone like the rest. We carried him out to the city of the dead, to await the resurrection morning. And who will be the next? I will be the next! I am the only one left of the five. And it's by the blessing of God, given me through her who verily was a Ruth, that I can now look back upon seventeen years of Christian life; and the sweetness of it all is coupled with the fact, that when my call comes, I shall pass out and up and in, there to meet the best woman I ever knew—my mother; and in memory of her, I write thus to you

AN OTTOMAN SACRIFICE.

A STRANGE scene was witnessed recently in the Holy Land, vividly recalling the ancient rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic dispensation. It was a part of the inaugural ceremony of a new railroad enterprise. As already reported in this journal a railroad has been cut from Jaffa, the ancient Joppa, to Jerusalem and it is now in operation. A much longer and more ambitious effort to increase traveling facilities is now being made. By special permission of the Sultan and under direct Turkish auspices another railroad is being cut from Haifa on the Bay of Acre to Damascus in Syria. Its route lies across Galilee through scenes hallowed by the footsteps of Jesus, through Nazareth, Cana, Nain, Bethsaida, past the sea of Galilee, across the Jordan and terminates at Damascus the most ancient city of the world and the scene of Paul's conversion. When the first sod of the new line was turned there was an imposing ceremony at which the Governor presided. As a preliminary a sacrifice of fifteen sheep was offered. The Turkish official brought the first to the sod that was to be first turned and there its throat was cut and its blood soaked the soil. The other fourteen were slaughtered near by and then the first sod was solemnly turned. To Western minds it was a strange way of beginning so prosaic an enterprise as the cutting of a railroad; but to the Oriental it was perfectly appropriate and he would not have considered the ceremony complete without it. But each has something to learn from the other. The Oriental sets us the example of recognizing God in all the affairs of life, while we may tell him of the great Sacrifice offered once for all which renders all further sacrifices superfluous. (Heb. 10: 10.)

Bodies Unburied for Years.

A stable at Haverhill, Mass., which has been unused for some time was rented recently to a business man. In getting it ready for occupation, his men were horrified by finding the bodies of two children, enclosed in rough pine cases. The police were notified and made an investigation. It was fonnd that the stable had formerly been used by an undertaker, and he was found and asked to explain the prescence of the two corpses. He said they had been given to him for burial by two families whom he named, but, as he could not obtain from them the money for expenses already incurred, he had held the bodies as security until he was paid the whole cost of a funeral. As the money was not forthcoming he put the bodies in his stable and had forgotten them. Reference to the town's vital statistics showed that one of the children died two years ago and the other three years ago. It was a ghastly security for a debt. Happily his hold on the dead children could extend only to their bodies. Their souls could not be affected by their parents' inability to pay their debts. There is, however, reason to fear that many a soul has been captured and held captive by Satan that would not have fallen into that evil case had the parents fulfilled their obligations to it and to God. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." (Prov. 22: 6.)

Midnight Cries from a Vault.

A WATCHMAN in Woodland Cemetery at Cleveland, O., while going his rounds about midnight on Jan. 3, heard a muffled cry. He went in the direction from which it came and as it was repeated he had no difficulty in locating it. It came from a vault in which, during the previous day, two bodies had been placed, ready for interment. The cries increased until they became shrill screams, but the watchman was too much alarmed to approach the entrance to the vault. He went to the office and ascertained the names of the undertakers who had been in charge of the respective funerals. After considerable delay, owing to the late hour, he succeeded in getting telephone communication with them. He begged them to come quickly as one of the corpses had come to life and wanted the coffin opened. The undertakers were mystified, but after securing the protection of two policemen, they went to the cemetery. During the delay, the shrieks continued. Some one was making piteous appeals to be let out. The door of the vault was opened and out came a lady fully attired, but in a hysterical condition. She had attended one of the funerals early in the day, and, being very tired and overcome with grief, she sat down in a dark corner of the vault and during the service fell asleep. She did not wake when her friends went away. The door of the vault was shut and locked, but she slept on. At last she awoke feeling dreadfully cold and numbed and unable to realize where she was. When she did find out she was horrified and tried to get out, but the door was locked. She shouted, but there was no response. She heard the clock strike midnight and feared she would be kept there until morning. No one would like to spend a night amid such surroundings, though there could only be a superstitious cause for the lady's abject terror. The memory of that night's experience will probably keep her from ever voluntarily entering a vault again and will certainly keep her from yielding to somnolence if she should do so, before she is carried there for her last sleep. It may be hoped that she will so live that when that event occurrs, her awakening on the resurrection day will be one of joy and not of terror. (Daniel 12: 2.)

A Soldier Discharged.

A NOVEL plea for the discnarge of a young man from military service has been urged by his family and has been accepted by the authorities at Halifax, N. S. The young man was a drummer representing a prominent business firm in Canada and went to Halifax on his usual trip. He walked into the brigade office and offered himself for enlistment. He said that his family were in comfortable circumstances, but he had conceived a love for military service which would not be satisfied by anything but enlisting. He was examined and passed and duly entered on the roll. A few days afterward his manner changed. He professed that he had no recollection of having entered the service and was surprised to find himself in barracks. He sent for his father, who, on his arrival, told the authorities that the young man was subject to fits of temporary insanity and that he did not know what he was doing when he enlisted. He pleaded for his son's discharge and it was granted on his paying a fine of fifty dollars. He may still be a good citizen and a faithful subject, though he did withdraw from the Queen's service, but it is not so in Christ's kingdom. He says that none who "draw back are fit for the kingdom of God." (Luke 9: 65.)

Notice of Derelicts.

THIS month's issue of the pilot-chart of the Hydrographic Office in Washington contains the warning that no less than eight abandoned and water-logged vessels are drifting in the steamship lanes of the Atlantic. One of them, which has a cargo of mahogany on board and is level with the water's edge has been drifting about since March, 1891. The perils of collision at sea have been reduced since the steamship companies adopted what is known as the lane routes. Now, the route a steamer follows after leaving this port is fifty miles away from the route taken by steamers bound west. One steamer therefore is little likely to meet another and come into collision with her. But these abandoned ships, not being under control and carrying no lights are a continual source of danger. The gulf stream carries them northward and then eastward and the captains of incoming ships have warned the government of their whereabouts. One of them has been cut in two and the two halves are drifting in company. Happily, so far, they have been seen in the day time and avoided, but any day we may hear of a steamer striking one of them in the night and being injured if not wrecked by the blow. The government is doing a service by publishing the periodical notice to captains of the probable position of the derelicts. It would do a still better service by destroying them, as was suggested in Congress recently. The human derelicts, of whom there are so many drifting in society, are as much to be dreaded, for "one sinner destroyeth much good," but in their case it is not their destruction that is to be desired, but that they may be rescued and through Christ brought into the haven of God's forgiveness and a reward is promised to all who engage in that work. "Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." (James 5: 20.)

Reclaimed by Heroism.

THERE was a drowning fatality at Easton, Pa., on Jan 5. Some boys were skating on the Lehigh River when one of them fell through the thin ice. He tried to get out but the current was too strong at that place and he was being drawn under. He shouted loudly for help and his cries attracted the notice of a man who was passing. The man procured a rope and begged a boy to go out on the ice, which might bear him, but would not bear the man, and throw the rope to the struggling boy. But the lad would not venture. Then the man tried to throw the rope, but it fell short. Rather than let the boy drown he ventured a few yards on the ice and threw it again. But by that time the current had carried the boy under and beyond the reach of help. Again the ice broke and the man fell in. A crowd had gathered by this time and the ice was quickly broken up and a boat launched. The man was pulled in but it was thought he was dead from cold and shock. He was taken to a house on the bank and the rescuers worked over him for half an hour before he recovered consciousness. The story of his heroism went all over the town and he had many visitors. Among them was a woman whom he recognized and welcomed joyfully. It was his wife who had become estranged from him and whom he was vainly seeking when he heard the boy's cry for help. Her husband's heroism so impressed her that she became reconciled to him and returned with him to his home. Her love for him had faded away, but it revived on hearing what he had done, although the boy for whom he had risked his life was a stranger to her. It was quite natural and reasonable; but it is strange that so few are similarly moved to love by that infinitely grander story, in which they are personally interested, of Christ giving his life to save them. (Rom. 5: 8.)

AN OTTOMAN SACRIFICE.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, the son of the Editor of this journal has accepted an invitation to be assistant pastor of the Olivet Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, of which Dr. Graham is pastor.

Rev. Charles F. Deems is, we are glad to hear, making steady progress toward recovery. His mind has been perfectly clear all through his illness and he is gradually recovering his power of articulation.

Prince Oscar Bernadotte, the second son of the King of Sweden, has organized a total abstinence society among the soldiers at Calscrona, and is himself the president of the Plekinge Province Temperance Union.

Miss Sallie Holley, the famous Abolitionist and friend of the negro died in New York on Jan. 12. She was seventy-six years old and her whole life had been given to the work of promoting the emancipation, education and elevation of the colored race.

Evangelist F. E. Smiley's meetings at East Liverpool, O., have been much blessed. The Evening News of that town says that immense multitudes were attracted to the Rink in which the services were held and that there have been many conversions, among them some prominent persons.

An order has recently been issued by the chief of police at Moscow to all saloon-keepers in the city directing them to post a notice on the walls of every drinking-room that all persons must remove their hats while in the room. To remain covered, the chief says, indicates a lack of reverence for the images of the saints which are set up in these places.

Major Geo. A. Hilton is receiving the hearty support of the citizens of Los Angeles in his Pacific Gospel Union Mission and has been enabled to do a large amount of religious and philanthropic work. Over five hundred conversions were recorded during the past twelve months and many despairing men were aided to begin a new life after lapsing into criminal or vicious courses.

Justice L. Q. C. Lamar of the United States Supreme Court died on Jan. 23. He had been sick for several months, but hopes of his recovery were cherished until the day before he died. Mr. Lamar was in his sixty-eighth year and had been in public life for forty years. He was a man of broad culture and profound learning and was highly respected through the South and at Washington, where he was best known. He was a prominent leader in the Secession movement and fought on the side of the South through the war.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman has been laboring with much success at Perth Amboy, N. J. The first Methodist Church has been crowded nightly by earnest seekers. The movement spread throughout the town and as an evidence of the extent of the awakening the Mayor issued a proclamation asking the business men of the town to close their establishments on January 11th for two hours in the afternoon to afford their employes an opportunity of attending the meetings. The local papers say that the town was never so moved by religious feeling before.

Rev. Thomas Harrison is continuing his services at Jane Street M. E. Church, New York. A remarkable work is going on there. Over a hundred persons, many of them young men, have been converted and there are signs of a deep and increasing interest being felt. Mr. Harrison has deferred his engagements and will remain with the church another week, believing that the work so unexpectedly developed has the first claim on his attention. At the evening service of Jan. 22, the church was crowded to its utmost capacity, even the lobbies, stairways and vestibules being packed.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt is making an energetic effort to comply with the conditions on which the University of the State of New York has agreed to grant a charter to his college for the training of medical missionaries. Three of the four conditions can be easily met, but the fourth is that the college shall acquire and maintain a proper laboratory with clinical and hospital facilities. As Dr. Dowkontt never can keep a dollar in his pocket when he sees a family in need through sickness or misfortune, and often admits to his college bright young men who cannot pay even their board, he is embarrassed by this sudden need for the money to fit up the laboratory as required by the Regents of the University. We shall be pleased to receive and hand to him any contributions our readers may like to send to help him in the emergency.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

GOING UP TO BETHEL.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, January 29, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

"And let us arise and go up to Bethel, and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress and was with me in the way which I went." Gen. 35: 3.

JACOB and his mother plotted wickedly against Isaac and Esau. Jacob early manifested the retiring character of his father, preferring the quiet life of the shepherd rather than the daring pursuits of the hunter, which so fascinated his brother Esau. Jacob early became Rebekah's favorite, while for Esau Isaac evinced marked partiality. Jacob showed a prudent, and perhaps we might say a selfish and cunning spirit even in his youth. The manner in which he secured the honor of the birthright from his brother Esau was as cunning in execution as it was selfish in design. The favoritism shown him by his mother proved to be greatly hurtful rather than helpful in his history and character. Nothing can justify the deception practiced by Rebekah and Jacob. It is true that God had promised that the elder should serve the younger, but God never requires our sinful acts to enable him to fulfil his divine promises. The conduct of the mother and son in plotting against the father and the other son presents

A Truly Painful Picture.

Justification of such conduct is simply impossible. We do not feel called upon to utter one word in extenuation of the guilt of both mother and son. True religion is not responsible for Jacob's conduct, for at this time he did not have true religion. His conversion, as we use the term in later days, did not occur until the night of his profound experiences on the banks of the brook Jabbok. Some have tried to excuse the acquisition of his father's blessing on the ground that the whole history is simply figurative and symbolic; but so to explain the transaction is to blunder exegetically as much as the attempt to justify the deceit would be to blunder morally.

Punishment soon followed the committal of the sin. Jacob is filled with alarm and at his mother's suggestion is sent to Mesopotamia, the seat of her family, in order that he might find a wife among his own kindred, and also to escape the consequences of his brother's anger. The marriage of Esau to Hittite women doubtless gave the parents greater anxiety for the proper marriage of Jacob. Once more Jacob receives his father's blessing, and then starts upon his journey. The years pass and his return is now contemplated.

During this time he grew rich and "increased exceedingly and had much cattle, and maid-servants and menservants, and camels and asses." But the time has now come when the Lord wished him to return to his own country. The voice of God therefore came to him saying, "Arise, go up to Bethel, and dwell there." This command was in harmony with the desires alike of Jacob and his Family.

They started on their journey, and the prosperity and departure of Jacob grieved and angered Laban. On the third day after their departure, Laban learned that they had gone and immediately set out in pursuit; but he is divinely warned not to hinder Jacob's return. Reproach and recrimination were freely indulged in on both sides. Crafty men and craftier women practiced their various arts upon one another for their selfish ends. Rachel stole the teraphim which Laban was so anxious to discover and to preserve; and the theft soon necessitated further deceit. Jacob's reply, how-[illegible] imperfectly they all were instructed in the law of God in moral duty. Peace finally was restored, and Laban returned, while Jacob and his family continued their journey. A heap of stones, called Mizpah, a watch-tower, was built as a witness between these warring and distrustful men. The first use of the word Mizpah robs it of much of the beauty and poetry associated with the word in our day. Its primary use was to keep a check upon two sharpers neither of whom dared to trust the other. It was diamond cut diamond when these two wily men transacted business with each other.

Then came the skilful preparations to meet Esau. Jacob relied upon two great weapons—"brains and prayer." He divided his flocks and herds into two companies, so that if one were attacked, the other might escape. Then came the great crisis in his life—the meeting of the angel on the banks of Jabbok. Then Jacob was converted; then the old name and nature suggested by Jacob, the supplanter, were exchanged for Israel, the prince and Soldier of God.

After this night of anxiety and triumph Jacob rose from Peniel with the bright sun shining upon him as an emblem of the radiant hope which illuminated his own soul. Finally at Shalem, a city of Shechem in the land of Canaan, he pitched his tent. Sorrow came to his family life, because of the sin and shame of his family. He is now an old man and his heart is bowed with domestic grief, but God's eye and God's love are still upon him, and God's voice is heard commanding him to go to Bethel and dwell there. Then Jacob gives the exhortation to his family in our text.

In studying this text, we have, in the first place, an exhortation. "And let us arise, and go up to Bethel." This exhortation possesses many interesting features. It will pay us to study for a little time some of its characteristics. It was an exhortation given by the command of God. By the first verse of this chapter we see that God said "Arise, go up to Bethel, and dwell there." Jacob had now been some time in the land. His life was partly pastoral and partly agricultural. He was engaged in the care of his family and in the feeding of his flocks. His sons had involved him in painful difficulties, and his daughter's sorrow had brought him intense grief and shame. His great herds required constant attendance. There was ground for fearing that the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches would choke the good seed which had been sown in his heart. Since that wonderful night at the ford of Jabbok we find less imperfection and more for commendation in but we certainly do not yet find freedom from weakness and perfection of character. He seems already in danger of forgetting God; he seems in danger of forgetting that his name is Israel, and lapsing again into the old and hateful Jacob character. But his family troubles and the opposition of the people about him are likely to lead him nearer to God. At this critical time God speaks and tells him to go up to Bethel, and make there an altar. It is always cause for gratitude when God speaks to his children when they are in danger of wandering into sin; it is always a proof of divine sonship when we are willing to listen to God's voice and to walk in the way of his commandments. We can have no evidence for ourselves or for others that we are truly the children of God except as we are led by the Spirit of God. The dutiful spirit proves our adoption into God's family.

Another characteristic of this exhortation is that it is given by the head of a household to his family. This truth is taught us in the verse that precedes the text; we are there told that Jacob spoke unto his household. This fact is profoundly suggestive. Every father should be the religious head of his own house; every father should be the high priest in his own family. He should be unwilling to give up the high honor and sacred duty which belong to him as the head of his house. He ought to erect the family altar and constantly to keep the flame of family devotion brightly burning thereon. Jacob was regarded by his family as [illegible] prince and a priest; so ought every father to regard himself and to be regarded by others. The sacred duty of ministering at the family altar he cannot neglect, or ever remit without dishonoring himself as well as his Lord. Jacob commanded his family to put away all strange gods that were among them, to change their garments, and to be themselves clean. Some of his family had their hands full of blood; they needed not only clean clothes but also clean hearts. His family seem to have responded to this earnest exhortation. It is blessed when the head of the home leads in paths of obedience to God, and when his family with alacrity and joy follow in his footsteps. It is unspeakably sad to see families sit at tables on which no blessing is asked, and live in houses in which the voice of praise and prayer is never heard. Almost as well might a family live in a house without a roof as in a house in which the presence of God is not recognized. Jacob's example at this point is worthy of earnest commendation and of universal imitation.

A Consecrated Place.

It was also an exhortation to attend the house of God. This is the meaning of the word Bethel. We are carried back at once to the account given in the 28th chapter of this book of Jacob's flight from home and his night spent at Bethel. At that time Jacob was a wanderer fleeing from the voice of his angry brother. He carries with him the heaviest of all burdens for a traveller, a guilty conscience. He is in a lonely place as night comes down upon him. He is weary, and sinful, and sad. He is on a ridge which has been called the backbone of Palestine. He must go on foot and alone a distance of about five hundred miles through an inhospitable country. If he had possessions he would be robbed; but without money he must beg. It will take him a month to make the journey. It has been pointed out that the journey was longer than that of Washington from Virginia to Fort Duquesne, for the performance of which he received the admiration of the civilized world. About him on this ridge stand and lie huge masses of stone in confused heaps. He is an outcast in a howling wilderness. The darkness deepens. In his loneliness he feels the need of the divine presence and sympathy as perhaps he never felt it in his father's tent. He sleeps; he dreams. The rough stones which he saw as he was closing his eyes in slumber become in his dreams leading to heaven; up and down this terraced steep pass the messengers of God. He watches; he wonders. These messengers are now in the dazzling splendors of God's glory, and God's voice is heard renewing the promise of mercy and of countless blessings. The morning dawns and the astonished sleeper awakens and his soul is filled with holy awe. In his surprise and wonder he expresses his joy, and also reveals his imperfect ideas of the Deity by saying, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." To him this place became the house of God and the gate of heaven. The stone which was his pillow he anoints with oil, and calls it and the place Bethel. Perhaps it was some rough monument more like the cairns seen in Wales and Scotland than a single stone. We know that in many countries such stones are still selected as the monuments of great events. These rude stones were hints at least of the great ecclesiastical edifices of later days; it was an anticipation of all the lowly chapels and lofty cathedrals of subsequent times. The name Bethel has been transformed and used by Phoenicians and Mohammedans with sacred associations, as with Jews and Christians. Jacob's language showed that he had ill-defined notions of God. He would make bargains with God even as with Esau, and later with Laban.

A Golden Stairway

This, then, is a father's exhortation to his family to attend the house of God. It is an exhortation which is appropriate still. It is an exhortation which is forgotten too often. Sunday is to many a day of listless indifference or of unholy pleasure. Are we to have a continental Sunday in our beloved land? This is at this moment

A Practical Question.

Many Christians are largely responsible, by their indifference to the claims of God's day and God's house, for the general neglect of that day on the part of men of the world. Many Christians will lazily spend their morning or evening or both in their own homes instead of meeting with God's people in God's house. Parents, let me exhort you to follow Jacob's example. Employers, let me ask you where are your clerks and employees to-day? Have you ever followed Jacob's example in exhorting your households to go up to Bethel? Do you set them this noble example yourself? Put away the strange gods of dishonesty, of unfairness and of impurity from offices and stores, from homes and hearts, and then urge all under your influence to go with you up to Bethel. Determine to-day that as for you and your house

You will Serve the Lord.

We also have here a solemn vow—"I will make there an altar unto God." Jacob would there renew his vow made at Bethel, that if God would keep him in the way and bring him again to his father's house, the Lord should be his God. This is, of course, a very mercenary view to take of one's duty to God; but Jacob at that time was not capable of taking any higher view. God kept his part of the contract, although Jacob's motive therein was neither manly nor godly. Jacob had now been some time in the land of his fathers, but until now his vow was neglected. It is well that it is remembered now. Have not we like him often forgotten our vows. Amid the anxiety and frivolity of life we have often forgotten the vows we made to God in the day of trouble. In time of business disasters and of family griefs, in times of sickness and on beds of languishing we have made solemn vows to God; but we must with shame confess that when health and vigor were returned the vows were forgotten. Your good resolutions vanished like the morning cloud and the early dew. You made vows of service to God at the waters of baptism, at the table of communion, and audibly in the presence of his people at the covenant meeting. Perhaps you have been away from the city and many of these vows have been neglected. Perhaps to-day heavily oppresses your mind and heart. What shall you do? Give way to discouragement and despair? A thousand times, no. Come back again to the neglected altar, to the forgotten cross, and to the despised Redeemer. Pray with the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and you shall assuredly go down to your house justified.

The Memory of Broken Vows

We notice also that Jacob promised to make there an altar unto God. In his wanderings it is to be feared that his altars had been often neglected. They were broken down and God was forgotten. Now he is once more in the land of Canaan, the land of his fathers; now he is going up to Bethel, the house of his God; and now he promises to make there an altar unto his God. This is a wholesome resolution on the part of Jacob; it gives us a ground for hope that he will be worthy of the noble name of Israel. It is to be feared that often business duties and family cares so press upon God's people that their family altar is neglected. This church is in a certain sense your Bethel. Here in your heart now erect the altar, and then at your home let the voice of prayer be heard; let God be acknowledged and his peace will certainly be enjoyed. If any family altars have fallen down, let them be rebuilt. Has the altar of private and secret prayer been neglected? Should we trace the history of all those who have dishonored their profession and have wandered from their church, it would be found in the majority of instances, that the first step in the downward way was taken when they neglected

The Place of Secret Prayer.

To be strong among men we must receive strength when alone with God. We need for the development of character times of quiet study of the Scriptures and of secret communion with God. There is much less of earnest meditation on divine things than our spiritual growth demands. Our Lord commanded us to enter into the closet. Have you all secret Bethels, some place where God has met with you, and where you often meet with him? No matter where this place may be, if only God be there it shall be a Bethel indeed. Christ often found a secret place of prayer on the lonely mountain. Isaac found a place of meditation in the field. Peter and other disciples found a Bethel on the housetops. I read the other day of a a chimney sweep, who said that his closet was in the chimney when hidden from human eye. We remember that Dr. Payson said, "As soon as I began, when a student, to beg God's blessing on my studies I did more in one week than in a whole year before." Luther when most pressed with his enormous tasks said, "I am praying." We know that General Havelock rose at four, when he had to begin the march at six, in order to enjoy the privilege of secret communion with God before entering on the duties of the day. Devout heathen have set us an example which many professed Christians might follow for themselves. It is said that Pericles, the great Athenian statesman, never addressed an audience without praying to the gods for help; and that Scipio never undertook an affair of importance without spending some time alone in some temple of the gods. Have any of your family altars fallen? Are there any families in which they have never been built?

Abraham built his altar wherever he pitched his tent. Lot pitched his tent but we do not read that he built his altar. The heathen Canaanites looked on in wonder while the noble Abraham recognized his God. Social prayer has been too much neglected. The prayer meeting is the place of power in a church. Well might Queen Mary say, "I fear the prayers of John Knox more than an army of ten thousand men." Well might the gifted and now glorified Tennyson say:

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore, let my voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round world is every way
Bound by gold chains around the feet of God.

Resolve to-day in the presence of God and his people that like Jacob you will build an altar unto God.

We have in this text, in the last place, a sufficient reason for the exhortation given and the promise made: "Who answered me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went." We have already seen that Jacob had Many Causes for Gratitude.

His gratitude is seen in the prayer he offers as he goes out to meet Esau. There he recognizes his unworthiness before God; there he acknowledges God's many gifts toward him, saying, "For with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." Things went prosperously with him in his sojourn with Laban. He was more than a match for Laban in ingenuity and industry. God had fulfilled the promise which he had made to him at Bethel. So God has been gracious to us. At times we have been brought low and then he helped us, as he did the psalmist. Often the psalmist appeals to his past as the ground for present trust and future hope. He sings, "I love the Lord, because he has heard my voice and my supplications . . . therefore will I call upon him as long as I live." Trust God in the future because he has helped you in the past. Let your yesterdays of blessings be the prophets of your to-morrows of assurance. Is it dark with you to-day? Was it not darker with you some other day and yet God delivered you and illuminated your path? Jacob was troubled now, but would not the God of Bethel and Jabbok be his God still? Surely God was with him in the day of his distress and in the way which he went. Surely God has been with you more really than with Jacob. Away then with your fears. Take no counsel of your doubts. There is brightness in the future. Courage, brother, sister, friend. Build your altar now unto God and lay yourself joyfully as a living sacrifice thereon. The God who answered in the past answers still. In that night vision God promised to be with Jacob; this promise he renewed when Laban would take advantage of Jacob. All through his checquered career God was with him; God would not leave him in

The Trials Awaiting Him.

His mother, who so loved him, was no more. To help him she sinned, and she never saw him again. His beloved Rachel was soon to give her life in giving life to him whom with her departing breath, she called, Benoni, but whom Jacob called Benjamin. Isaac too, had died; and soon Jacob must sorrow over the deception of his sons and the loss, as he thinks, of Joseph and Benjamin. But the sunset of his life was calm, bright and beautiful. After seventeen years in the land of Goshen enjoying serene happiness, he gave his dying blessing in Jehovah's name to his assembled sons, and then at the age of 147 years he was gathered to his fathers, his body was embalmed and finally buried with great honor in the burial place of Abraham near Hebron.

Has not God been with us in the way which we went? Was not God with us during the year 1892, preserving our country from disaster, from plague, and from pestilence? Oh, how good God is to us, to our families and to our Church! Let your hearts to-day overflow with gratitude, and let your lives be consecrated afresh to his service. Let us not waste time in useless repining over misspent hours, wasted opportunities and personal sorrow; let us gird ourselves now for fresh conflicts and for noble victories. Are we to-day pure in heart, more Christ-like in life than we were a year ago? God help us to do our whole duty in our business circles, in our domestic relations and in our church life! Let each one now make this threefold resolution his own in harmony with the teaching of the text:

"I will attend the house of God; I will make an altar of prayer; I will cherish gratitude to God; I will give heart to God; and devote my life to him who was with me in the way which I went."

THE SABBATH DAY.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

FIRST Sabbath day! how calm and fair that day
Can mortal know?
The six days' work in all its glory lay
In homage low,
Before its God. He rested on that day
From all his work. Oh! blest and hallowed day.

Most gracious are his promises to all
Who heed his word;
Who cease from labor on this day, and call
Upon their Lord.
Nor do they seek, by act or word or thought,
Their pleasure; but for him their work is wrought.

We sweetly call to mind upon this day—
This dear Lord's day—
His blessed resurrection. Hear him say:
"Oh, come to-day!
Come now to me, all ye by sin oppressed,
Cease from your works, and I will give you rest."

A Sabbath day of holy joy ere long
The Church shall see;
All nations then will swell the blissful song—
We worship thee.
Thou King of kings! For all the earth will know
The Lord; and every knee to him shall bow.

THE TREE GOD PLANTS.

THE wind that blows can never kill
The tree God plants;
It bloweth east, it bloweth west,
The tender leaves have little rest
But any wind that blows is blest;
The tree God plants
Strikes deeper root, grows higher still,
Spreads wider boughs, for God's good will
Meets all its wants.

There is no frost hath power to blast
The tree God shields;
The roots are warm beneath soft snows,
And when spring comes it surely knows,
And every bud to blossom grows.
The tree God shields
Grows on apace by day and night,
Till sweet to taste and fair to sight
Its fruit it yields.

There is no storm hath power to blast
The tree God knows;
No thunderbolt, nor beating rain,
Nor lightning flash, nor hurricane;—
When they are spent it doth remain.
The tree God knows
Through every tempest standeth fast,
And from its first day to its last
Still fairer grows.

If in the soul's still garden-place
A seed God sows,—
A little seed,—it soon will grow,
And far and near all men will know,
For heavenly lands he bids it blow.
A seed God sows
And up it springs by day and night;
Through life, thro' death, t groweth right,
Forever grows. —Selected.

JESUS ONLY.

(For The Christian Herald)

WHAT though clouds are hovering o'er me,
And I seem to walk alone,
Longing 'mid my cares and crosses
For the joys that now are flown?
If I have Jesus, Jesus only,
Then my sky will have a gem:
He is the sun of brightest splendor
And the Star of Bethlehem

When the storms of life are raging—
Tempest wild on sea and land;
I will seek a place of refuge
In the shadow of God's hand.
Enemies may strive to injure,
Satan all his arts employ;
God will turn what seems to harm us
Into everlasting joy.

THE PARALLEL PERIODS.

The Growing Resemblance of Our Days to the Antediluvian Time.

BY REV. F. C. SPURR.

OUR Lord, in his discourse on his second coming, recorded in Matthew 24, states three matters distinctly: The fact of his coming; its suddenness; and that the period immediately prior to it would be like the days of Noe. It is therefore important to have clearly in mind as a test of identification the characteristics of Noah's times. First of all, Christ mentions worldliness, but does not adduce in this chapter any great crime that they committed. He merely says that: "In the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage." At first sight there does not appear to be anything so very criminal in all this. Surely we could not live without eating and drinking, and is not marriage God's own ordinance? And yet this, mark you, is the very thing that Jesus Christ adduces here as the characteristic of the antediluvians. Where does the sin come in? It is not, my brothers, so much in what they did, as in what they omitted to do. They were immersed in daily life. These lawful things were misused, and what God intended to be but a means, they had made an end. You will find upon reference to the early chapters of Genesis, that these antediluvians, too, in their primitive way, had gone in for art, music, and pleasuse. They were simply absorbed with themselves; God entered not into their calculations. He was to them as if he had not existed. They simply made no reference to him. Self was what they lived for. God is not now so much denied as ignored; he is kept out or sight, and he is practically out of mind. He is not wanted. He is considered to be an intruder in his own world. As Faber says somewhere: "If God doesn't make a noise in his own world he is ignored; if he does, he is considered unreasonable and oppressive." The great characteristic sin of to-day is worldliness?

If you refer to the sixth chapter of Genesis, you will find that angels had intercourse with the children of men. Turn to our own days. You will not forget that in this present century the old forbidden necromancy has been revived, and that spiritualism (its modern form), to-day is the accepted faith of tens of thousands of the human race; that in darkened rooms mediums sit and allow themselves to become possessed with devils, familiar spirits or demons. Then you have Theosophy, which is simply a modern variation of this old-time sorcery. We are told about the wonderful Mahatmas in Thibet; strange stories come to us about precipitated letters, and of showers of supernatural roses falling from ceilings where nothing could be concealed; of bells mysteriously rung, and of astral bodies. One particular feature of these last days is a distinct attempt on the part of demons to regain possession of human bodies.

The third characteristic of Noah's Day was indifference. I have just said that at the beginning of Noah's ministry many doubtless trembled and sought refuge, but as the days went on, and the threatened judgment remained unfulfilled, their terror gave way to indifference. Tell me if it be not so now? I have said that worldliness is one of the characteristics signs of the times. But does not indifference grow out of the worldliness? In fact, are not wordliness and indifference practically synonymous terms, as they affect God? for the worldly man is of necessity indifferent towards God, else he could not be worldly.

And lastly, the flood came and took them all away; the scoffers, the educated, the carpenters who helped to build the ark—all went; there was no distinction. Every unbeliever was swept off by the flood. Eight persons only were saved, and these were saved, we are told in the Epistle to the Hebrews, through faith. "So shall it be in the days of the Son of Man." I used once to believe that every converted person, every Christian, no matter what sort of life he was leading, would be "caught up" in the Second Advent, but from careful study of the Scripture, I have been forced to the conclusion that the teaching there is distinctly in the direction that only waiting ones and the watchful will be caught up to meet Christ and to form the first-fruits of Rev. 14: 1-5.

Those Christians who have tried to serve God and mammon, and whose religion has evermore been a secondary thing to them, will find, to their bitter dismay, that they must be left behind to go through the great tribulation. They will not have the fire of the Holy Ghost, to burn away their dross; they must have the fire of tribulation to do the work they would not let God otherwise do.

THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT HAYES.

IN the death of Rutherford Burchard Hayes, soldier, lawyer, ex-Governor, and ex-President, the country loses another of the prominent individualities of the present generation. He was born in 1822 in Delaware, O., educated at Kenyon College in that State, and studied law at the Harvard Law School. In 1846 he was admitted to the Ohio bar, and began the practice of his profession in Cincinnati. His abilities soon brought him into public notice, and he was elected to several local offices. When the Republican Party was formed, he became an active member, and at the outbreak of the war was appointed Major of the 23d Regiment of Ohio Volunteers. He participated in several battles, and at the battle of South Mountain, on Sept. 14, 1852, was severely wounded; and for his gallant conduct at Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek, he was breveted as Major General.

At the close of the war he went to Congress and in 1867 was elected Governor of Ohio on a negro suffrage platform being re-elected twice thereafter in succession. In 1870, he was nominated as Republican candidate for the Presidency by the National Convention at Cincinnati on a platform advocating Civil Service Reform and Specie Payments. The election that followed will be remembered as one of the stormiest ever known in this country, the result being so doubtful that it was left to an Electoral Commission which decided in Gov. Hayes' favor as against Mr. Tilden, the Democratic candidate. This decision gave rise to intense partisan feelings throughout the country, many holding that Mr. Tilden was unjustly deprived of the election. It is however, due to Mr. Hayes to state that, even while the matter was still in dispute, he wrote a candid letter to the Republican managers advising them that he would countenance no corruption or crookedness for the purpose of seating him in the Presidential chair, and rather than accept the office by means that would not bear the severest public scrutiny, he would retire from the contest. His opponent adopted a conservative course and acquiesced in the decision of the Electoral Commission, open opposition to which would have greatly disturbed the country and possibly precipitated internal strife.

THE LATE EX-PRESIDENT R. B. HAYES.

President Hayes' administration was a comparatively quiet and uneventful one, its principal feature being the resumption of specie payments. During his occupancy of the White House, strict temperance principles prevailed there for the first time in many administrations, both he and his wife, Mrs. Lucy Ware Webb Hayes, being abstainers.

On retiring from office, Mr. Hayes practically withdrew from public life. He returned to his home at Fremont, O., and took up once more the practice of the legal profession which, together with the management of his beautiful homestead, fully occupied his time. In private life he was an exemplary Christian gentleman. Both he and his family had a very wide circle of friends in Ohio and throughout the entire country.

For some time past, he had been afflicted with a neuralgic affection of the heart, and a severe recurrence of this trouble terminated fatally on the 17th inst.

THE EXPATRIATED JEWS.

The Association recently formed by Baron Hirsch to provide a refuge for the Jews who have been driven out of Russia has just issued its first report. It appears that about 1,000 families have already been settled, and the Association has 330,000 acres of land in the Argentine Republic, beside the Canadian colony. The Association has expended $1,500,000 of its capital of ten millions

HOW TO PRAY?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Feb. 12 Nehemiah 1: 4-9; James 5: 16-18.

HOW to approach the infinite Being who created and rules the universe—what question can be more important? The sublimity and solemnity of entering his presence and addressing him cannot be exaggerated. Were it not that we are invited and encouraged to do so, we might shrink from speaking to the Deity. Yet every true soul desirous of obtaining a higher level of spirituality than he has reached, instinctively looks to God and desires communication with him. One of our greatest philosophers has said that religion is impossible without prayer, for it would be dumb and lamed. Prayer is the indispensable stepping-stone to every spiritual development. We have nothing when we ask nothing. From God comes every good and perfect gift and they are not to be obtained from any other source. He causes the rain and the sunshine to fall on the just and the unjust alike, but the special spiritual graces that are needed for spiritual growth are not given indiscriminately, but must be sought, and sought from him. They who desire them must pray for them and they will receive them. But the prayer must be sincere. The consciousness that God reads the heart should prevent our asking for anything we do not really desire and uttering words we do not actually feel. If we do not crave the higher blessings, we have good cause to deplore our state and may pray that the desire for them may be implanted within us. And such a prayer is the most acceptable of all prayers because God is in sympathy with it. That prayer will be heard and answered because God's wish concerning us is that we cease to cultivate and indulge our lower nature and to make its gratification our chief concern.

There is no more hopeful moment in the life of any man than that in which he honestly tells God that he is conscious of sin, of resting satisfied with the meaner things of life, wealth and luxury and pleasure, and asks that his spiritual nature may be quickened into more vigorous life, that he may strive after better things. That prayer is the beginning of the higher life. It precedes the prayer for the blessings themselves. We need a revelation of God to the soul, to know him and to know ourselves. We need the spiritual vision cleared that things may appear in their true proportions as God sees them. Until we get that blessing we never honestly desire the best gifts, however much we may pray for them. Bunyan's picture of the man intent on the straws and rubbish he was collecting with his rake, with no thought to spare for the crown the angel was offering him, is the picture of every man in his natural state and the moment of transformation, of emerging out of that state comes when God stirs the dormant spiritual nature to the desire for the crown. When the prayer for that blessing is offered, the first step is taken and the answer is sure. Afterward, increased light reveals other needs, and every step onward and upward we take by the same strength, obtained in the same way. But at every step the one indispensable condition is sincerity and an honest desire for the blessing asked for.

THE KING'S DAUGHTERS IN HOSPITALS.

A NOBLE Christ-like work for the sick and suffering is being done by the King's Daughters of Alexandria County, Virginia. Mrs. John Green of Alexandria, writing to the Silver Cross, says that there are nine Circles in the County who have found an absorbing sphere of work in the Alexandria Infirmary. Different rooms in the institution—surgical, nurses', female and male wards, children's ward, etc., etc., are furnished and supported by them, each as a memorial of some deceased physician, clergyman or friend. Other assistance is also rendered by them. More room being needed, an addition to the building was proposed. The King's Daughters promised to assist; and in the fall of 1890 the Circles united in holding a bazaar to raise funds for the purpose, at which they cleared $1,700. Donations and contributions brought up the sum to $3,000. Since then $500 more has been contributed by different Circles, all of which has been expended on the building, there still remains plumbing, heating, painting and other work to be done before the building will be complete. The circles are now making a brave struggle for the $1600 necessary for this work and have good hopes of success. So much they have done already in addition to their other labors of love that they now ask the assistance of their sisters in other Circles throughout the country. It is a work peculiarly within the sphere of the Order's principles and there is no doubt that the Circles will respond liberally, to enable the Virginia King's Daughters to complete the work they have undertaken.

AN AUSTRALIAN PRESIDENT.

IN the tour Dr. Clark is taking around the world in the interests of the Christian Endeavor movement he made the acquaintance of the earnest minister whose portrait appears on this page. His residence is in Adelaide, South Australia, where he is pastor of the principal Baptist church of the city. The Rev. Silas Mead is known throughout the colony as one of the most energetic, devoted and successful ministers in the land. He believes in hard work out of the pulpit as well as in it. Connected with his church are all kinds of organizations of helpfulness to the people. The church-building comprises a lecture-room, class-rooms, a library and numerous parlors for social gatherings and efforts are made there to reach and help all classes of the people. The man who has made his church a centre of religious influence would naturally avail himself of so effective an agency as the Christian Endeavor movement. No sooner did he become acquainted with its objects and methods than he organized a Society and speedily supplemented it with two others, one for the aged members of the church and another for the children. Like American pastors he soon realized the value of the Society and recommended it to other pastors. Other Societies were formed and eventually all South Australia had a United Society, of which Mr. Mead was elected President. He cordially welcomed Dr. Clark on his arrival at Adelaide and called a convention of the South Australian Societies to greet the American visitor and listen to his counsel.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

A THOUGHTFUL project has been adopted by the Baptist Young People's Union of Maryland. Arrangements have been made with the Mission Board for the supply of Foreign Mission publications, containing reports from the missionaries in each field. The Union proposes to send these publications to every Baptist missionary abroad. The postage will be rather a large amount, but the Union expects that it will be enabled to defray it and there is no doubt that the missionaries will heartily welcome the news from their brethren which they will get through the thoughtfulness of the Union.—One of the churches at Springfield, Mass., has a Union which makes a special work through a committee of visiting the sick and poor of the city. It receives and distributes gifts of flowers and other things.—The Union is making rapid progress in Kansas. A meeting of the officers was held recently at Topeka to arrange plans for an extension of the movement and for making the individual Unions more efficient. Consultations of this kind are hopeful evidences of earnestness and must lead to concentrated and effective methods.—The Unions of the Association of the Walworth district of Wisconsin have been holding a Convention at Sugar Creek. Delegates were present from every Union in the Association. The reports of the work done by local Unions were read and showed that the principles and objects of the Union were well understood and applied. A number of papers were read on the various departments and were discussed by the Convention.—The pastor of the church at Bellows Falls, Vt., is co-operating heartily with the Union. He preaches every Sunday evening on the subject selected for the study of the week and has arranged with brother ministers for lectures on the various missionaries and mission fields under the care of the Baptist Board.

A NEW WOMEN'S ORDER IN THE WEST.

LESS than a year ago, a number of Christian women in St. Paul, Minn., organized a Young Women's Friendly Association—the pioneer of its kind in that part of the Union. Mr. and Mr. Lichtenberg, to whom the origin of the movement is largely due, had long been actively engaged in Christian work in that city, chiefly among the young women working in stores and factories. They opened a small room centrally situated, and invited the women workers to meet there and rest during the lunch hour. Numbers came, and the pleasant social interval, with the spiritual aid it afforded, brightened their daily lives. Increasing attendance compelled the securing of larger quarters, and a home was opened on Oakley avenue and a permanent association formed. During the past year 125,000 visits were received. As the work proceeded, evening classes were formed at which cooking, needlework and the common English branches were taught, and the effort was made to lead those who came to Christian lives. Many excellent Christian ladies of St. Paul gave personal encouragement to the enterprise, and Mrs. Lichtenberger, the "Mother of the Association," is now assisted by a competent and consecrated staff of workers, which includes Mrs. Carman, Mrs. Colville, Mrs. Kewport, Mrs. Young, Miss Sanborn, Mrs. Bailey and others. The work is steadily widening and promises to become ultimately a most potent factor in the uplifting and evangelizing of the thousands of women in St. Paul who are dependent upon their labor for subsistence. The associate officers are: Mrs. R. M. Newport, President; Mrs. Lichtenberger, First Vice-President; Mrs. Bridgeman, Second Vice-President; Mrs. Edgerton, Recording Secretary; Miss Sanborn, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. Robbins, Treasurer; Mrs. C. J. A. Morris, Assistant Treasurer. Advisory Board—R. M. Newport, T. L. Schurmerer, J. P. Gribben, T. S. Tompkins, F. G. Ingersoll and H. R. Brice.

A YOUNG Men's Christian Association has been organized at Cairo, Egypt, by Mr. Holmes, one of the missionary secretaries recently sent out by the English Y. M. C. A. Mr. Holme writes: "The first gathering in Cairo brought me several surprises. First, a young Syrian gentleman introduced himself to me as a member of the Beyrout branch; another came forward as having been present at our farewell meeting at Liverpool, and a third came to me with his transfer from Croydon!" Before despatching his letter, Mr. Holmes had taken all the necessary steps for the formation of the Association which promises to be an exceedingly important and healthy one.

THE CHASTENING ROD.

OH, judge not by prosperity:
The man beloved of God
Is he who oftenest here below,
Hath felt His chastening rod.

Thus hath it been and yet shall be,
In past, in coming years:
The pathway to the better land
Lies through the vale of tears.

And strange it is that we desire
What if the Lord speaks true,
May bring upon us that dread doom
We shall forever rue.

HOMES IN THE BLACK BELT.

A Section of Alabama Little Known to the Outside World.

ONE of the most interesting philanthropic experiments ever attempted in this country in connection with the Southern negro population, is that which is now under way in what is known as the "Black Belt" of Alabama. A town site has been purchased by the Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama, ten miles southwest of Selma, on the Birmingham, Selma & New Orleans Railway, and a colored settlement has been established there. The new town, which has been christened Beloit, has a store, post-office, saw-mill, feed-mill, seed-house, blacksmith's house, cotton-gin, and a number of comfortable dwellings, with barns, granaries, etc. The object of the experiment is, to rent to colored tenants on the basis of their ultimate ownership, small tracts of land and to teach them agricultural and other home industries, and make them self-supporting. Nor is the educational part of the experiment neglected, for there are already schools and churches in Beloit, where the intellectual and spiritual needs of the inhabitants are duly supplied.

Rev. C. B. Curtis, President of the Industrial Missionary Association, while recently visiting New York, gave to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some account of the progress made in the new settlement: "We have three schools, one night and two day, and the pupils attend regularly," he said. "The principal is a white lady—Miss McLawry. We want to give these people an opportunity, not only to buy homes for themselves, but to acquire self-respect and independence, and to lead a Christian life. They are so ignorant now that they are easily cheated; they know nothing about accounts. All of them expect to buy their land ultimately and some have made payments on it already. The negro has the same laudable desire to become a land-owner as the white man—the same land-hunger. We are in every way satisfied with the progress we have made thus far."

A HONEY SELLER IN THE "BLACK BELT," ALABAMA.

The illustration on this page, taken from a photograph by one of the Association's officers, shows an ox-team driven by one of the colored tenants of the Association, and a wagon containing honey from the hives of the Association, which makes a feature of bee-culture. Ox-teams are by no means a rarity in the South. The buildings are comfortable-looking, their surroundings are trim and pleasant, the patches are laid out in tidy gardens, and the roads are fairly well kept. Life on the plantation is very pleasantly described by Mrs. Richards, the wife of the Secretary of the Association, who thus writes of a Sunday scene in the Methodist Church at Beloit:

"All are attired in their very best, though often it is only a freshly washed calico or a newly patched coat. Each scholar came with a large bouquet of flowers in one hand and in the other a little bundle tied up in a pocket-handkerchief. After the lesson the 'Superintender' lead in the 'responsible' (responsive) reading,' as the Secretary put it in his report; the 'destruction' (instruction) books were distributed, and then the annual missionary collection was taken. The regular program for the day, prepared by the central committee, called for a missionary sermon, but this was omitted in favor of a more interesting subject, 'The African Methodist Episcopal Church.' The church was congratulated on its independence—'We don't look to nobody for nothin'. We are no porpoises (paupers) no more.'

"In the afternoon, was the great occasion of the day. There were 'essays' and music by members of the Sunday School. Here we learned how to prepare a programme for a children's public meeting without having either superintendent, teachers or committee tired out working it up. Each one brought what his heart had moved him to prepare. During the opening song the superintendent went around and took the names of the performers and their subjects, and the work was done. No worry and fuss over the selection of exercises and performers, rehearsals and such things. The first exercise was announced as an essay, though it proved to be a printed selection, full of big words which the reader was not very successful in mastering. But no matter, they were understood and enjoyed just as well as if they had been correctly pronounced. Then followed another essay, subject, 'Angels.' This proved to be the eighth chapter of Revelation, carefully copied. Following this were several other essays, 'Gethsemane,' 'The Crucifixion,' 'The Resurrection,' etc."

Friends Gone Before.

FEW writers have more beautifully or faithfully expressed the feeling with which the Christian should regard parted friendships than Joseph Mazzini. "Remember," he says, "that there is no such thing as death for all that is best in us; that what people call death is only a transformation and step onward in life. Love is a vouchsafer for immortality. We would not scatter a single flower on a tomb if there were not an instinct in the soul teaching us that our love pleases the cherished one who is buried beneath; and depend upon it, there is more truth discovered by these flashes of the virgin soul than by all the dim, painfully elaborate lanterns of analysis and reasoning knowledge. Let us all feel, as I shall, this presence more than ever. Let you all believe—you believe in my undying affection—that death is the cradle of a new, purer and happier life. It is so. God knows I would not give at such a moment a mere poetical instinct as a consolation. I know it is so. Every departure of loved beings has made me feel so more and more. Your mother is living, loving, wanting love; longing for your rising (some time) calmly and trustfully to her, and rewarded for the love she had, for the truth she did and wished to do, with some more power to help you on, to influence you with holy, virtuous thoughts."

The Desire for Happiness.

"THERE are some stars," says a philosophic writer in Scribner's, "that we cannot see at all when we look straight at them, but which become visible when we look to one side. So there are things that we cannot get when we try directly for them, but which presently fall into our laps if only we try hard enough for something else. Everybody knows it is that way with happiness. Make it a primary object and it leads you a doubtful chase; but ignore it in the rational pursuit of something else, and presently you may find it perched unnoticed on your shoulder, like a bird whose tail has felt the traditional influence of salt. So, of course, the very first essential to the achievement of happiness of any durable sort is to rise above the necessity of being happy at all. It may be conducive to this sort of achievement to remember that great spirits in all times have found in their own involuntary discontent a spur to exalted endeavor. Neither Lincoln, nor Balzac, nor Carlyle were happy men, but they put the saddle and bridle on their own depression and rode it under whip and spur into immortality. Columbus himself had low spirits, and Socrates and the judicious Hooker both had Xantippes."

Don't Cultivate Enmities.

"WHEN I hear men or women attributing a lack of success in any direction to the machinations of their enemies," said a Christian lady, "I involuntarily smile at the egotistical assertion. People are in general too much engrossed, each by his or her own affairs, to make any very active war against each other. Jealous, envious, rancorous they often are, but to wage positive hostilities, they are for the most part too indifferent. This proneness to attribute our mischances to enemies is merely one of the refuges of our self-love. Admitting possible exception, it may be said emphatically that we are none of us anybody's enemy but our own. We are all, however, our own enemies. The tongue that truly detracts from our credit and glory is our own tongue; the hand that most mercilessly despoils us of our property is our own hand. All the real murders in this world—that is, apart from the mere commonplace killings of men and women—are self-murders. Conceit tells us a different tale, and we are too ready to lay on the flattering unction. But all great successes, all the grander triumphs, will be in proportion to our seeing the truth as it really stands; namely, that the hardest obstacles, the most real dangers, lie in the perverse impulses of our own nature."

Steps to Ruin.

A CONDUCTOR on a railway train was overheard a few days ago counselling a casual acquaintance—a young girl—in a fatherly way, as follows: "Never go to a dance—there is always harm in it. It has proved many a time the first step toward ruin for both men and women. Not while I live would I allow a daughter of mine to go. I know too much about the harm that there is in it to allow a daughter of mine to dance." Not long ago a man who for years has been a consistent Christian, but who had been before conversion very dissipated, said in prayer meeting, "I wish I could make others see as plainly as I do the evil of card playing. I have tested it—it led me down almost to hell. It brought me into bad company, it started me to gambling, it threw a strange fascination over vice, it almost ruined my life forever. I hate cards now, and I wish I could make others hate them!" These two vices, dancing and cards, have proved steps to ruin for thousands and warnings that come from personal experience should not pass unheeded.

THE HEAVENLY HOMESTEAD.

THE favorite symbol by which the Bible presents celestial happiness, is a house, writes Dr. Talmage. In some healthy neighborhood a man builds a very commodious habitation. He must have room for all his children. The rooms come to be called after the different members of the family. That is mother's room. That is George's room. That is Henry's room. That is Flora's room. That is Mary's room. And the house is all occupied. But time goes by, and the sons go out into the world, and build their own homes; and the daughters are married, or have talent enough singly to go out and do a good work in the world. After a while the father and mother are almost alone in the big house, and seated by the evening fire, they say, "Well, our family is no larger now than when we started together forty years ago." But time goes still further by, and some of the children are unfortunate, and return to the old homestead to live, and the grandchildren come with them, and, perhaps, great-grandchildren, and again the house is full. Millennia ago, God built on the hills of heaven a great homestead for a family innumerable, yet to be. At first he lived alone in that great house, but after a while it was occupied by a very large family, cherubic, seraphic, angelic. The eternities passed on, and many of the inhabitants became wayward, and left never to return. And many of the apartments were vacated. I refer to the fallen angels. Now these apartments are filling up again. There are arrivals at the old homestead of God's children every day, and the day will come when there will be no unoccupied room in all the house.

As you and I expect to enter it and make there eternal residence, I thought you would like to get some more particulars about that many-roomed homestead. "In my Father's house are many rooms." You see the place is to be apportioned off into apartments. We shall love all who are in heaven, but there are some very good people whom we would not want to live with in the same room. They may be better than we are, but they are of a divergent temperament. We should like to meet with them on the golden streets, and worship with them in the temple, and walk with them on the river-banks, but I am glad to say that we live in different apartments. "In my Father's house are many rooms." You see, heaven will be so large that if one want an entire room to himself or herself, it can be afforded.

An Indian Lad's Work for Christ.

A MISSIONARY tells the following anecdote: A little boy who lived in one of those great forests in India went to live at the home of a medical missionary. After he had been there about two years he became a Christian. The boy came to the doctor one morning, and asked permission to return home. The doctor told him he might return at the close of his school year. When the patients had been attended to, the doctor saw the boy still waiting, and said: "I told you to return to school. Why did you not do it?" And the boy answered: "Oh, sir, I have a father and mother, two brothers and three sisters who never heard of Christ. Can I not go and tell them of the Saviour?" The doctor could not say no then, and the boy went. In about three weeks he returned. The doctor said: "Did you see your parents?" He answered, "Yes, and they are both Christians; and, standing very straight, he said: "I taught my mother how to pray."

That boy is now an earnest worker for Christ, and the entire family are Christians.

A STORY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HOME

Written expressly for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XIV.

AT THE MANSE

FOR three years two women had been making a home for themselves at Plymouth, within hearing of the soft lapping of the waves of the little bay upon the sandy shore. One of these women was worn and faded, old before her time. The other was fair and young; both were touched with a profound sadness. One face pre-eminently expressed patience, the other courage. They were Annie Russel and Eloise. They made many friends, but few intimate friends. Those whose lives lock up mysteries seldom have intimates; and Anne and Eloise were in the nearer matters of the heart sufficient to each other.

Most people that knew them could not have told whether they were friends or relatives. The little boys who shared their love and care, called one "Mother," the other "Aunt Eloise," but rendered love and obedience to each. Bright, handsome children, these boys; and it was matter of remark how steadfastly the two women cultivated in them all manly virtues—truthfulness, honesty, independence, industry and firmness of purpose. How the two labored to cultivate in the lads all this which had been lacking in the father of whom they never spoke to the boys, or to one another. Mrs. Anne Russel people discovered had charge of the house, directing the one maid and the lad who took care of the horse and cow. Miss Maple directed the education of the boys. It gradually became known that all the money belonged to Miss Maple, because all cheques were signed by her, and all business was done in her name. Mrs. Russel shrank from society and went out but little, except to the various meetings of the church. Miss Maple was of a brighter nature, more accustomed to society, fond of literary and philanthropic undertakings, always at leisure to give help where it was needed. A woman of elegant manners and with a handsome face, Eloise had attracted the attention of gentlemen, but the decision with which she rejected the acquaintanceship of men who were not elderly and married could not be mistaken, evidently she intended to limit her friendship to her own sex. "Strange," said some, "a very charming woman, so pretty, so well off, so educated, and evidently without the least idea of marriage."

"When she first came here, she seemed chiefly dependent on her own exertions, but after the first year she dropped her music teaching, and now has only private pupils in elocution and literature, perhaps she is studying for [illegible]

"Before she came here to live, Mrs. Lane said that she was here with an old man, who seemed to be rich and crabbed, whom she called uncle. They had had some affliction and also had some cause of disagreement. Mrs. Lane heard some sharp remarks about letters. After Miss Maple had come here to live, a year or more after, a young man whom she called Cousin Richard came to see her, and they sat all one afternoon on Burial Hill. Then she bought the house, and Mrs. Russel and the boys came. Since then Miss Maple has never been seen on the streets with any men."

These small items being all the food gossips had to live upon naturally it died of starvation, and her acquaintances took Eloise as they found her and were thankful; she was a chief [illegible] done. In her church she became the prime reliance of the minister's wife, with whom she had formed a close friendship, and whose cultivation supplied something which was want-[illegible]

One Friday evening when Eloise and Anne had been living three years in Plymouth, [illegible] Anne had met in such bitter trouble in that hotel in Buffalo, the minister's wife came to see Eloise after tea. She had with her a very beautiful little girl of six, whom she called Ruth, a child with a shy, anxious, terrified face.

"I want to talk with you," said the minister's wife, "can the children be sent into the [illegible]?"

"Boys take the little girl into the other room," said Anne.

"I want your help," said the minister's wife. "Yesterday morning a minister, Mr. Wilton, came to us bringing very warm letters of introduction. He is a most engaging man in his manners, and I should think he would be an enchanting preacher. His wife, this little girl's mother, has been dead but three months. He has a very melancholy anxious face, and just now is in unexpected trouble. He has sent most of his baggage to Quebec. He is going to supply a church there. He has been living in the South, his wife died there of consumption. He is devoted to this little girl. As they came up from the South, stopping here and there, where he preached, they were—last Monday, in a hotel that was burned, and they lost everything that they had. They came here with no luggage but a little hand-bag. In creeping from the hotel, and helping others, Mr. Wilton got an ugly wound in the head, on the left temple. It is plastered up, and on account of it he objected to preaching, but as my husband is not at all well, he has consented. He was at the lecture last evening, and talked magnificently; it was thrilling. I am sorry so you were not out. I wish you had been there."

Anne had one of her worst headaches. She was half crazy."

"Well, you'll both hear him Sunday, and it will be a treat. We have persuaded him to stay for two or three weeks. It will give my poor husband a rest, and such brilliant speaking is sure to arouse attention and fill the church. He objected on account of the lack of baggage and clothes for himself and Ruth. I told him I would see to that. He did not seem to think of buying: it is hard to get ready made for a child of that size, and then, perhaps he is not in funds. He looks terribly anxious and sad. We told him if he would stay and preach two or three Sabbaths, and hold some week-day meetings, we would have a purse made up for him. Now Miss Maple, I wish you would see about that child's clothes. Will you go about to-morrow among our ladies who have little girls of Ruth's age, and see if you can get two or three dresses and aprons and some underclothing? I brought her so that you could see her size. We will get what is needed for Mr. Wilton from some of our gentlemen. You must come over to the house, Miss Maple, and have some conversation with him—he charms everyone."

"It is a queer situation for a minister to be in; were his letters personally directed to your husband by people whom he knew?" said Eloise.

"No. But they were from prominent pastors in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, and New York. They were generally addressed, That and his wound, and the lack of baggage, seemed odd to us at first. But after we heard him at the evening meeting all our prejudices vanished away like mist before the sun."

"I havn't heard of any hotel being burned, and I read the newspapers carefully," said Anne Russell."

"That is just what my husband said to him, but he said it was a little hotel in a small village up in the Pennsylvania Mountain regions, and probably was not noticed in the papers generally. He says since he lost his wife he has felt so miserable that he has avoided big cities and has kept in little out-of-the-way places. It is pathetic to hear him talk of the dear lost one. The little girl refers also to her mother. She seems very fond of her father, and said something about an Uncle that wanted to take her away from him. You'll go out for the clothes, will you?"

"Yes indeed." I'll be around at your house before noon with report of my success," replied Eloise.

By noon next day Eloise had secured an ample supply of garments for the little Ruth, and Anne Russel went with her to take the parcels to the house. Having spent a few minutes with the minister's wife they were about to leave the house, when the minister, coming out of his study, met them in the hall.

"Come in here a minute, do," he said, "I want to introduce to you the minister who will preach to-morrow. We are going to have a great treat, I promise you."

Eloise and Mrs. Russel entered the study—faced Henry Russell, Cecil Grafton.

As the two women entered the room, Russel, who had been looking out of the window into the garden, turned. His face blanched, and holding up his hand as if to prevent their approach to him, he gave a terrible cry. The women were white, and for the moment silent. Then Aune spoke:

"And do you dare, Henry Russel, having desecrated all else that men call sacred, to profane the altars of God? What! you preach tomorrow? Leave the town!"

Russel held his hand against his heart, and panted like a frightened animal, hunted into its last hiding. His face was drawn and ghastly, the wound plastered up across his temple had a purple rim about it, his eyes glared and glazed, he was the wreck of the once handsome audacious man.

A spasm of terrible agony seized Eloise at seeing the shameful change that had come upon the man whom she had loved—whom she still loved. Years of misery were written upon him, and suddenly she felt as by some intuition that sin had not gone prosperously with him, that the devil had been a poor paymaster to him, and his only wages were death. Even in this world he was eating of the fruit of his doings. She read in his face and attitude that here he had been driven to the wall. Wrecked in health, empty in pocket, beggared, ashamed, hunted perhaps by justice—he had come to make his last effort for himself in his ways of unrighteousness, and Nemesis had followed hard upon his heels, and now he had fallen under her blow. Her soul was torn by this revelation, as a mother's is torn by the anguish of her child.

But none of this softening pity was in the heart of Anne Russel; possibly her instincts were less keen than those of Eloise, and she did not so realize the depths to which this man had fallen; besides he had disgraced her sons. That filled up the measure of her bitterness. Eloise siezed upon the back of a chair to stay her failing strength. Anne faced in rage the sinner.

"Who is this child whom you call yours?" she demanded.

"The child of my wife ——"

"Your wife!" said Anne furiously, "look at me. I am your wife."

"I married her mother. I love the child. She is the thing I love best in all the world. Ruth! Ruth, come to me."

The child in the hall heard the cry and came flying to him, white and terrified. She planted herself against his knees as if to defend him and faced Eloise and Anne. "No one shall take me from you, papa!"

"How dared you marry her mother; how many other women have you married? Have you deserted the mother?"

"No—she is dead," gasped Russel.

"And do you, villain, think that you shall be allowed to keep that innocent child? Are you fit to bring up a girl? She shall go back to her friends. You shall not keep her. Go where you will, but you shall not sacrifice that baby, it is enough that you have sacrificed her mother, Eloise and me. Go, will you? Leave the child, but go! Go and repent, if you can."

"I will go out of the world," said Russel, pulling a small revolver from his breast, and aiming it at his head. But Eloise sprang forward grasping his arm, and the ball passed harmless into the ceiling. The next instant Russel lay upon the floor insensible.

The minister called from the window for a doctor whom he saw passing, and in a moment all were anxiously trying to revive the life that was so little of a blessing to the man himself, so great a curse to them.

"He may live a few days, or hours, but not more I think," said the doctor, "the trouble is of the heart, he may die in a minute."

"Have him carried to our home," said Eloise, firmly. "Send for a stretcher. Doctor will you go with him? Anne, go on and prepare a room. Come Ruth, you must come too, he loves you, he will want to see you as he dies."

She was firm now and collected. Anne hastened away. She had been angry, had given way to her emotions, she was less shaken than Eloise, this man could not again make her drink of the waters of Marah, she had tasted their full bitterness, and it had passed from her lips years ago, her life now was only lived in the brighter lives of her children.

Eloise looked at the minister and his wife. "Keep our secret. He will die; for the boys' sake keep all this matter silent. You can say he was suddenly siezed with fatal illness and we had him removed to our house, as we had known him long ago. That will be truth enough for the public—and will save the name of the boys. You only need know that Anne was his lawful wife, he is the father of her boys, under another name, he married me. I thought, for one week, that I was a proud, perfectly happy wife. He seems to have deceived Ruth's mother as he did me. He wore out all Anne's love and patience long ago, but, it may seem strange to you, I could not love and change, and nothing tore him from my heart. It was for his sake that I first cared for his wife and children."

The minister in silence walked with Eloise behind the stretcher on which Russel was carried to her home. At the gate the minister taking her hand, said, "Rely fully upon us." And lifting his hat, he stood bare-headed until she passed him and closed behind her the door of her house.

"It was so fortunate," people said, "that that strange minister had found friends to look after him in his last hours. How good a thing it was, that at the busy manse they did not have to assume such a terrible care."

"Yes, Miss Maple was always doing nice things, but then, why not? She had leisure and money. Perhaps she would take charge of that little girl too." And so the stream of talk, having little to feed it, slipped away from the home where Anne and Eloise watched a dying bed.

From the still border-land of death, with its mists and shadows, Henry Russel labored back but once, called with insistence by the voice of Eloise, not for her own sake, but for the sake of little Ruth. Who was she? Who were her friends?

"Ruth Kingsland. She has but one relative, a letter is in my pocket. Be good to her. I deceived her mother into believing herself my wife. She deceived me into believing that she had property of her own. It was an amity that died with her. Be good to the child, she has nothing. Poor baby, she always loved me—and believed in me. Eloise! since I deceived you, I have been a man accursed!" And 'accursed' was the last word on his lips, as he drifted out into the night.

Ruth, being told that he was dead, gave a loud cry, and for half an hour wept miserably. Then lured by some candy and the capers of a puppy, she went out to play with the boys, and presently was smiling, her loss forgotten.

The dead man lay in his coffin between the two women whom he had wronged so cruelly. Here was a strange thing, Anne had given him a wife's faithful love, she had lavished on him her little property, she was the mother of his two sons, but he went out of life without giving them a thought or asking for forgiveness. Eloise had loved him passionately; his wrongs against her had not made him her enemy; they had wrung from her no word of upbraiding; he had found her an innocent, happy girl, he had left her a blighted, disappointed woman, he had for her no word of remorse, of confession, of tenderness. The one creature for whom he seemed to feel affection and regret—was the child Ruth.

Eloise found the letter to which he referred; it was from a Clarke Sanders who seemed to be Ruth's uncle. But for that letter, two postage stamps, and a half dollar, Henry Russel's pockets were empty. He seemed to have reached Plymouth in a last extremity of poverty, when all that he had ever possessed had been lost. Little Ruth could give no information. She talked vaguely of "Papa's preaching in church sometimes for folks," "Uncle Clarke came after papa and hit him on the head; he was a very bad uncle Clarke. Papa was going to read to lots and lots of people and they didn't come—and papa put down his head and cried, and the man kept the trunk."

Such baby reminiscences wrung anguished tears from Eloise, but Anne was dry-eyed: her tears had all been wept long ago. Anne, careful for Eloise, checked the stream of Ruth's recollections, telling her to say no more.

For Ruth this dead man was papa, and she followed him to his grave. Anne's boys went also to the funeral, seated one on each side of their mother in the carriage, but they had not seen this man's face, and for them he was a stranger, who had died under their roof.

Eloise wrote to Clarke Sanders who was in Maryland, telling him that Ruth was at her house where her "papa" had died, and if there were no nearer claimants she herself would adopt the child. After a little correspondence this was agreed upon.

"Our boys will be the better for a little girl in the house, we shall be the better able to teach them how to treat women," said Eloise to Anne. "This poor child seems to have no one to care for, and I think he loved her, strange that this stormy life should end with one unselfish love for an innocent thing."

A Great Conference on Missions.

Remarkable Gathering of Baptist Pastors and Churches in New York — Eloquent Addresses on the Missionary Outlook.

A SERIES of missionary meetings, under the auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union was held at Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York City, during the month of January. These meetings were remarkable for fervency and were among the most representative in character that have been held in the city of New York during the past twenty-five or thirty years. All the Baptist churches of New York City, and many in the State were well represented.

At the opening session of the Conference, Dr. S. W. Duncan, Foreign Secretary of the Union, delivered a powerful and eloquent address on "Foreign Missions in General." A very novel part of the discourse was the section on the Practical Economics of Missions, showing how the world gains by Missions in commerce, in knowledge of Philology, Ethnology, Meteorology and the various natural sciences. Next evening, stirring addresses were made by Drs. Henry M. Sanders, A. C. Dixon, and Henry C. Mabie. On the day following a memorable series of meetings opened. The Rev. W. C. Bitting, presided. Eloquent and valuable addresses were delivered by the Rev. Drs. W. H P. Faunce, the pastor of 5th Avenue Baptist Church, Cronkhite, (Burma); L. A. Gould, (China), and John C. Mabie. The address of Mr. Gould bristled with statistics and was full of interest from beginning to end. He showed the wonderful development of missionary work in the vast Chinese Empire, paid a high tribute to the success of Medical Missions and urged the need of more workers and funds.

Dr. Mabie gave a very interesting account of his travels in various parts of China and India with reminiscences of a touching character as to the piety of the converts he had conversed and prayed with by means of an interpreter. He made an earnest and eloquent appeal for funds. He announced that one of the most distinguished graduates of Yale, who had taken a post-graduate course in philology and was a master of seven languages, had written to him of the great interest which he had experienced over the mission on the Congo and it had struck him that a scientific consideration of the primitive tongues on the Congo would be largely beneficial to translators of the Bible as well as useful to students of languages.

Presuming that he could be encouraged to pursue at home his studies of the various tongues spoken on the Congo for another year, he would be prepared to place himself at the disposal of the A. B. M. Union on the Congo field at $600. This, Dr. Mabie urged, demonstrates the growing interest in missionary labor.

Miss S. M. Waterbury made an eloquent address, showing that in relation to Missions in India, none could dispute that women alone could carry the Gospel of Jesus to the women and children of that vast country. She drew a touching picture of the noble work possible to self-sacrificing women missionaries in India, in elevating the condition of women and children; but intending missionaries must dispose of visionary idealization of the work; the children were dirty little waifs and the work to be done demanded practical women.

The Revs. Dr. Downie (India), S. W. Duncan, (Foreign Secretary), Messrs. R. O. Fuller, Boston; Wm. M. Isaacs and Mornay Williams followed. Mr. Fuller was very quaint in his remarks, which were full of humor and pathos. His made an appeal to the purses of the assembly, couched in terms of practical business wisdom and common-sense, yet so pleasantly full of mother-wit as to greatly tickle the fancy of his hearers. He opened his remarks by reciting his boyish awe at receiving, while yet a stripling, the formal call to arms signed by the colonel of his regiment. He compared this sensation to that which inspired him when he received a formal document a few days ago, as follows:

You, Robert O. Fuller, of Boston, are ordered to appear at Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, on Missionary Service at two P. M. on the 17th day of January, 1893. (signed), JOHN C. MABIE,

He ejaculated to himself: "Maybe I'll go."

Mr. Fuller urged on the wives to enlighten their husbands on the subject of Foreign Missions as their mothers had done in the previous generation in respect to slavery. Unless the wives and daughters encouraged the men to benevolence they would never get the subscriptions necessary for Foreign Missions. Their husbands naturally would reason as to whether such an investment would pay or not. As to that, he would tell them that at his own cost he went out to India determined to find the inside, outside, top and bottom of this matter; he examined carefully and minutely into the condition of sixty different mission stations, and he was happy to state that he could say they were conducted as conscientiously as were our own churches at home. As to results all over the Mission field he compared the work of our Union with that of the American Board, and the comparison stands as follows:

	THE AMERICAN BOARD.	THE AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.
Money expended,	$825.000	$427.000
No. of workers. -	2000	1600
No. of converts, - -	3500	7800

He adverted to the fact that his son, who had been the light of the household, always a good boy, and for years in his business, and whom he regarded as the successor to his business, one day last year came to him and said: "Father, I want to be a missionary."

"To say that it was a disappointment" remarked Mr. Fuller, "does not express the matter at all. Yet neither I nor his mother could lift a finger against that resolution."

Now Mr. Fuller with great emphasis brought his convictions home to his audience: Did they think that as a business man he could let his boy take such a step if he if he did not believe the work to be a noble and a paying venture?

Mr. Wm. M. Isaacs and Mr. Mornay Williams followed, the former reading a scholarly paper, the latter delivering a brilliant oration.

At 8 P. M., the Hon. Charles L. Colby took the chair and asked Dr. A. Bunker of Burmah to lead with prayer. Mr. Colby delivered a eulogy on Missionaries and Mission Work and then called on the Rev. John A. Broadus, D.D., of Louisville, Ky., to address the meeting. Dr. Broadus explained that this is a great forward movement. Its origin lies in the fact that two Baptists named Andrew Fuller and William Carey, a hundred years ago, made a stand for Christian liberty. The aim of Christianity at home and abroad is conversion—that is the first requisite of Christianity. Andrew Fuller and William Carey denounced Baptismal regeneration as an error quite as great as that of a paternal church-and-state union.

He explained that we are called upon to give a powerful impulse to this Forward movement: I. Because of the dead. II. Because of the living. III. Because of the converted. IV. We owe it to the unconverted heathen. VI. We owe it to those who are not Christians at home. Lastly, We owe it to God the Father.

Rev. Dr. Adoniram Judson Gordon, of Boston, was next introduced and made a powerful address.

"Giving to the Lord," says Dr. Gordon, "pays in cash and in consecrated souls." Carey's collection at Nottingham Meeting House of £13, 14d, 6s, has grown to $11,000,000, and we now have 7,000 missionaries on the field. When Carey commenced the doors were all shut, now they are all open. Thibet, the only country where Christianity has not penetrated into. Yet nine-tenths of the human race, amounting to over 100,000,000 souls are unmoved, and multiplication of the species goes on in the ratio of seventy heathens to one Christian per annum. "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye, therefore, to the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."

He traced the impulse which was communicated to William Carey and Andrew Fuller back to the fountain-head which is John Elliott, the wonderful missionary to the Indians, who, with the feeblest material, translated the whole of the Bible into the Indian language.

"A factory hand in Boston, supports from her earnings six missionaries in the mission field; a working printer in my vicinity, some years ago became greatly concerned on this matter and determined to make the attempt of supporting one missionary out of the proceeds of his labor and year by year he has increased until now he supports fifteen missionaries. Brother Broadus has exploded one popular adage when he said, 'Charity never commences at home.' Do you notice that all these old proverbs have selfishness as their inspiration? Here is one:

"'A bird in hand is worth two in the bush.' Friends, that bird is the eagle on the silver dollar! Oh friends, let loose your hold on these birds in the hand.

"Let me in concluding tell you of a Japanese converted girl, who collecting for missions brought me every Monday her gatherings, and in her sweet Japanese way held up to me always with the expression: 'Here is some more Jesus money.' At last I asked her what she meant. 'Every cent of this,' she said, "belongs to Jesus.'

"Have you any Jesus money? Think of him who became poor that you might be rich. If you have any Jesus money, say: 'Here it is!' and no doubt we shall get the million!"

1,000,000 Tired Out People are thinking to-day that all they need to make them feel well is "a little rest." It is true that the rest cure is often the best cure, but it is also true that a great many people cannot afford to rest indefinitely Worse still, the very knowledge that they cannot afford it, seriously interferes with the best use of the rest they have. Too often going to the doctor means that the patient shall stop short, while cares, duties and expenses keep right on. It is highly desirable then that some treatment be found for this numerous class—something that will neither interfere with their business or pleasure. In this respect nothing in the world can compare with Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen. For more than twenty years this well-known agent has made multitudes of run-down, over-worked, nervous and sick people as good as new, and that right at their own homes and occupations. From the 60,000 cases which they have carefully recorded they can give you incontestable proof, doubtless in your own neighborhood. If in need of better health, write them. That is better than "rainbow-chasing" after rest which never comes. Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

THE GOSPEL IN NYASSA LAND.

A VERY promising field for Gospel effort is Nyassaland in Africa, which is at present under a British protectorate, its affairs being administered by a commissioner, Mr. H. H. Johnston. The country is accessible by the Zambesi and Shire rivers, as far as the settlement of Blantyre, from which there is a road leading to Livingstonia, at the south end of Lake Victoria Nyassa. The territory on both shores of the lake is peopled by tribes who have been glad to seek protection from slave-dealing Arabs and they are readily coming under Gospel influences.

RT. REV. W. B. HORNBY.
The New Bishop of Nyassaland.

On this page we present a portrait of the Rt. Rev. Wilfred Bird Hornby of Oxford University, who was recently consecrated as Bishop of the Church of England for Nyassaland and who is now on his way to South-east Africa. The new missionary-bishop is a man of eminent piety and wide practical experience. For the last eight years he has been incumbent of St. Columba's Church, Southwick, England.

CONFLICT WITH SLAVE-DEALERS.

A LETTER from Bihe in Western Africa, recently received by Rev. W. T. Currie, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on December 28th, contains the following story of a conflict, which shows how bold and persistent the slave traders are: Though the Expedition against the slavers now in Bihe, is not strictly a military one, its members have a heavily armed detachment of Congo Free State soldiers, which at once puts them in a kind of independent position in passing through the countries. At Lake Cinkonjia (into which the Lufira river flows), a few days journey to the north of us, a sad rupture happened between some of the natives there and the European officer in command of the Expedition, whose duty it was to bring up the rear of the caravan with some twelve soldiers. It is difficult to find out the truth of the whole matter, but the results are painfully evident in that the white man and his twelve soldiers were killed and all their goods taken.

The expedition further encountered a large caravan of Biheans led by Sacitota, who was perhaps the greatest trader in Bihe. I knew him well. They were slave-buying, and that too in the Congo Free State. The chief of the Expedition ordered them to cease, but the Biheans persisted, and finally when they saw fighting imminent, joined the people of the country against the Expedition, and took up their position in one of the villages. Fighting ensued, and the resistance made is described as "most stiff and determined," but the result was, as might be expected—the defeat of the Biheans and the death of Sacitota. I find I have said more about these new comers than I intended, and shall only add that they intend to go on to Katanga where one of the party, who is a geologist, will be able to look into, if not settle, the gold question; and from there, I understand, they mean to return by Lake Tanganyika, from which place they will forward our letters home.

THE CARE OF THE INDIAN.

AT the recent meeting of the Board of Indian Commissioners in Washington, a resolution was passed warmly indorsing the administration of General Morgan, and asking the President-elect to continue the same policy. The hope was also expressed that appointments in the Indian service would be taken entirely out of politics; that the law for compulsory education would be enforced; and the supply of rations should be discontinued and the benevolent societies would increase their efforts for the religious teaching of the Indians.

COLUMBUS AND US.

HE discovered America 1492.
WE discovered Griffith 1891.

You never heard of Griffith? Now, that's what hurts us. Every one seems to know about the discoveries of Columbus, but many are surprisingly ignorant about ours—Not every one, though, for we sold 1100 Griffith lots last year to over 600 people living in 50 different States, Territories and Provinces of North America. That doesn't denote utter darkness in the public mind on CHICAGO'S FACTORY SUBURB, does it?

Our mail of September 3d, 1892 brought in purchases from residents of New Hampshire, Florida, Texas and Washington. That must mean that Griffith has advantages equally recognizable in the White Mountains or the Rockies; on the Staked Plains or in the Everglades. Some of these advantages are:

Two Fuel-Oil Pipe-Lines, Three Trunk Railroads, The Chicago Outer Belt Line, Lots $150 and up; payments $5 and up,

PROGRESS IN JAPAN.

From Kyoto, Japan, comes the news, sent by Rev. Otis Cary, of the American Board, that an important step in the securing of religious liberty in Japan has been taken by the bringing to the notice of the government an alleged violation of the rights guaranteed by the new Constitution. "Though at the time of writing," Mr. Cary says, "The facts involved are still under investigation, the Ministers of Education and of the Interior have by their words shown that a governor would not be justified in exhorting teachers to have nothing to do with Christianity, or a teacher in forbidding pupils to study the Bible. The number of those engaged directly in Christian work has been increased by the graduation of twenty-three from the theological department of the Doshisha and eight from the Women's Evangelistic School in Kobe. Most of these are laboring zealously and effectively, while others like them are needed for other places desiring such help. Graduates of the Nurses' School and other institutions add to the good influences emanating from the educational work of the American Board. No one of us has the gift of prophecy to see what the near future may have in store; but the present feeling among missionaries and Japanese pastors seems more hopeful and expectant than for some time past.

TO RECLAIM BOY CRIMINALS.

The Grand Work of the New York Prison Association at Canaan Four Corners — A Christian Training Home for Young Offenders — Lives once Darkened by Sin now Full of Brightest Promise.

SUNDAY afternoon in a New York City jail. A gentleman has been speaking to the prisoners in the chapel; as he is passing out through the corridor, a slight noise attracts his attention, and turning he sees at the far end of the passage a little white hand stretched out through the bars, beckoning him to come nearer. He returns to find a boy locked into a cell with a hardened criminal, and the little voice says:

"O, sir, don't yer do anything for the boys? You've been telling the men all that's done for them, but don't yer do anything for the boys?"

This gentleman was the Secretary of the New York Prison Association, Mr. W. M. F. Round, and many a time has he met this question without being able to solve it, but now he lays it before the Creator and Father of all boys, and lo, before the week is passed an answer comes.

In the "hill country" lies the promised land for the boys; literally the land of Canaan, and flowing with milk and all healthful food; here Mr. F. G. Burnham has given a farm of six hundred acres as an Industrial Training School for boys who would otherwise be on the road to ruin, and here Mr. Round, after studying the methods pursued in France and Germany, has founded one of the most unique institutions in the world, which in three years has reformed and honorably discharged one-third of its members, seventy-five per cent. of whom have connected themselves with some church, while many of those still remaining at the Farm, which is situated at Canaan Four Corners, New York State, are leading consistent Christian lives.

What is the secret of this success that transformed lying and thieving boys into honest and upright citizens, and humble followers of Jesus Christ? It lies at the foundation, for the motto of the institution is "Christ, the Chief Corner-stone."

The boys come here the enemies of society, and find the principles of the Gospel carried out by the Brothers who form the Order of St. Christopher. They come neglected and forlorn, and meet with a patient love and tender care that watches over them night and day through the ministrations of these and women. They come with a moral sense so blunted that they see nothing wrong in themselves, but they are not long in the presence of the Brother Director before they are led to acknowledge the evil that is in them, and the first step toward repentance has been taken. Under such influences the pure air and country life can have their naturally healthy effect, and unite with plenty of work to create a sound mind in a sound body. The family life is maintained by dividing the eighty or more boys into six or eight families, each with its distinctive name and house, watched over by one of the Brothers.

Consecrated Men

MR. W. M. F. ROUND,

Founder of the Industrial Training School at Canaan Four Corners, N. Y.

Let us take a glance at some of the boys in their every-day life. The first building we see as we approach the Farm is Gilpin Hall, where the Welcome family receives the new boys on their arrival. As they take their places for each meal they chant a simple grace that Brother Ernest has learned in his German home. Now we pass on to the Mayflower house, the banner family this week, for its members have lost the fewest mills, which indicates the best conduct. There is a healthy rivalry for the banner, and a whole family feels disgraced by the bad conduct of one member. This is Brother John's wife and children, who are at the door with two of the boys who have left their housework for the moment. If we follow them indoors we shall find the family motto on the wall along with pictures and shelves for the boys' Bibles.

"RECORD ROCK," AND GROUP OF BOYS AT THE CANAAN FOUR CORNERS TRAINING SCHOOL.

We will peep into the Robin's Nest as we take our way to the school room where the junior class are having their morning lessons. One boy has a pet cat curled up asleep on his lap under the desk. Pussy seems quite at home here, for she makes no disturbance. In the afternoon the juniors will be at work, and the seniors will come in for their schooling, but in the morning the big boys are needed on the farm, for no hired laborers are employed. Over in the meadows we may see some of them now, driving a herd of beautiful cows to pasture. This outdoor life keeps them healthy and, together with the strict attention paid to their diet by the Brother Director, accounts for the fact that the Sister Dora Cottage has never yet been put to its intended use of a hospital.

One death by accident there was last year, by a fall from a horse, but the young soul was more prepared for heaven than for the battle with temptation here below and was glad when the angel summoned him to go. At midnight he heard the call and at daybreak laid her gentle touch upon his features, leaving an expression never to be forgotten by those who beheld it.

On our way over to the campus let us take time to look in at some of the workshops where the boys are learning trades. The young blacksmith has chosen his profession well for he has a sturdy arm to wield a hammer. Stick to your Christian profession too, my young friend, which you made in chapel that summer evening, and you will be as noble as the smith Longfellow has immortalized. Now we go to the carpenter's shop where loving hands are devising some convenience for the "dear Brother Director;" then to the painter's, the cobbler's, the printing-room, and so on, round to the tailor who is perched cross-legged on his board in most approved tailor fashion, stitching away to keep all these boys clothed.

A thoroughly busy community it is, for every boy's time is portioned out for him from six o'clock in the morning till eight o'clock at night, having no time for mischief, but plenty for the natural overflow of animal spirits. And a thoroughly business-like community it is, too, for every boy has his wages, whatever his work, which he will forfeit if he does not obey the rules, but which when earned will procure him not only luxuries but privileges, and good standing in rank, for they show him to be worthy and obedient. Ten mills a day are his wages for the first six months, while he is in the lowest or inmate grade, but at the end of that time if he has not forfeited too many, he will become a cadet, and have thirty-five a day, and when he arrives at the graduate grade he will have seventy, sums that amount up so fast as to

Fire the Youthful Ambition

to possess them, and which are found to be more powerful incentives to good behavior than the fear of any punishment. Even the sight of a woodchuck under a stone wall has not proved strong enough to tempt a half dozen boys across the imaginary boundary which has been set for them in the middle of the road, for they would lose some mills thereby, and then on some happy Saturday night when there happened to be an auction, they might not have mills enough to buy the ball or marbles or whatever other boyish treasure was put up for sale. Is it any wonder that a frequent prayer

THE ICHTHYOLOGY OF THE BIBLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Genesis 1: 20, "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life."

WHAT a new book the Bible is! After thirty-six years preaching from it and discussing over three thousand different subjects founded on the Word of God, the Book is as fresh to me as when I learned, with a stretch of infantile memory, the shortest verse in the Bible, "Jesus wept," and I opened a few weeks ago a new realm of biblical interest that neither my pulpit nor anyone else's had ever explored, and having spoken to you in this course of sermons on God Everywhere concerning the Astronomy of the Bible or God among the Stars, the Chronology of the Bible or God among the Centuries, the Ornithology of the Bible or God among the Birds, the Mineralogy of the Bible or God among the Amethysts, this morning as I may be divinely helped, I will speak to you about the Ichthyology of the Bible or God among the Fishes.

Our horses were lathered and tired out, and their fetlocks were red with the blood cut out by the rocks, and I could hardly get my feet out of the stirrups as on Saturday night we dismounted on the beach of Lake Galilee. The rather liberal supply of food with which we had started from Jerusalem was well-nigh exhausted, and the articles of diet remaining, had, by oft repetition, three times a day for three weeks, ceased to appetize. I never want to see a fig again, and dates with me are all out of date. For several days the Arab caterer, who could speak but half a dozen English words, would answer our requests for some of the styles of food with which we had been delectated the first few days, by crying out, "Finished." The most piquant appetizer is abstinence, and the demand of all the party was, "Let us breakfast on Sunday morning on fresh fish from Lake Gennesareth," for you must know that that lake has four names, and it is worth a profusion of nomenclature, and it is in the Bible called Chinnereth, Tiberias, Gennesareth and Galilee. To our extemporized table on Sabbath morning came broiled perch, only a few hours before lifted out of the sacred waters. It was natural that our minds should revert to the only breakfast that Christ ever prepared, and it was on those very shores where we breakfasted. Christ had, in those olden times, struck two flints together and set on fire some shavings or light brush-wood, and then put on larger wood, and a pile of glowing bright coals was the consequence. Meanwhile, the disciples, fishing on the lake, had awfully "poor luck," and every time they drew up the net it hung dripping without a fluttering fin or squirming scale. But Christ, from the shore, shouted to them, and told them where to drop the net, and one hundred and fifty-three big fish rewarded them. Simon and Nathaniel having cleaned some of those large fish, brought them to the coals which Christ had kindled, and the group who had been out all night and were chill and wet and hungry, sat down and began mastication. All that scene came back to us when on Sabbath morning, December, 1889, just outside the ruins of ancient Tiberias and within sound of the rippling Galilee, we breakfasted.

Now, is it not strange that the Bible imagery is so inwrought from the fisheries, when the Holy Land is, for the most part, an inland region? Only three lakes, two beside the one already mentioned, namely, the Dead Sea, where fish cannot live at all and as soon as they touch it they die, and the birds swoop on their tiny carcases, and the third, the Pools of Heshbon, which are alternately full and dry. Only three rivers of the Holy Land, Jabbok, Kishon and Jordan. About all the fish now in the waters of the Holy Land are the perch, the carp, the bream, the minnow, the blenny, the barbel (so-called because of the barb at its mouth), the chub, the dog-fish, none of them worth a Delaware shad or an Adirondack trout. Well, the world's geography has changed and the world's bill of fare has changed. Lake Galilee was larger and deeper and better stocked than now, and no doubt the rivers were deeper and the fisheries were of far more importance then than now. Beside that, there was the Mediterranean Sea only thirty-five miles away, and fish were salted or dried and brought inland, and so much of that article of food was sold in Jerusalem that a fish market gave the name to one of the gates of Jerusalem near-by, and it was called the Fish Gate. The cities had great reservoirs, in which fish were kept alive and bred. The Pool of Gibeon was a fish-pool. Isaiah and Solomon refer to fish-pools. Large fish were kept alive and tied fast by ropes to a stake in these reservoirs, a ring having been run through their gills, and that is the meaning of the Scripture passage which says, "Canst thou put a hook into his nose or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" So important was the fish that the god Dagon, worshiped by the Philistines, was made half fish and half man, and that is the meaning of the Lord's indignation, when in 1st Samuel, we read that this Dagon, the fish-god, stood beside the ark of the Lord, and Dagon was by invisible hands dashed to pieces, because the Philistines had dared to make the fish a god. That explains the Scripture passage: "The head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold; only the stump of Dagon was left to him." Now the stump of Dagon was the fish part. The top part, which was the figure of a man, was dashed to pieces, and the Lord, by demolishing everything but the stump or fish part of the idol, practically said, You may keep your fish, but know from the way I have demolished the rest of the idol that it is nothing Divine.

Layard and Wilkinson found the fish an object of idolatry all through Assyria and Egypt. The Nile was full of fish, and that explains the horrors of the plague that slaughtered the finny tribe all up and down that river, which has been and is now the main artery of Egypt's life. In Job you hear the plunge of the spear into the hippopotamus, as the great dramatic poet cries out: "Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons or his head with fish spears?" Yea, the fish began to swim in the very first book of Genesis, where my text records, "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life." Do you realize that the first living thing that God created was the fish? It preceded the bird, the quadruped, the human race. The fish has priority of residence over every living thing. The next thing done after God had kindled for our world the golden chandelier of the sun and the silver chandelier of the moon was to make the fish. The first motion of the principle of life, a principle that all the thousands of years since have not been able to define or analyze, the very first stir of life was in a fish. What an hour that was when in the Euphrates, the Gihon, the Pison, and the Hiddekel, the four rivers of Paradise, the waters swirled with fins and brightened with scales. All the attributes of the Infinite God were called into action for the making of that first fish. Lanceolate and transulcent miracle! There is enough wonder in the plate of a sturgeon or in the cartilage of a shark to confound the scientists. It does not take the universe to prove a God. A fish does it. No wonder that Linnæus and Cuvier and Agassiz and the greatest minds of all the centuries sat enraptured before its anatomy. Oh, its beauty, and the adaptedness of its structure to the element in which it must live: the picture gallery on the sides of the mountain Trout unveiled as they spring up to snatch the flies: the Grayling, called the Flower of Fishes; the Salmon, ascending the Oregon and the Severn, easily leaping the falls that would stop them; the bold Perch, the Gudgeon, silver and black spotted; the Herring, moving in squadrons five miles long; the Carp, for cunning, called the Fox of Fishes; the wondrous Sturgeons, formerly reserved for the tables of royal families, and the isinglass made out of their membrane; the Tench, called the physician of fishes because when applied to human ailments, it is said to be curative; the Lampreys, so tempting to the epicurean that too many of them slew Henry II.; aye, the whole world of fishes. Enough of them floating up and down the rivers to feed the hemispheres if every ear of corn and every head of wheat and every herd of quadruped, and if every other article of food in all the earth were destroyed. Universal drought, leaving not so much as a spear of grass on the round planet, would leave in the rivers and lakes and seas for the human race a staple commodity of food, which, if brought to shore, would be enough not only to feed but fatten the entire human race. In times to come the world may be so populated that the harvests and vineyards and land animals may be insufficient to feed the human family, and the nations may be obliged to come to the rivers and ocean beaches to seek the living harvests that swim the deep, and that would mean more health and vigor and brilliancy and brain than the human race now own.

The Lord, by placing the fish in the first course of the menu in paradise, making it precede bird and beast, indicated to the world the importance of the fish as an article of human food. The reason that men and women lived three and four and five and nine hundred years was because they were kept on parched corn and fish. We mix up a fantastic food that kills the most of us before thirty years of age. Custards and whipped sillabubs and Roman punches and chicken salads at midnight are a gauntlet that few have strength to run. We put on many a tombstone glowing epithets saying that the person beneath died of patriotic services or from exhaustion in religious work when nothing killed the poor fellow but lobster eaten at a party four hours after he ought to have been sound asleep in bed. There are men to-day in our streets so many walking hospitals, who might have been athletes, if they had taken the hint of Genesis in my text and of our Lord's remark and adhered to simplicity of diet. The reason that the country districts have furnished most of the men and women of our time who are doing the mightiest work in merchandise, in mechanics, in law, in medicine, in theology, in legislative and congressional halls, and all the Presidents from Washington down—at least, those who have amounted to anything—is because they were in those country districts of necessity kept on plain diet. No man or woman ever amounted to anything who was brought up on floating island or angel cake. The world must turn back to paradisaic diet if it is to get paradisaic morals and paradisaic health. The human race to-day needs more phosphorus, and the fish is charged and surcharged with phosphorus. Phosphorus, that which shines in the dark without burning.

What made the twelve Apostles such stalwart men that they could endure anything and achieve everything? Next to divine inspiration, it was because they were nearly all fishermen and lived on fish and a few plain condiments. Paul, though not brought up to swing the net and throw the line, must of necessity have adopted the diet of the population among whom he lived, and you see the phosphorus in his daring plea before Felix, and the phosphorus in his boldest of all utterances before the wiseacres on Mars Hill, and the phosphorus as he went without fright to his beheading, and the phosphorus you see in the lives of all the apostles, who moved right on undaunted to certain martyrdom, whether to be decapitated or flung off precipices or hung in crucifixion. Phosphorus, shining in the dark without burning! No man or woman that ever lived was independent of questions of diet. Let those who by circumstances are compelled to simplicity of diet, thank God for their rescue from the temptation of killing delicacies. The men and women who are to decide the drift of the twentieth century, which is only seven or eight steps off, are now five miles back from the rail station, and had for breakfast this morning a similar bill of fare to that which Christ provided for the fishermen disciples on the banks of Lake Galilee. Indeed the only articles of food that Christ by miracle multiplied were bread and fish which the boy, who acted as sutler to the seven thousand people of the wilderness, handed over—five barley loaves and two fishes. The boy must have felt badly when called on to give up the two fishes which he had brought out after having caught them himself, sitting with his bare feet over the bank of the lake and expecting to sell his supply at good profit, but he felt better when by the miracle the fish were multiplied and he had more returned to him than he had surrendered.

Know, also, in order to understand the ichthyology of the Bible that in the deeper waters, as those of the Mediterranean, there were monsters that are now extinct. The fools who become infidels because they cannot understand the engulfment of the recreant Jonah in a sea monster, might have saved their souls by studying a little natural history. "Oh," says some one, "that story of Jonah was only a fable." Say others, "It was interpolated by some writer of later times." Others say: "It was a reproduction of the story of Hercules devoured and then restored from the monster." But my reply is that history tells us that there were monsters large enough to whelm ships. The extinct ichthyosaurus of other ages was thirty feet long, and as late as the sixth century of the Christian era, up and down the Mediterranean there floated monsters compared with which a modern whale was a sardine or a herring. The shark has again and again been found to have swallowed a man entire. A fisherman on the coast of Turkey found a sea-monster which contained a woman and a purse of gold. I have seen in museums sea monsters large enough to take down a prophet. But I have a better reason for believing the Old Testament account, and that is that Christ said it was true and a type of his own resurrection, and I suppose he ought to know. In Matthew, 12 chapter, 40 verse, Jesus Christ says: "For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." And that settles it for me and for any man who does not believe Christ a dupe and an impostor.

Notice also how the Old Testament writers drew similitude from the fisheries. Jeremiah uses such imagery to prophesy destruction: "Behold I will send for many fishers, saith the Lord, and they shall fish them." Ezekiel uses fish imagery to prophesy prosperity: "It shall come to pass that the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even to En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many." The explanation of which is that En-gedi and En-eglaim stood on the banks of the Dead Sea, in the waters of which no fish can live, but the prophet says that the time will come when these waters will be regenerated and they will be great places for fish. Amos reproves idolatries by saying: "The day shall come upon you when he will take you away with hooks and your posterity with fish-hooks." Solomon, in Ecclesiastes, declares that those captured of temptation are as fishes taken in an evil net. Indeed Solomon knew all about the finny tribe and wrote a treatise on Ichthyology which has been lost.

Furthermore, in order that you may understand the ichthyology of the Bible, you must know that there were five ways of fishing. One was by a fence of reeds and canes, within which the fish were caught. But the Herodic government forbade that on Lake Galilee, lest pleasure boats be wrecked by the stakes driven. Another mode was by spearing; the waters of Galilee so clear, good aim could be taken for the transfixing. Another was by hook and line, as where Isaiah says: "The fishers also shall mourn, and they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament." And Job says: "Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook?" And Habakkuk says: "They take up all of them with the angle." Another mode was by a casting net or that which was flung from the shore. Another by a drag net or that which was thrown from a boat and drawn through the sea as the fishing smack sailed on. How wonderful all this is inwrought into the Bible imagery, and it leads me to ask in which mode are you and I fishing, for the Church is the boat and the Gospel is the net and the sea is the world and the fish are the souls, and God addresses us as he did Simon and Andrew, saying: "Follow me and I will make you fishers of men." But when is the best time to fish for souls? In the night. Peter, why did you say to Christ, "we have toiled all the night and have taken nothing?" Why did you not fish in the day-time? He replies, "You ought to know that the night is the best time for fishing?" At Tobyhanna Mills, among the mountains of Pennsylvania, I saw a friend with high boots and fishing tackle, starting out at nine o'clock at night, and I said, "Where are you going?" He answered, "Going to fish." "What, in the night?" He answered, "Yes, in the night." So the vast majority of souls captured for God are taken in times of revival in the night meetings. They might just as well come at twelve o'clock at noon, but most of them will not. Ask the evangelists of olden times, ask Finney, ask Nettleton, ask Osborn, ask Daniel Baker, and then ask all the modern evangelists which is the best time to gather souls, and they will answer, "The night; by all odds, the night." Not only the natural night, but the night of trouble. Suppose I go around in this audience and ask these Christians when they were converted to God. One would answer, "It was at the time I lost my child by membraneous croup, and it was the night of bereavement," or the answer would be, "It was just after I was swindled out of my property, and it was the night of bankruptcy," or it would be, "It was during that time when I was down with that awful sickness, and it was the night of physical suffering," or it would be, "It was that time when slander took after me and I was maligned and abused, and it was the night of persecution." Ah, my hearers, that is the time for you to go after souls, when a night of trouble is on them. Miss not that opportunity to save a soul, for it is the best of all opportunities. Go up along the Mohawk or the Juniata or the Delaware or the Tombigbee or the St. Lawrence right after a rain, and you will find the fishermen all up and down the banks. Why? Because a good time to angle is right after the rain, and that is a good time to catch souls, right after a shower of misfortune, right after floods of disaster. And as a pool overshadowed with trees is a grand place for making a fine haul of fish, so when the soul is under the long dark shadows of anxiety and distress, it is a good time to make a spiritual haul. People in the bright sunshine of prosperity are not so easily taken.

FEEDING THE MULTITUDE WITH LOAVES AND FISHES.

But be sure before you start out to the Gospel Fisheries to get the right kind of bait. "But, how," you say, "am I to get it?" My answer is, "Dig for it." "Where shall I dig for it?" "In the rich Bible grounds." We boys brought up in the country had to dig for bait before we started for the banks of the Raritan. We put the sharp edge of the spade against the ground, and then put our foot on the spade, and with one tremendous plunge of our strength of body and will, we drove it in up to the handle, and then turned over the sod. We had never read Walton's "Complete Angler." or Charles Cotton's "Instructions how to Angle for Grayling in a Clear Stream," We knew nothing about the modern red-hackle, or the fly of orange-colored mohair, but we got the right kind of bait. No use trying to angle for fish or angle for souls unless you have the right kind of bait, and there is plenty of it in the Promises, the Parables, the Miracles, the Crucifixion, the Heaven of the grand old Gospel. Yes, not only must you dig for bait, but use only fresh bait. You cannot do anything down at the pond with old angle worms. New views of truth. New views of God. New views of the soul. There are all the good books to help you dig. But make up your mind as to whether you will take the hint of Habukkuk and Isaiah and Job and use hook and line, or take the hint of Matthew and Luke and Christ and fish with a net. I think many lose their time by wanting to fish with a net and they never get a place to swing the net; in other words they want to do Gospel work on a big scale or they will not do it at all. I see feeble-minded Christian men going around with a Bagster's Bible under their arm, hoping to do the work of an evangelist and use the net, while they might be better content with hook and line and take one soul at a time. They are bad failures as evangelists; they would be mighty successes as private Christians. If you catch only one soul for God that will be enough to fill your eternity with celebration. All hail, the fishermen with hook and line! I have seen a man in roughest corduroy outfit come back from the woods loaded down with a string of finny treasures hung over his shoulder and his game bag filled, and a dog with his teeth carrying a basket filled with the surplus of an afternoon's angling, and it was all the result of a hook and line; and in the Eternal World there will be many a man and many a woman that was never heard of outside of a village Sunday School or a prayer meeting buried in a church basement, who will come before the Throne of God with a multitude of souls ransomed through his or her instrumentality and yet the work all done through personal interview one by one, one by one. You do not know who that one soul may be. Staupitz helped one soul into the light, but it was Martin Luther. Thomas Bilney brought salvation to one soul, but it was Hugh Latimer. An edge-tool maker was the means of saving one soul, but it was John Summerfield. Our blessed Lord healed one blind eye at a time, one paralyzed arm at a time, one dropsical patient at a time, and raised from the dead one girl at a time, one young man at a time. Admire the net that takes in a great many at once, but do not despise the hook and line.

God help us amid the Gospel Fisheries, whether we employ hook or net, for the day cometh when we shall see how much depended on our fidelity. Christ himself declared, "The Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a net that was cast into the sea and gathered of every kind, which, when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down and gathered the good in the vessels, but cast the bad away: so shall it be at the end of the world, the angels shall come forth and separate the wicked from the just." Yes, the fishermen think it best to keep the useful and worthless of the haul in the same net until it is drawn upon the beach, and then the division takes place, and if it is on Long Island coast, the mossbunkers are thrown out and the blue-fish and shad preserved, or if it is on the shore of Galilee, the fish classified as siluroids are hurled back into the water or thrown up the bank as unclean, while the perch and the carp and the barbel are put in pails to be carried home for use. So in the church on earth, the saints and the hypocrites, the generous and the mean, the chaste and the unclean, are kept in the same membership, but at death the division will be made and the good will be gathered into heaven and the bad, however many holy communions they may have celebrated, and however many rhetorical prayers they may have offered, and however many years their names may have been on the church rolls, will be cast away. God forbid that any of us should be among the "cast away." But may we do our work whether small or great as thoroughly as did that renowned fisherman, George W. Bethune, who spent his summer rest angling in the waters around "The Thousand Isles," and beating at their own craft those who plied it all the year, and who the rest of his time gloriously preached Christ in a pulpit only fifteen minutes from where I now stand, and ordering for his own obsequies: "Put on me my pulpit gown and bands, with my own pocket Bible in my right hand. Bury me with my mother, my father, and my grandmother. Sing also my own hymn

"Jesus thou Prince of Life!
Thy chosen cannot die;
Like thee, they conquer in the strife,
To reign with thee on high."

A PERSIAN STUDENT'S LETTER.

WE have received a letter from Mr. E. O. Eshoo, a young Oriental divinity student at Knox College, Toronto, Ont., in which he refers appreciatively to a letter sent by his fellow-countryman, Malik Yonan, to Rev. Dr. Talmage several months ago. Mr. Eshoo writes: This is my mother tongue, and I send you a true translation of my friend's letter. I am here studying with the view of going back as a missionary to my benighted countrymen."

Mr. Eshoo then gives the following beautiful and accurate translation of Malik Yonan's letter, the original of which has already appeared in these columns:

"Guctapa Oroomah, Persia.

Rev. Dr. Talmage, Dear Sir:—A few months ago it was written in one of the American missionary papers that you were going to build your church, and asking from all those who read your sermons to give a helping hand for this purpose. I am one reader of your sermons; occasionally I receive them, but not regularly. Your influence upon my heart is so great that I cannot rest if I do not send a small portion from my poorness. I send two tomas ($3.00), notwithstanding it is a small quantity, but I hope it will be accepted as the two mites of the widow, may be it will be a single brick in the building, or a seat for some one to sit on in my place; I cannot pay my debt to America for its missionaries and liberal money and education which has been given to me and to my people.

"I hope you will believe me, there has not passed a single day in which I do not mention your name in my prayers.

"God reward your labor. When I read your sermons it seems to me I am sitting in the church hearing you from the pulpit. They have been a great help to me, probably I have translated about twenty of your sermons into Syriac. Your sermon on 'The Sun and its Surroundings,' I read in the Nestorian Church. The sermon on 'The Marriage in Cana,' I read at the wedding of my son, for the guests.

"I remember one of your words and it seemed right to me. You said: 'The world will be restored to Christ by sermons in the papers.' I believe this, because they are so helpful to me, and why not the world. It seems to me you do not look like an Occidental, but Oriental. A good many thoughts in your sermons are found in ancient MSS. of Syrians. I consider you as God's ambassador to reconcile the perishing world to its Creator through Christ. I will not see you here, but I hope we will meet and embrace and kiss each other with the holy kiss, then both of us together bow down and worship Christ in heaven.

Malik Yonan."

Concerning Mr. Eshoo, Mr. C. H. Lowry of Knox College writes that he is held in the highest esteem by the students, as a devout and exemplary young man, with an earnest desire to serve Christ and his fellowmen.

REBUILDING THE TEMPLE.

S. S. Lesson For Feb. 19. Neh. 4: 9-23. Golden Text, Neh. 4: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HAVING made out his plans, first with God and then with the king, Nehemiah set out on his journey, armed with a double authority: he was in the first place, sent of God, and in the second place, authorized by the king. Thus prepared, he was ready for all the difficulties which he might have to encounter. When a child of God ventures into a new day without having thus got all square with God, and all right with man, it is no wonder if he should encounter enemies too strong for him, and find himself nonplussed at every turn. "All these things are against me," is written on the features of every child of God who does not walk in habitual oneness with him. Nehemiah encountered the enemies of God and of his people, Sanballat and Tobiah, before he had met with any of his countrymen, and he saw well how the land lay, and what he had to expect from them. But a man who walks with God can never forget that "greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world." Nehemiah did not at once, in the warmth of his zeal, tell out all that had taken place between him and his God, and between him and the king; he took three days of quiet first.

"I arose in the night," says Nehemiah, "I and some few men with me (only those who could be trusted); neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem." It was not yet ripe. Nehemiah had given himself time to take in the whole situation alone with his God, the moment came when he spoke to the people, and told them of the good hand of his God upon him, and there was an immediate response; they answered: "Let us rise up and build. So they strengthened their hands for this good work." Of course the enemies of God began to busy themselves, and God Permitted it.

Why? Because the exercise of faith, obedience, and patience must ever accompany any work we do for God. Like tools which need sharpening, we need this friction with those who do not understand, and who seek to hinder us. And God thus provides that there may be a reality in our own life with him, which will tell in our work. To the mockery of Sanballat, Tobiah and Geshem, Nehemiah answered with all the dignity of a man who has made sure of his way with God: "The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we, his servants will arise and build; but ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem." (Neh. 2: 20.) It is wonderful how much God can do, and will do, through one man who is wholly yielded up to him, and trusts him; a man who lives a life hid with Christ in God out of which comes power with God and with men. Had Nehemiah attempted to do by personal influence or persuasion what God did by him, it is probable that few among the people in Jerusalem would have hearkened to him, and very probably, there might have been a party in Jerusalem in his favor, and a party against him. But, led of God who prepares all the work for those who have learned to wait on him, all the day things go well.

The high priest was the first to arise and build. This was a conquest made by God. How natural it would have been for Eliashib to say: "Who is this man that comes from a distance to teach us? Let him return from whence he came, we need none such, we have our priests and Levites." But God had gone before his servant, and won the high priest's heart, and a general movement took place among the people, each taking his part in the work; some more, some less. The great ones were most in fault; among the Tekoites, "their nobles put not their necks to the work of the Lord;" not many noble are called. Earthly nobility dies before heaven's nobility; that which is great in itself must come down before God; eternal greatness takes possesson.

The work went forward, and, as is always the case, where God is at work, the enemy also is most active. Sanballat, on hearing that the wall of Jerusalem was really in course of construction, "was wroth, and took great indignation." First his enmity took the form of Mockery.

He spake before his brethren, and the army of Samaria, and said: "What do these feeble Jews? will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stone out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned? And Tobiah who seems to have been a kind of satellite of Sanballat added: "Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall." Feeble Jews! Yes: truly feeble in themselves, but neither Sanballat nor Tobiah had taken into account the Almighty God who was on their side.

There are many even of God's children, who suffer more, and are more hurt by words such as these, than by almost any other kind of trial. Their self esteem is wounded: the words rankle in their hearts, and they go though bitter disappointment that they are not more appreciated. Nehemiah did not so much as take notice of the insults of Sanballat and his companions, which were, no doubt, reported to him by many busy tongues. He turned to his God as the compass to the pole, and said: "Hear, O our God, for we are despised." The presence of God takes out all the sting from the bitter words of men. In his presence we see how nothing can happen without him, and all is seen in its relation to him; men are but instruments permitted by him; and what he permits, we can permit. No attempt to defend or to justify themselves was so much as thought of by Nehemiah and his helpers. Doubtless Sanballat had counted on hindering the work and taking up their time, by goading them to defend or justify themselves. But men who have to do with their God can afford to let the words of men go unswered, and their reproaches go past unnoticed. "So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof; for the people had a mind to work." Things were becoming too serious now for their enemies to content themselves with merely mocking the Jews—one half of the wall was already up and the breaches began to be stopped; the "feeble Jews" were seen to be a power.

God is building his temple of living stones. The enemy of souls does all he can to hinder. Mockery, misunderstanding on the part of our worldly relatives, and far more our worldly fellow Christians, are the methods he often uses. Unity in the Lord is a justification to which Satan has no key. When the breaches begin to be filled up and the wall begins to arise which stops his access then he summons his forces and declares open war. The enemies of Judah now "conspired all of them together to come to fight against Jerusalem and to hinder it. "Nevertheless we made our prayer unto God." It was the habit of Nehemiah's life; everything drove him to his God. At the same time they "set a watch against their enemies night and day."

The people began to show signs of weariness; this was far more dangerous than any enmity from without. The burden-bearers failed, and there was yet "much to do"; and, just at this very moment, the adversaries were more persistent than ever, and said: "They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease." There are moments in the lives of all of us when troubles seem to come in a mass; one thing upon another and it seems as though we could not go a step farther. Ten times the report reached Nehemiah that from all places the enemies would be upon them; what would he do now? Still in the presence of God he was unmoved; and he armed the people. Then he "looked and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people. "Be not ye afraid of them; remember the Lord, who is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses." While God lived, all was possible to his servant; he counted upon God, he who suffered him to be tried stood at his right hand to sustain him.

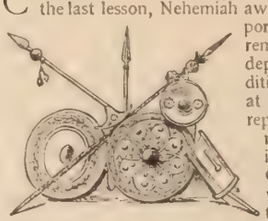
The enemies became aware that their tactics were discovered, or as Nehemiah puts it: "God had brought their counsel to nought," and thus he removed the hindrance and his people "returned to the wall, every one unto his work." There was only this difference that less strength was given to the work and more strength was spent in watchfulness. While one-half were at work, the other half held the weapons. This is God's order, that while some are in active work others should pray for them. Only those who are actively engaged in direct spiritual work, know the power which lies in a band of praying helpers, and what an untold blessing it is to those helpers thus to set forward the work of God. The builders did not work with their own full strength; with one hand they "held a weapon." This is God's way. A man, girded with the Word, "the sword of the Spirit," is a mighty man, even if he only does half the work which another does, who knows less how to handle his "sword."

One more thing was necessary; it was unity. "The work is great and large, we are separated upon the wall; one far from another. In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us." His children must gather together where there is danger, but he must do the fighting and deal with every enemy. It is only in this blessed attitude of dealing continually with God that the wall of God's spiritual Jerusalem, his Church, will be built, and his people made ready for his coming.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

CALLING on God for help, as described in the last lesson, Nehemiah awaited an opportunity of remedying the deplorable condition of affairs at Jerusalem, a report of which reached him in the month Chisleu (November), of the twentieth year (B. C. 445), of the king's reign. In the month Nisan, (March–April), about four months later, he was again on duty in the palace. In the interval, the trouble had oppressed him and his face showed signs of his distress. The king noticed it and asked the cause. Then Nehemiah, with a silent prayer for help, explained the situation, and boldly asked to be appointed governor of Jerusalem, with full powers to call upon other governors for help, in rebuilding the walls of the city. The king granted his request and Nehemiah escorted by a guard of soldiery, set out at once. His reception appears to have been a cold one. Two men especially, Nehemiah mentions as regretting his arrival—Sanballat and Tobiah. They probably thought him an officious meddlesome person, who should be hindered rather than helped. Nehemiah went on and surveyed the ground. Before informing the Jews of his object or announcing his powers, he made a night tour around the city to see for himself what must be done. Then he formed his plans and, calling the chiefs together, told them of his commission and received their assurance of co-operation. The project was greeted with ridicule, and Nehemiah makes a note of the taunts of his two chief enemies. Tobiah, it seems, thought the Jews could not build the wall. If they did build, it would be so weak that a fox could knock it down. But the wall went up and the enemy took a new view of the work and combined to attack it. This week the lesson describes Nehemiah's mode of defence.



ANCIENT SHIELDS AND SPEARS.

We made our prayer . . . and set a watch. Prayer should never be a substitute for effort. The old fable tells that a wagoner knelt and prayed to Jupiter to get his wagon out of the mire and Jupiter appearing in the clouds bade him cease praying and put his shoulder to the wheel. Two physicians were engaged in a critical operation and it looked as if the patient would die. One of them lost his nerve and believing there was no hope of saving the patient by human means went into the next room to pray. "Where is Dr. ——?" asked the other physician presently. "He is praying in the next room," was the reply. "Praying!" exclaimed the irate physician, "Go and tell him to come here and help me and do his praying where he can be of some use." A man who had fallen under the power of the liquor habit went to his minister and besought him to pray for him. "This is a case for fasting as well as prayer," replied the minister. "Now I will pray if you will fast." But the man objected to fasting, especially fasting from the wine-cup. The minister assured him that both fasting and prayer were necessary in the circumstances and knowing his man, refused to pray for him under any other conditions.

Spurgeon used to relate an incident which occurred in his early ministry. A poor man with a large family broke his leg and as he would be confined to his house for some time and therefore without the means of grace the members of the church agreed to hold a prayer-meeting in the room. Soon after Deacon Brown had opened the meeting there was a knock at the door. A boy stood there asking to see the Deacon. "Father could not come to the meeting," said the boy when the Deacon came, "but he has sent his prayers in the cart." Looking into the cart the Deacon saw a bag of potatoes, a ham, a joint of beef and a sack of flour. The hint was taken and after prayers had been offered, more prayers came like those that had come in the cart.

But as prayer should not be unaccompanied by effort, neither should effort be without prayer. In one of his lectnres Dr. Hodge recalled an incident of his student days which illustrates this. He said: "It was my inestimable privilege as a boy to be a student of that great Christian philosopher, Professor Joseph Henry. I was his assistant in the laboratory when he made the series of experiments which established the possibility of the electric telegraph. He was a very reverent man. I shall never forget how when he had completed his arrangements, and the moment had arrived when he would put nature to her crucial test, he bowed his uncovered head and said, "I have asked God a question; let us await his answer."

'Be not afraid of them, remember the Lord. The people were weak and they needed some inspiring thought or they might have lost courage, believing that they must be beaten. This was the thought that Nehemiah gave them, that the Lord was on their side. The Lord is still on the side of his people, and they dare many things in the conviction that God will work for them. A woman wanted the use of a school-house for a Sunday School. The man to whom she had to apply was a noted opponent of the Gospel. Before going to him, she asked God that she might have the house. She then asked the man, and he said: "No! The school-house was built for secular learning, and we want none of your Bible nonsense." "Well," said the woman. "I didn't ask you first: I asked a higher one than you, and I believe I shall get what I want, because I mean to pray for it until I do; for, do you know that when I pray with all my heart, there is something that always gives way? Sometimes it is a man's health, sometimes his life, but always something, and I am certain when I get the full strain of prayer on, something will snap." And something did snap. The man couldn't get the matter of the woman's praying out of his mind, and he sent word to her that she might have the house.

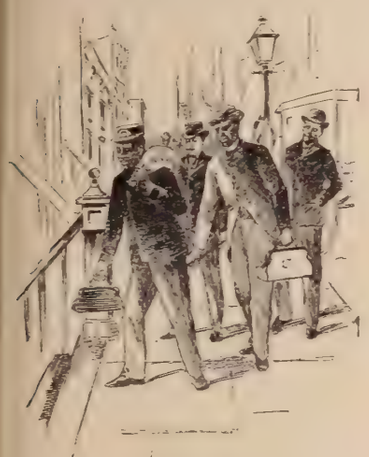
Fight for your brethren. The reply of Prince Wolfgang of Anhault to Dr. Eck, when the latter was expostulating with him for defending Luther and mixing himself up in quarrels, in which, as Eck pointed out to him, he was not directly concerned, is an example to every Christian. "In my time," said the Prince, "I have broken many a lance in the cause of my friends, and I love my Lord Jesus well enough to do as much for him; he is worthy of it."

God brought their counsel to nought. Nehemiah takes not credit to himself. The enemy thought to take him by surprise, but word was brought him ten times, of a projected attack, and he was prepared and repulsed it. He acknowledges that the deliverance was due to God's care. It is so, often, in life. The Christian man does not always know why certain things happen to him, but it may be because God saw that he was in danger, and was arranging for his protection. During the Crimean war, when the English army was face to face with the enemy, and it seemed necessary that every man should be doing his utmost in that direction, Lord Raglan, the commander-in-chief, suddenly ordered a flank movement. The officers gave the orders as they were bidden, but they thought it was a mistake. They soon realized the wisdom of the movement. Lord Raglan could see, what they could not, that a regiment of Russians had made a circuit, and were creeping around to assail the English on the flank, and he made the change to meet the movement.

GRATEFUL VETERANS!

The Christian Herald" Check-Cashing Bureau again Helping the Old Soldiers—Result of a Year's Experiment.

A YEAR has passed since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, touched by the pitiful condition of the thousands of army pensioners in New York and vicinity, decided to render them such aid as it could in their struggle against the debasing influence of the rum-shops, which reaped a harvest from their necessities every "quarter day." For many years past, the vicinity of the United States Pension Office, on Canal Street, New York, during the payment of pensions, has presented a scene calculated to arouse the indignation as well as the sympathy of Christian men and women. At the beginning of every quarter, the government pensions are paid to the veterans in different cities throughout the country. In New York, the largest of the pension-paying offices, between 12,000 and 14,000 checks are issued each quarter by Col. Frank C. Loveland, the Pension Agent, very many being sent to the pensioners by mail. There are, however, thousands who call for their checks in person, and these are chiefly people; who, being necessitous, and having no resources of their own, are compelled to convert the government checks into cash as soon as received. In all the cities where pension offices are located—Columbus, Indianapolis, Topeka, Boston, Philadelphia, and New York—the agencies are surrounded by a number of saloons, whose proprietors looked forward to the pension days as to a prospective harvest. While payments were going on, these rum-shops were usually crowded by the old soldiers, who were attracted by the offers of the saloon-keepers to pay their checks, without subjecting them to the trouble of identification, as would be the case, had they to go to a bank. Of course, as has been already explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this act was by no means a purely disinterested one on the part of the rum-shops, for it was expected, and indeed demanded, that any soldier taking advantage of the offer, should leave a portion of his pension with the bartender in return for drinks consumed either by himself or his friends. In a majority of cases, it is hardly necessary to say that the facilities afforded by the whisky shops led to a great deal of drinking and to scenes of intoxication that were painful to the friends and well-wishers of the old soldiers, besides being a sore tax upon those who were dependent upon them for support. But even this hardship was secondary to the moral aspect of the case; for, with too many of the veterans, pension week began and closed with dissipation that was destructive to health and character, and vicious in all its influences and associations.



BRINGING MONEY FOR THE PENSIONERS.

Our readers are already familiar with the history of the new departure in the interest of sobriety and morality, at the New York Pension Office. They remember how, a year ago, the Grand Army Mission was established in the basement of the Pension Office on Canal street, by Col. H. H. Hadley and a number of other Christian gentlemen. The publisher of this journal undertook at that time to supply the funds necessary to carry out the project of cashing the pensioners' checks, for the purpose of saving them from being driven to the saloons, where both manhood and money were sacrificed. Notwithstanding the fact that during each of the three successive quarterly pension periods, in May, August and November, over two million dollars per quarter were paid out at the New York Pension Office, every check presented by the holders at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Check-cashing Bureau was promptly paid in gold, silver or National Bank bills, as the pensioner desired. Not a single veteran was turned away disappointed. The thousands who had been in the habit of cashing their checks at the numerous groggeries in the neighborhood availed themselves of the Bureau's offer of free cashing, and the result was a Waterloo for the saloons! The old soldiers went home sober and happy, with their full pension money in their pockets for the first time in many years, and thousands of humble homes, not in New York city alone, but in many different localities within the territory of the New York Pension Office, were rendered happy and thankful.

This thrice-repeated experiment necessitated the use of a very large amount of money; for the pensioners, with quick appreciation, formed in line every day, from long before dawn till after dark, in front of the paying desk of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Check-cashing Bureau. It also involved the employment of a force of skilled clerks, experienced in handling money, and of bank messengers and other help. But the result far outweighed all considerations of expenditure and labor. It was a grand moral victory, and the volume of Christian congratulation that flowed in from persons in business and official life, from army officers, from private people interested in philanthropic work, and last but not least, from the grateful pensioners themselves, showed that the efforts to emancipate the old soldiers from the grasp of the rum power, and to elevate them socially and morally, besides helping to save their money, had been abundantly successful.

The paying of pensions for the first quarter of the current year began last Saturday. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reopened its Check-cashing Bureau on the morning of the 4th inst., and all checks presented by veterans were promptly cashed. The services at the Grand Army Mission were unusually attractive. The scenes in the Mission Hall during the cashing of the checks are deeply interesting. A visit to the neighborhood of the Pension Office, during those days of payment, would do more to convince the friends of the old soldiers of the good that is realized from this special class of philanthropic work, than columns of description in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We trust the day may soon come when free Check-cashing Bureaus, under government auspices, will be established in every city where Pension Offices are now located; and that the good work begun here may be extended throughout the Union. There are surely no more deserving public servants than those who have fought and bled for their native land; and it is due to the veterans, and to the widows and orphans of their dead comrades, that this movement, looking to their present social and spiritual elevation and to their comfort in old age, should be as wide and far-reaching as were the benefits their bravery in the field secured for the nation on whose bounty they are now dependent.

MISSIONARY EXPLORATION.

THE Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has received the welcome intelligence of the return to Batanja in Africa, of Dr. Good, from his long journey of exploration. The missionary's journey was through the country north of the Campo River to the border of the Soudan above Zewondo. The exploring party consisted of Dr. Good and seven natives, who carried food and trade goods with which to purchase food on the journey. They were absent thirty-five days and marched about four hundred miles. Although exposed to no little hardship and privation, Dr. Good returned in excellent health. He is profoundly impressed with the field which opens before the missionaries in the interior—the greatness of the population, the unity of language, notwithstanding difference of dialect, the accessibility of the people and the relative healthfulness of the climate marking it as a field of large promise.

CHRIST OUR FRIEND.

CHRIST our Friend—his dear love brightens
Every path our feet may tread:
Gilds our darkest hours with sunshine,
Every grief with joy o'erspread.
In our hours of pain and suffering,
We can lean on Jesus' breast,
Hearing his sweet words of comfort,
"Come to me, I'll give you rest."

When we tread the darksome valley
There will be for us no gloom;
We'll be safe in Jesus keeping—
His dear love willl guide us home.
Home, sweet home—all suffering ended,
Rest, sweet rest—which knows no end;
Rest with him who sealed onr pardon—
Christ our Saviour—Brother—Friend!

TO RECLAIM BOY CRIMINALS.

is "Oh Lord, make us good boys, and give us big mills." Moreover no laziness in new boys will be tolerated by young capitalists who know that their own little hoard of savings will be taxed to support a member who will not work.

But now the band is playing and drums beating and we must not loiter if we would get to campus in time for military drill. The officers have acquired a new dignity from their uniforms, but no one is quite so happy as that little fellow in the red cap, running about in the breeze. He has never known a home in his life and did not know what to make of the love he has met with here, but his face has taken on a new expression and beams with new intelligence since he has learned to trust his fellow-men.

With Guidon Fluttering

On a Sunday evening we may see the boys hurrying to the Brigade meeting as the clock strikes seven; it only lasts eight minutes so they must lose no time. Attendance here is optional, but the room is crowded. A hymn is sung and then the Brother Director says, "Boys, what are we here for?" "To fight the devil." "How shall we do it?" every one present drops on his knees and prayer follows prayer in quick succession from lips that once took the name of the Lord in vain.

Let us follow them now into the chapel; the room is old and low and the hearty singing threatens the ceiling; the reading of the Bible shows that it is a familiar book. Here all the inhabitants of the Farm meet together twice a day and learn those simple lessons of the Gospel by which their daily life is guided. Here all cases of discipline are disposed of, and cases for council are decided by vote. Here on are read the letters of those boys who have been honorably discharged, and who send back warm and affectionate messages along with the news of their own welfare.

"Greeting Sunday"

Here on Mission Sunday are offered the mills that must be "mites" of great value in the Saviour's eyes.

And here are made those vows of consecration that mean so great a change from the past, and so much of hope for the future. Like the daisies that grow by the dusty path, these boys have risen above the darkness of earth and are lifting their faces heavenward in fearless purity.

Surely the guardian angels are bending as low over this Canaan as over the promised land of old, and "their angels that do always behold the face of our Father" must lift their heads and smile once more as they see the "clouds of glory" brighter day by day as these young disciples put on the Lord Jesus Christ.

And all this work is steadily, patiently carried on with fortitude and self-sacrifice by a band of unpaid

Christian Young Men who are in training for institutional life. They are of various religious denominations, Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, Presbyterian, Episcopal and Dutch Reformed. They remain under training for three years and six months, receiving only their board and clothes, and scant clothing at that, and five dollars a month in fees, which is often in a month's arrears because of the pressure to take more boys. These brothers are not always as fully clothed or fully fed as they should be, but there is no complaint, but a cheerful daily and hourly willingness to do God's service. At the brief chapel service in the morning and evening and at midday service, when they kneel by themselves in the Brothers' Room, there are very precious Draughts of Spiritual Nourishment.

Few foreign missionaries furnish stronger instances of self-effacement for the glory of God. Every week all the money is spent that is given, and every week there is the same outlook of faith for more money. The brothers live in an atmosphere of expectant confidence in the promises of God. The Brotherhood is grown now into a Sisterhood as well, and both have taken the name of the Order of St. Christopher, finding in the legend of the Saint an outline of the motive upon which they shape their lives. The one prayer of the Brothers is for more helpers and larger opportunity to save the boys that are pressing to the doors of the Burnham Industrial Farm.

On the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a portrait of Mr. Round, the founder of the Industrial Farm, through whose indomitable Christian perseverence and faith the project has been carried out successfully. Another illustration shows a huge boulder known as "Record Rock," with a group of the boys clustered on and around it. They are in working dress. On this page is a picture of Sister Dora's cottage (intended for hospital purposes), with the pretty lawn and duck-pond in front—a most attractive spot in summer time. Altogether, the life led by the boys at the Industrial Farm, is one well calculated to develop their moral and physical natures and to mould them into good citizens and good Christians as well.

SISTER DORA'S COTTAGE AT THE BURNHAM INDUSTRIAL FARM.

The need of such an institution as the Burnham Industrial Farm is emphasized by the statement of Mr. Round that there are at the present moment over three hundred applications on file from boys who ought to be taken immediately, but who cannot be adopted into the family group at Canaan Four Corners, because of the lack of funds for their support. The enterprise is a Christian work of the most direct and practical kind, and in gathering in and helping onward those young souls, who were drifting like waifs on a dangerous sea, full of currents leading to moral shipwreck and physical ruin as well, its conductors are only striving to merit the approbation of Him who from a heart overflowing with love for all humanity said: "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

LIEUT. TOTTEN'S NEW DEPARTURE.

Lieut. Totten has resigned his commission in the United States Army in order to devote the whole of his time to the study of Prophecy aud the solution of Chronological problems connected with Bible History. He believes that he can render no better service to the Church of Christ than to use his scientific knowledge in vindicating the absolute accuracy of the Bible against the attacks of the "Higher Critics."

THE SIXTH OF THE SEVEN SEALS.

The Culminating Scene of the Progressive Times of Trouble and Persecution.

BY REV. M. BAXTER.*

THE first of the prophetic visions in the Book of Revelation is the symbolic series of the Seven Seals, which, in their historic fulfilment throughout this Gentile dispensation, furnish a pictorial and dramatic history of the Christian Church Militant from the first to the second advent of Christ, as revealed in the 4th, 5th and 6th chapters of Revelation.

The Seven-sealed Book of Life, in which are written the names of all who are redeemed by the blood of Christ, is first of all delivered by God the Father to the Lord Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God, who forthwith proceeds to break open, one by one, the seven seals, with which it is fastened. Certain events are described as transpiring at the successive opening of each seal, until at last, when the seventh seal is opened and the Second Advent of Christ takes place, the Lamb's Book of Life becomes unfastened, so that the full list of the names of "such as shall be saved" becomes open to inspection, and it is found to contain, written within it before the foundation of the world, a complete register and muster-roll of all the true soldiers of Jesus Christ.

While the prophetic series of the Seven Seals describes the history and future of the Christian Church during the years from the first to the second advent of Christ, the prophetic series of the Seven Trumpets (which is an entirely new prophetic vision, and quite distinct from the Seven Seals) describes the history of the nations of Cæsar's Roman Empire, and of the Divine judgments inflicted on it during the same period. Thus the series of the Seven Seals and the Seven Trumpets run in parallel streams of co-ordinate fulfilment, side by side; while the former relate more to spiritual and ecclesiastical affairs, the latter are more descriptive of temporal and political events.

The first Four Seals are symbolic prefigurations of the successive stages of the visible professing Christian Church from Primitive Purity as a white horse under the First Seal—A.D. 39 to 324, to a state of internal discord and sanguinary strife as a red horse under the Second Seal—324 to 566; then to a condition of spiritual famine and dark superstition as a black horse under the Third Seal—566 to 1095; then as a death-dealing crusading Church—the ghastly pale horse under the Fourth Seal, from the first crusade in 1095 to the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1592, when the Cry of the Martyrs is raised at the beginning of the Fifth Seal; and that cry is at last answered by the Judgments and Convulsions of the French Revolutionary Epoch from 1789 to 1815 with an ensuing interval of comparative respite from 1815 to 1896 under the Sixth Seal. Then the Seventh Seal apparently consists of the literal-day fulfilment of the Seven Trumpets apparently from 1896 to 1901.

The Sixth Seal opened with the retributive convulsions of the French Revolution, premonitory of the day of vengeance: and then from 1815, an interval of general peace and withholding of the winds of desolation, until the sealing of the 144,000 watchful Christians is finished, and they are translated to heaven before the final great tribulation.

The dreadful commotions of the French Revolution of 1705 to 1815 are clearly symbolized by the great earthquake and convulsions figuratively depicted in Rev. 4: 12-17. Then succeeds a remarkable interval of peace and quiescence, while 144,000 mystical Israelites are being sealed in order to escape the final judgments. Our present position is in this parenthetical interval of the holding back of the four winds of desolation between 1815 and the years following, while the sealing of God's servants is being finished. The eminent Rev. Edward Bickersteth, in his "Divine Warning," in 1840, fully expresses this view; he says: "It appears to me, we have seen the events pointed out at the beginning of the Sixth Seal where is set before us the figurative description of the French Revolution of 1792, and we are at the period of withholding of the four winds.

"The more the outward peace abounds, the more is the faithful watchman called upon to sound the trumpet of alarm: and to show distinctly on what false foundations the hope of continued peace and tranquillity rests. We are assured that this will be the state of the world before the last and greatest of all its [illegible]

HINDRANCES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Feb. 19 Nehemiah 4: 9; Phil 4: 13.

TO the weak band of Jews engaged in the great work surrounded by foes, Nehemiah gave the same direction as Christ gave to the little group of his disciples, who were to carry the Gospel to the nations—the injunction to watch and pray. There is nothing of Oriental fatalism in Christianity. Constant vigilance, ceaseless effort, dauntless valor are required of the soldier of Jesus Christ, but his supreme trust must be in the power that comes from God through faith and prayer. He is endowed with might, not that he may remain idle, secure in its possession, but that he may go forth to conquer. No man can draw the line between divine sovereignty and human responsibility, but there is no difficulty in defining the duty. We are to go forward as the Israelites went to the verge of the waters, proving our confidence in God's power and promise, but doing our part, without which God will not do his. Not to the passive Christian does the blessing come, but to him who by patient continuance in well-doing goes about the Lord's work. It has ever been God's way of dealing with men. Naaman must wash seven times in Jordan before God heals him. The man with the withered hand must try to stretch it forth before he is conscious of the power Christ is waiting to give him. The women did not stay away from the sepulchre lamenting that the stone was before the entrance; they went, and behold, the stone was rolled away. "Can faith save him?" James scorntully asks. No, it is Christ who saves, but he will not save without faith. All things are possible to him that believeth. Faith is the first step in the Christian life and it must be continued all through. We learn its power every time it is exercised, but we never learn its limit. Every hindrance, every obstacle we must meet in the same way. Confidence in the power of God to remove it and a conviction that the power will be used through us combine in the motive power. "God will convert the heathen without your help or mine," said an aged minister when the proposal to preach the Gospel to the heathen was first made. But the remark showed a lack of knowledge of God's methods. The power was there all along, but not until men went forth relying upon it was it exercised. The power is in the earthen vessel. Whether the hindrance be within in the shape of some hereditary taint, or in some habit that holds with a giant grip; or whether it be without in the ridicule and opposition of people around, the method must be the same. The overcoming power is earnest prayer joined with persistent effort. The obstacle may seem insurmountable and the means employed inadequate but when the power of God is counted upon there is nothing that can withstand it.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF BANGOR, ME.

FEW associations in the country have entered on the possession of so beautiful and commodious a building as that a picture of which appears on this page, under so happy a combination of circumstances as those attending its recent dedication. The treasurer had the pleasure of announcing that there was not a dollar of indebtedness on the building and that three thousand dollars were in the treasury available for unforeseen expenses. Hearty congratulations are due the Bangor Association and best wishes for its continued and growing prosperity.

The Association was organized twelve years ago in comparatively small and inconvenient quarters. It grew rapidly and its usefulness was proved in many ways. The project of building was soon discussed but the Association wisely determined not to build until it could have a really suitable building centrally located. A large sum would be necessary for the purpose and a beginning was made. In December, 1884, the Ladies' Auxiliary contributed $1100, the proceeds of a Fair. No special effort followed this handsome beginning for a time, but the project was not forgotten and small sums were given now and again to swell the fund. One of these was a dollar that bore fruit. It came from a poor man in the city hospital to whom it had been given by some kindly visitor with the wish that he use it in the way he best liked. He sent it toward the building fund. The fact was mentioned in the local journals and was read by a gentleman who was touched by the generous gift of the sick man and wrote that he would give $500 to the same cause. Then the ladies had another fair which netted $2000 and to the total in hand a gentleman added $1000. With about $5000 in hand the Association felt encouraged to proceed. A committee was appointed and a regular canvass instituted. A lot was purchased but it was found to be unsuitable and after holding it for some months the Association re-sold it, making profit on the transaction of about fifteen hundred dollars. A second lot in a better situation was purchased for $10,000 and the preparations for the work of building went forward. In the meantime the fund had been increased by several large and many small donations and before a stone was laid it amounted $35,000. The whole of this sum and $18,000 additional was expended before the building was completed and furnished. It was determined to make another supreme effort to raise the whole amount before dedication. The ladies held another fair and raised over $3000 bringing up their total contributions since the initiation of the project to the sum of $7,515. Several gentlemen of the city promised $10,000 and the small balance was quickly collected. Thus, after eight years' work, the Association takes possession of its handsome home unfettered by any burden of debt and ready for energetic vigorous effort for the realization of its aims.

A KING'S DAUGHTERS' PROTEGEE IN JAPAN.

A QUAINT letter, expressing with evident sincerity the writer's longing after spiritual attainment, came recently from a Japanese young lady in whom a circle of King's daughters had become interested. The circle is "The Twinkling Stars" circle of Chatham, Ont., Canada. Having heard from a Canadian missionary in Japan the story of some of the converts, letters of Christian love and encouragement were sent to them. Recently replies have been received, showing that the Japanese girls appreciated the kindliness of their far-off sisters. One of the letters runs as follows:

HAKODATE, JAPAN, June 13th, 1891.

My dear friends: I will mention now about the thought which I had during last month. I am not quick to do anything either study or work, as others are. Thus I am slow in performing all things especially in doing goodness, that I feel strange myself. But instead of my slowness in doing these things, I am very quick to get angry. From my childhood I was often reproved by parents about it, but I could not stop it entirely. Last month I thought over these two things seriously. I determined that I will do goodness promptly even it is very little henceforth instead of my quickness of anger and not to get angry quickly, but be slow to anger. It is not hard for me to stop to do wrong things, but it is much harder to do good. But I believe God does not command us that we cannot do, only he gives us work that we can do. Of course we, human beings, are weak in heart, therefore we cannot do with only our might, we must need God's helps by fervent prayers, so I am praying always for his help. From your truly friend, ZUNA NOTOYA.

Beside sending theses letters to Japan the same circle has been active in collecting cast-off garments which after repairing and renovating were given to poor old women. The circle has also rendered the help that only good and tender hearted women can render to the fallen girls that Captain Kenton has rescued in the Social Reform work of the Salvation Army. We congratulate the "Twinkliug Stars" of Chatham on the excellenee of their aims and on their success.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

ONE of the most useful services rendered by the Epworth League and other young people's societies is that of taking charge of a church service in the absence of the pastor. On a recent Sunday evening, the Campbell Chapter of Cleveland, O., held a most delightful service. The short, bright addresses and earnest prayers of the members made a varied and deeply interesting programme which was thoroughly enjoyed by the large congregation.—The District Convention of Des Moines, Iowa, was recently held in Asbury Church. An important feature of the work in this District has been the holding of special meetings to supplement revival services. This work has been very useful. The young converts are gathered in and cheered and encouraged in beginning the Christian life. Evangelists will be pleased to hear of the League looking after this matter, for they are sadly conscious that when they leave a church there is a danger of the souls they have been the means of winning lacking food suitable for them. The sunrise prayer-meeting of the Convention attracted a large attendance and at every session the enthusiasm and devotion of the Leaguers was evident. The reports all indicated vigorous life and activity.—The League at Greenfield, Ill., is giving special attention to the literary and social side of its life. Beside the regular prayer-meeting and Bible study, a meeting is held every alternate week at the house of each member in rotation to listen to a paper on some literary topic and to social intercourse.—The church at South Bend, Ind., has set an example which should be followed wherever practicable. It is that of dedicating one of its rooms to League work as Epworth Headquarters. In this case the League promptly put in a bookcase and began the collection of a library. Denominational periodicals are contributed by various members and now every Leaguer feels that he has a place where he has a right to go and spend a profitable evening. The advantages of this convenience are more real than is generally realized. This is a hint to the churches. Helping the League, helps themselves.

TWILIGHT BELLS.

THERE has come to my mind a legend,
A thing I have long forgot,
And whether I read it or dreamed it,
Ah, well, it mattered not.
It is said that in heaven at twilight
A great bell softly swings,
And man may listen and hearken
To the wonderful music that rings.

If he puts from his heart's inner chamber
All the passion, pain and strife,
Heartache and weary longing,
That throb in the pulses of life—
If he thrusts from his soul all hatred,
All thoughts of wicked things,
He can hear in the holy twilight
How the bell of the angels rings.

And I think there is in this legend,
If we open our eyes to see,
Somewhat of an inner meaning,
My friend, to you and me.
Let us look in our hearts and question,
Can pure thoughts enter in
To a soul if it be already
The dwelling of thoughts of sin?

So then let us ponder a little;
Let us look in our hearts and see
If the twilight bells of the angels
Could ring for us—you and me.

THE TRAINING OF A PRINCESS.

How the Girlhood of Roumania's Future Queen was Passed—The Home at Clarence House—Years of Study and their Result.

PRINCESS MARIE of Edinburgh, the granddaughter of aged Queen Victoria, and who has just been married in her seventeenth year to the future king of Roumania, received a training in some respects not unlike that of many American girls. Her earliest childhood was spent alternately at Eastwell Park in Kent, England, and at Clarence House, the London residence of her parents, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh. She has had the advantage of foreign travel, too, having at different times visited Malta on the Mediterranean, (the ancient Melita mentioned in Paul's narrative), Neuwied on the Rhine and Coburg, at which latter place many of her relatives live.

As a girl, she was, like all the English princesses, taught by private tutors and it is recorded that she was a diligent pupil and gave close attention to her studies. She was brought up with the greatest simplicity, and her dress, like that of her sisters, was always of the plainest material; indeed, except on fete days, the children were not permitted to wear finery of any sort. Owing, no doubt, in part to her Russian descent the princess, like her mother the Duchess of Edinburgh, is an exceedingly good linguist, and possesses the gift of tongues in a marked degree. Her education, for many years conducted under the able care of Frau Rolfs, has resulted in her being one of the most accomplished girls in England. She has established for herself a lofty ideal and has gained the love and respect of all who know her. She has a singularly attractive face and a sweet and winning manner, and her gentleness and quiet dignity have fitted her to enter public life even at an unusually early age. Marie has always been fond of painting, and many of her productions have been sold at bazaars and sales of work for charitable institutions, both in England and in Coburg. Her father has encouraged his daughters to take abundant physical exercise, and the young girls were fond of riding. While at Malta they were frequently to be seen galloping and racing on their ponies.

Clarence House, where some of her happiest years have been passed, is a large, homelike building in the English metropolis. The favorite room of the sisters, (which is shown in the illustration on this page), might be duplicated in many an American home with no princely pretensions. Here they studied together, sang together, or chatted in French, Russian or Italian with Mlle Heim or Fraulein von Truchsess, two of their favorite teachers, selecting the most familiar topics for the language exercise. Ruby, Fearless and Little Tommy, the pet ponies of the three girls, were not infrequently the subjects of those conversational lessons, and many amusing adventures with the playful equine pets were related to the governesses by Marie, and her sisters Victoria and Alexandra. They would tell how they had ridden on the quay at Malta and how the naval and military officers petted the ponies; or how they had a Christmas tree at the Governor's pretty palace in San Antonio, whose load of gifts was distributed among the poor children. If they happened to be in Malta during the orange season, each girl usually had a tree, which she tended with her own hands and the fruit of which belonged to herself.

Notwithstanding exalted station, princesses in civilized countries nowadays enjoy fewer opportunities for amusement than many girls in plainer homes than palaces. It is expected of them that when they reach young womanhood, they will prove their claim to superior station by a variety of accomplishments, the acquirement of which demands many years of patient and laborious study. They must excel not only in the ordinary branches, but in many others which to the average mother, might seem superfluous for a daughter. This intellectual training is probably more severe in the case of girls than of boys in royal households. Indeed, it has been asserted that the brainiest part of royalty in the old world to-day is found in womanhood.

A Child's Confidence.

I WAS in a crowded depot not long ago, remarks a contributor to the Occident. A dozen trains were on their respective tracks. Hundreds of passengers were jostling each other in their haste to get tickets or baggage-checks. Everybody was moving, pushing hurrying, worrying. But in one corner of the ladies'-room sat a little girl looking calmly on that scene of confusion. I said to her, "Why are you so quiet, my child? Have you reached the end of your journey?" "Oh, no," she replied, "we are going away down into Texas, but father told me to sit here while he attended to the tickets and the baggage." If that child had not trusted her father she would have been running to and fro, adding to the confusion, and to his anxiety. By her quiteness she showed her faith. To sit still and wait was the wisest thing that she could do. And it is so often with us. Our heavenly Father cares for us. He will attend to the tickets and baggage. He will make all things work together for good to them that love him. And if we love him we must trust him.

Chasing Happiness.

THERE are many ways of hunting for happiness, but the way to find it is very simple. Rev. G. R. Robbins, writes: "A friend of mine says that while riding along the beautiful slope of the Orange Mountain, one day he saw a little girl who was crying very bitterly. He stopped and asked her what she was crying about. It seems she was trying to catch her little dog which kept all the time running up the mountain side, just eluding her grasp. My friend said, 'Turn around, my dear child, and walk home and see if the dog will not follow you.' Well, she tried the experiment, and soon found her companion close to her heels, and the child, with face all wreathed with smiles, went leaping into the house. Boys, perchance you have been chasing happiness far enough, though you have not lived many years. Just begin this New Year by turning around and walking towards your Father's house, and happiness 'will dog your steps.' You will not be able to escape happiness."

A Bright Old Age.

DR. COULBURN, formerly Dean of Norwich, England, relates a beautiful anecdote of Dean Argles of Peterborough. "I am able to say," he writes, "with some assurance, that Dean Argles's was a bright old age. In the March of 1887, I was staying with the Dean at Barnack, and made some commonplace remark on the way in which all interests palled and staled as men grow old. 'Do you think so?' said Canon Argles with uncommon animation of manner. 'I don't agree with you. Let me show you a piece of poetry which I think quite exquisite.' He then produced the following lines which he had written out in his Prayer-book (from Browning's Ben Ezra), and which I copied out on the spot:

Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be
The last of life, for which the first was made.
Our times are in His hand
Who saith, 'A whole I planned:
Youth shows but half; trust God, see all, nor be afraid.'

"It went home to my conscience as a little sermon. For is not the moral of the verses this: that a true Christian is able, in virtue of his being a true Christian, to say of life, and the permitted enjoyments of life, what the governor of the feast said to the bridegroom in Cana of Galilee, 'Thou hast kept the good wine until now.'"

Quiet Women.

ALL women have not the same opportunities to publicly work for the cause, and some have not the gift that would command success, but each has a mission. It is not every woman who can attend Christian Conventions, either. A Western writer remarks: "We happen to know a little woman, who every evening attends a convention of well-clothed, well-fed, well-trained boys and girls, who gather at the home fireside and worship at the home altar—a happy family circle with mother for its centre. Once a week she attends a Sabbath convention, where children are taught not only to 'remember,' but also to love the Sabbath-day aud keep it holy. Now and then she attends a reform convention, where, under the sweet influence of her Christian life and example, sons and daughters, and others also, are inspired to attempt better things. There is also a workers' convention, and a young people's convention, where her presence is an inspiration and her influence is felt, even though it be only within four walls. Some day she will attend a convention of the general assembly and Church of the first-born which are written in heaven, and will be surprised, possibly, to find her sphere of work greatly enlarged by the announcement: 'Thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

A MOTHER'S CROWN.

I LATELY returned from a trying scene, writes Dr. Talmage. A sister, in midlife, with a large family of children in every possible need of her council and tenderness, and holding the responsible position of a pastor's wife, is called heavenward from as fine a sphere of usefulness as any one could possibly hold.

What her life was you may judge from her dying experiences. She said in her last moments, "It is nothing for a Christian to die. One minute here, and the next with Jesus. Oh, what a religion we have! We do immediately pass into glory. Some say that dying people have doubts, but they do not. How can they doubt with such a precious Jesus? I see him now! He encloses my children in his arms of love, and they will all be saved. I am crossing the river, but I do not fear. I will shut up my eyes now and go to sleep and wake up in glory! Good-bye!"

Her life had been in harmony with all she said. She sang more than any person I ever knew. She was always singing. I remember in my boyhood days of sometimes getting tired of this perpetual music, and of saying to her, "Mary, do stop singing!" but she would not stop. She never will stop.

Why was such a Christian sister and wife and mother transplanted? Strike a light, if you can, over this mystery. Analyze, dissect, philosophize, a thousand years, and you cannot by any human device open one shutter. But in the Gospel the sun rises. Light gradually breaks in as the morning looks through the cracks of the door and the lattice—not full day, but a promise of high noon.

Heaven must be populated. There is not so much room on the Western prairies and tablelands for more settlers as there is room in the upper country for more people. Heaven has only one want, and that is of greater population. It is sparsely inhabited yet, as compared with its future citizenship. The crowns are not half taken, nor the robes half worn. Heaven is like a house in which a levee is to be held at 10 o'clock. At 9 o'clock the rooms are all ablaze with lights, and the servants, gloved and vestured, are waiting to open the doors. The rooms of our Father's house are illuminated, and the chamberlains are ready, and the table is spread. A few have entered, but heaven is not yet fully begun. They have only sung the opening piece. Now, how shall God fill up his house except by subtracting from this world? The continent of heaven is to be peopled from the surrounding islands. Why, in almost all cases, it is the loveliest one of the family that is transported. Heaven wants the best. Why should not the great capital of the universe have the pick of everything?

The half-and-half Christians will get into glory, but they need to be kept here a good while yet for polishing. Those who are ready God takes. The earlier inhabitants of a place make the greatest impression upon its future character, and so heaven ought to have the best first.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE EVER BRIGHTENING LIGHT.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, Feb. 5, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. "But the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Prov. 4: 18.

E do not know with absolute certainty whether these are the words of David to Solomon or of Solomon directly to us. It matters little, however, what conclusion we may reach on that point; in either case they are the words of God to us. This verse lies between two verses descriptive of the conduct and condition of the wicked. In the previous verse they are represented as eating the bread of wickedness and drinking the wine of violence; and in the verse following the text their way is described as darkness and they as stumbling at they know not what. It would be difficult to find anywhere a more expressive description of the wretched condition of wicked men. It is bad enough for men to stumble when they know the nature of their stumbling-block; but this description appeals to a vivid imagination which conjures up all imaginable dangers and evils, while wicked men flounder about in the dark. Beautiful in contrast with what precedes and with what follows is the description of the just in the text. God's people are here called the "just." They are the subjects of divine grace, are created anew in Christ Jesus, in righteousness and true holiness. They have been justified by faith from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. Life is spoken of here as it so often is in Scripture, as a path. In both Testaments human life is represented as a way or path, and human conduct as walking in this way or path. In harmony with this idea we are exhorted to walk circumspectly, honestly and soberly; and, according to the same usage, walking in love and

Walking in the Light

All these various phrases indicate the course of human life. We may understand then, by the expression "the path of the just," the earthly life, the daily experience, the whole course of a Christian earthly existence. What then are the characteristics of this path as indicated in the text? In a general way we know that it is bright and beautiful, while that of the wicked is dark and dangerous; but the text allows us to go more fully into particulars.

The text teaches us, in the first place, that this path is as a shining light. We have in this complete description a remarkably fine figure. We see the sun rising in the eastern sky, whose curtains of crimson and gold are lifted to welcome his approach. No sight is more glorious than that of the sun rising and going forth in his might. The psalmist caught this beautiful idea when he described in the nineteenth psalm its brilliant advent "as a bridegroom going out of his chamber, and rejoicing as a strong man to run a race." Breezes chant their matin songs to welcome the coming of the king of day, and dewdrops like diamonds glisten on the earth's green carpet, reflecting the sun's beauty and glory in their tiny orbs. Familiarity robs this scene of its transcendent beauty, and of much of its grandeur; but all of us are conscious of its influence as often as we behold the wonderful [illegible] heathen nations worshipped the god of day; we need not wonder that even now men turn with wonder and with an admiration akin to reverence to the light-giving sun as he moves [illegible]

The figure in the text, however, is not limited to the rising of the sun; it contemplates this dazzling orb as still climbing the heavens in [illegible] noon-day hour, and the continuous march to [illegible] queror marching in regal glory. The figure ends with the perfected day, and does not include the sun's descent along the western sky. It leaves us in the full and blinding glory of the sun's noonday brilliancy. The thought is overwhelming that century after century the sun has trodden this path of splendor and glory, pouring out its burning heat, its blinding light, and its life-giving rays without weakness or weariness, without suspension or exhaustion. To such glory as this the brightness of the Christian's path is here likened. Is this statement too strong? Do our experience and observation justify this glowing figure? These questions are worthy of careful answers.

Light for the Light-Bearer.

The path of Christians is a shining light unto themselves. The day of conversion was to many a day of transformation; it was the time when the darkness of doubt and unbelief fled away, and when the glorious light of hope and joy shone with undimmed splendor on their path. Christ's uplifted countenance gave them unspeakable joy and unbroken peace. The Christian still sees his own vileness, but at the same time he sees and wears the spotless robe of Christ's righteousness. Christ is his way, his truth, his light and his life; and in him is no darkness at all. All Christians realize that the Word of God is a lamp unto their feet and a light unto their path. Believers are themselves light in the Lord; we are distinctly taught that they walk in the light even as he is in the light. They are not left long in darkness as to their duty; no willing and obedient heart is ever left long in doubt as to faith or practice. Whosoever is willing to obey Christ's law shall assuredly know Christ's doctrine. We may not have the light far ahead; but we shall have light for the next step, and when that is taken, there shall be light for the next, and the next, and so we shall move forward to the end of our course. The true Christian may always offer this prayer, so beautiful in itself and so suggestive in its origin and associations:

> Lead, kindly light! amid the encircling gloom,
> Lead thou me on;
> The night is dark, and I am far from home,
> Lead thou me on;
> Keep thou my feet; I do not ask to see
> The distant scene: one step enough for me.

The path of the Christian is, furthermore, a shining light for others. Christians are the light of the world; this great honor is given them by the Lord himself. There is a sense in which they are themselves luminous bodies shining "amid the encircling gloom." It has often been pointed out that Christians partake of some of the qualities of the known to us. The first of these bodies are the sun and the fixed stars; these have light in themselves, light inherently, light independently of other bodies. The second king of luminous bodies are the moon and the planets; they shine by reflected light. True Christians, as before suggested, resemble both these bodies. In one sense they have no inherent light, but by nature are utterly dark. Their present light is like that of the second class of luminous bodies derived not inherent; but when they are illuminated they are more than mere reflectors, for they become themselves centres of light, heat and life. They send out brilliant rays to guide others to the path of duty and joy. It is interesting and instructive to observe that Christ uses language concerning his people which he used as descriptive of himself. Of himself he said, "I am the light of the world;" and of his disciples he said, "Ye are the light of the world." We are in some measure, and it is here said with deep humility, Christ to the world. Every believer, in some sense, is Jesus Christ to souls about him who are in darkness and death. We thus represent God to this fallen and sinful world. All that many men know of God they learn of us. An inspired apostle has said, "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The blessed Master said, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Some believers are but as tallow dips, others as moulded candles, others as oil lamps, others as street gas-lamps, and still others are as electric lights of great height and of wonderful brilliancy. In the case of some, owing to intellectual attainments and social position, the light is high and bright. For many elements of our light-giving power we may not be largely responsible; but in all cases we are commanded to let our light shine whether it be large or little, and whether it be placed high or be relatively or actually low. We must cause our light to shine upon the pathway of others, that they may be led into the service of God here and into the immediate presence of God hereafter.

Two Kinds of Luminous Bodies

It thus comes to pass, that the path of Christians is a shining light to reveal the glory of God to the world. They walk along an illuminated pathway; they leave a track of light and glory behind them. They are the noblest beings on this side of heaven; they are God's illuminated, and so they embody and declare more of God's glory than all the works of God's hands God is known by his works, for no man hath seen him at any time. The visible things of God, as the apostle Paul teaches, declare the invisible things of God. All God's revelations are intended to lead up to spiritual apprehensions of himself. This is true in revelation as in creation. In revelation the prophets pointed to John the Baptist, and John the Baptist pointed to Jesus the Christ, and Jesus himself finally pointed to the Holy Spirit as the divine illuminator of darkened souls. All forms of inanimate creation proclaim God. All over this universe he has written himself in the glory of his power, in the greatness of his wisdom, and in the infiniteness of his love. This truth, the apostle Paul reminds us, even thoughtful heathen could understand and appreciate. The undevout student of nature is an inaccurate student of nature. The genuine rationalist is he who studies natural law and phenomena in the light of revealed truth and of Christian interpretation. The man who finds himself outside the light of God in the face of Jesus Christ is undeserving the title of rationalist. He is irrational in his thinking and must inevitably be illogical in his conclusions.

God's Shining Ones;

The Revealing Light.

There is an ascending scale of beings in whom God displays His glory. Living beings reveal it more fully than inanimate objects. The cattle, the fowl, and the creeping things all in their measure make known God in his creative power and in his providential wisdom. But when we come to responsible, intelligent and immortal men we rise to a much higher stage. Man is the crowning glory of God's creative wisdom; he stands king on the pedestal of creative power and of infinite wisdom. To him all beings below him may well look up to with wonder and admiration. He stands above them as made in the image of his God, and, as a possible heir of God and a joint-heir with Jesus Christ. One of the Greek names for man strictly means, the upward looking being. The more man is developed on all sides of his nature, the more of God's glory it is possible for him to diplay. In man as redeemed by Jesus Christ, as cleansed in His precious blood, and as made a candidate for heaven, we have God's grandest, and divinest manifestation of himself.

We are clearly taught that the church makes to the universe the greatest display of God's manifold wisdom. The church is the bride of Jesus Christ: she goes through this world with the robe of His righteousness falling in graceful folds from her shoulders, with the crown of his glory on her brow, and leaning lovingly on his arm, while she walks triumphantly by his side. Christian men and women are living epistles known and read of all men, making known God's saving power; they are trophies of his sovereign grace and eternal love; and they are to overcome Satan, and to triumph over all forms of darkness. It is not too much to say that they are the very climax of God's wonderful works, astonishing angels and silencing devils. God's children are more like God than are any other created beings. While Jesus Christ is God's Son by eternal generation, they are God's sons by adoption; by regeneration, and so they are partakers of the divine nature. Let us not hesitate to say that they are actually begotten of God, and that thus his divine life is in their souls. They stand next to Jesus Christ, who is the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person. Here and now they are the sons of God; not simply his sons by adoption, that were much, that were a marvelous attainment; but they are actually his sons by the impartation of his divine nature. Can we rise to the greatness of this Alpine peak of possibility and attainment? May we not with holy boldness dare to claim our privileges as the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty? Oh, how glorious it is to be a child of God, an heir of heaven, and a joint-heir with Jesus Christ! Let us remember, O men and women, that the world judges our Father by his children, and let us see to it as we meet to-day in his house, as we are gathered about this table, on which are spread the memorials of Christ's death, that we do not misrepresent our Heavenly Father nor dishonor our Elder Brother.

Proofs of God's Power

The Growing Light.

The second characteristic of this path is that it is an increasing light—"that shineth more and more." The Christian's life is progressive. He must never be satisfied with his present attainments; he must ever remember that there are before him loftier heights yet to be reached. The Christian's life, in another passage of Scripture, is compared to the sun when "he goeth forth." Christians also must continually advance. The apostle Paul was far from feeling that he had attained or were already perfect. The more of true grace believers possess, the more of true grace they desire to possess. They do not look back to their conversion as an evidence of their conversion. Every true believer has made vast progress since the time when he first began the Christian life. Each day Christians ought to give new proof to themselves and to others that they are the children of God. The Christian is in a lamentable condition who is looking away back through the years to the time of his conversion for the proofs of his adoption into the family of God. Such a man is to be profoundly pitied, and at the same time he is to be earnestly but kindly rebuked. Glorious as were those first experiences, they have been vastly surpassed by those of a later day. The old soldier is better than the raw recruit. The true believer knows how to watch and pray, to fight and to triumph as the young convert neither did nor could expect to know. A growing Christian ought not to sing:

> Where is the blessedness I knew
> When first I saw the Lord?
> Where is the soul-refreshing view
> Of Jesus and His word?

He ought to have gone far past the blessedness of those early experiences. It is readily granted that there is a rare tenderness, freshness and sweetness in one's first love; but it must also be emphatically affirmed that there is a ripeness, maturity and fulness in one's later love, which the early love could not possess.

All the figures of Scripture used to illustrate the progress of the Christian life, directly or indirectly emphasize

The Law of Growth.

The godly man is represented as a tree "that bringeth forth its fruit in his season." Elsewhere it is said of him, "He shall flourish like the palm tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon;" and still elsewhere he is represented as growing as the vine and the lily. The simile of a race that is often used in this connection implies continuous progress. So do all these architectural images, which speak of foundations and building thereon. Growth is important, because it affects our conditions hereafter as well as here. Nothing is more certain than that there are degrees in glory as in suffering; nothing is more certain than that "one star differeth from another star in glory." Amongst the saved there are those who were brought in at the eleventh hour, those that are barely saved; but to others there is given an abundant entrance among the shining hosts of heaven.

Except there be growth in the Christian life the most conclusive evidence of the existence of Christian life is wanting. Let this test be carefully applied to all our experiences at this moment. Let us revert once more to the figure which underlies the text of this morning our path is to be as the light that shineth more and more. This figure suggests the gradual increase of the light occasioned by the sun's rays according to the laws of atmospheric reflection. Do you know that you love God his word, his house, his altar, his services better than you did a month ago? Let me press this question home upon heart and conscience this morning. If you are not advancing you are retrograding. It is absolutely impossible to remain long stationary. In traveling in the Christian path a believer is like a man on a bicycle—he must go on or very soon go off Let the heart just now be honest with itself in making a comparison in this practical way between the attainments of to-day and those of a month ago. Growth in the Christian life must follow the laws of growth everywhere A plant in a dark cellar must either die or live a poor, feeble and dying life. It needs light; it needs sunshine. If you live in the dark cellar of your own nature you will grow more and more feeble, until spiritual death succeeds to the long absence of spiritual life and power. If you live in the shadows of doubt, in the gloomy vales of misanthropy, in the dark dens of fault-finding and selfishness, you will lose all the light and joy, and finally the very life of the true believer. Come out into God's sweet sunshine this morning. Eat the divine manna as given in the divine Book. Exercise all the spiritual sympathies and muscles by following Christ, "who went about doing good." Arouse yourself to go for some poor fellow-Christian, some poor, struggling, dying fellow being in life's terrible journey, and you will soon find the warm life blood of a true humanity and of a divine impartation once more coursing through your veins. Your Jeremiads will be changed into Hallelujahs, and you yourself will leave the vale of gloom and shout on the mountain tops of light and joy.

The Zenith.

This light will one day be perfected—"unto the perfect day." The figure underlying the text suggests the perfection of the noonday light. The sun climbs the eastern sky until he is clearly elevated above the horizon, and then the prepared, or perfected, day has come. One interpreter has rendered the passage by the words, "going and illuminating until the prepared day." The believer's final victory and glory are the result of a long and careful preparation on the part of God, and secondarily on his own part. The perfection of that day is due in part to this element of preparedness, of which mention is here made. The man of God is only in his twilight here; he is preparing for the realms of everlasting light and day. Now he is walking in earth's shadows; but the time will come when he will enter into the full light and glory of heavenly brightness and felicity.

There will then be perfect light on all the mysterious providences of God, which come to us in our earthly pilgrimage. The purpose of God as unfolded in these providences we cannot now fully understand; they are to us as if printed in characters that are upside down, but when we reach the other world and look back upon these our view-point will have so completely changed that we can read them with perfect ease, and with meaning which will fill our souls with joy unspeakable as we sing our song of praise to him that doeth all things well. There will then be fuller light on all the wonders of God's character on all the mysteries and glories of God's redemptive grace; on all the progressive steps of God's revelation from paradise lost to paradise restored. We shall then see that all this world's history is but a hyphen between the garden of Eden and the paradise of God. We shall have perfect light on all the steps of our own progress in the divine light and likeness. We know something even now, not only of present dignity, but of our future glory. We know even now that when we shall see Jesus we shall be like him. Marvelous thought! Transcendent possibility! What angel may fathom the depths of so profound a truth as this? What angel may scale the heights of so lofty a possibility as this? Perhaps we shall be like Christ in breadth, depth, height, and splendor of intellect; perhaps we shall be like him in purity, nobility and divinity of character. Perhaps we shall be like him in unbroken peace, unclouded happiness, unblemished purity and Unfading Glory.

Mysterious Providences

Once more we are reminded of the striking contrast here suggested between the righteous and the wicked. Oh the unspeakable folly of those who eat the bread of wickedness and drink the wine of violence! Oh the unspeakable wretchedness of the wicked whose way is as darkness, and who know not at what they stumble as they go groping in the dark. While it is true as we see that the light in which Christians walk here is but the prophecy of that brighter light which they shall enjoy when they shall shine as the sun, it is also true that the darkness of the wicked here is but the prophecy of that deeper darkness in which at the last they shall dwell. There are no more solemn words of tongue or pen than these, "cast into outer darkness." The vagueness, the indefiniteness, of this region appeals powerfully to the imagination. The absence of definite description adds to the awfulness of the condition. This darkness was never intended for men, but for the devil and his angels. Oh why will men determine to have their abode with demons? Turn ye, turn ye to-day into this path of light and love, of peace and joy, of pleasure and purity. Then at the last amid the splendors of heaven, you shall shine above the brightness of the sun.

TRIBUTE MONEY.

THEY pressed about the Master,
Crying: "Tell us, shall we bring
Our tribute money to him
Claiming Cæsar as our king?"

"Shew me a coin," he answered,
In accents sweet and clear;
"Tell me whose superscription,
And image doth it bear?"

"Both Cæsar's!" "Then to Cæsar
Render back his own!" he said.
The test is still unerring
Through the years that since have fled.

We, like the coin, are graven
With the image and the name
Of him we hail as Sovereign,
And, tribute he will claim.

If Christ has set his impress
Upon our lives, then we
Are sealed to him forever
Through all eternity.

But if we yield allegiance
To the sovereignty of sin,
Shall we not claim as tribute
His own, whose own we've been?

I ask you, fellow-being,
"Whose image do you bring—
The stamp of carnal Cæsar,
Or the seal of Christ, our King?"

A SUNDAY HYMN.

LORD of all being! throned afar,
Thy glory flames from star to star:
Centre and soul of every sphere,
Yet to each loving heart now near!
Sun of our life, thy quickening ray
Sheds on our path the glow of day;
Star of our hope, thy softened light
Cheers the long watches of the night.

Lord of all life, below, above,
Whose light is truth, whose warmth is love,
Before thy ever-blazing throne
We ask no lustre of our own.
Grant us thy truth to make us free,
And kindling hearts that burn for thee,
Till all thy living altars claim
One holy light, one heavenly flame.

A FAMOUS OLD HYMN.

Many Readers Interested in C. M's Inquiry about, "Oh, tell me no more."

A LARGE number of readers have sent us copies of the hymn:

"Oh, tell me no more of the world's vain store," asked for by Mr. C. M. Yarmouth, recently. One version we published last week. Mrs. John MacCarthy, of Brooklyn, sends another which gives the following as the concluding verse:

And now I'm in care my neighbors may share
These blessings: to seek them will none of you dare?
In bondage, oh why, and in death will you lie,
When One here assures you free grace is so nigh?

Laird, Boydton, Va.; John Butterfield, Rochelle, Ill.; Thos. J. Miller, Genoa, Ia.; Mrs. Susan Priest, Shelbyville, Mo.; Theo. A. Carruth, Tampa, Fla.; and many others. The hymn appears variously under the titles of "The Happy Saint," "The Power of Prayer," "Worldly Vanity Renounced," "Prospects of Heaven," etc. It appears in the Methodist Hymnal (No. 758.) Mr. G. W. Cooper and W. T. L., write that the author was John Gambold, not Rowland Hill, and Mr. Cooper adds that Rowland Hill was very fond of the verses and repeated them in his last hours. W. T. L., Philadelphia, writes:

Yesterday (the Sabbath) after reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through, I was sitting in the twilight with my husband when he began to sing a hymn—one that he used to sing in the country school-house when a boy. I said to him, "those words are very pretty," (he had only sung one verse) and he commenced singing again, just as I was going to tell him about that verse in "Our Mail Bag:"

"For Jesus hath loved me, I cannot tell why."

I said to him, "Is it not strange. I was reading those lines in 'Our Mail Bag' in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and there is a request from one of the readers asking Dr. Talmage to print the whole of the poem?"

"Well," he said, "we will try and find it." So we looked through several hymn books and finally found in the Methodist Hymnal the verses of which I now write. I had never heard my husband or anyone else sing it before. I write this as I thought it a strange coincidence, my husband not having read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and singing the very words of the Hymn that I had read, and was at the same time thinking about. May our Heavenly Father still continue to bless you and the Publisher, for to be deprived of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I know would grieve me very much.

Mr. Edward Bethune, Hamilton, Ont., sends us the following: "The last time Rowland Hill occupied my pulpit," wrote his friend and neighbor, the Rev. George Clayton, "when he preached excellently in behalf of a charitable institution, he retired to the vestry after service, under feelings of great exhaustion. Here he remained until all but ourselves had left the place.

At length he seemed with very much reluctance to summon energy enough to take his departure, intimating that it was probably the last time he should preach in W——. I offered my arm, which he declined, and then followed him, as he passed down the aisle of the chapel. The lights were nearly extinguished, the silence was profound; nothing, indeed, was heard but the slow, majestic tread of his own footsteps, when in an undertone he thus soliloquized—

And when I'm to die, &c.

To my heart this was a scene of unequalled solemnity, nor can I ever recur to it without a revival of that hallowed, sacred, shuddering sympathy which it first awakened. When the good old saint lay literally dying, and apparently unconscious, a friend put his mouth close to his ear, and slowly repeated his favorite lines—

And when I'm to die,
Receive me I'll cry, &c.

The light came back to his fast fading eye, a smile overspread his face, and his lips moved in the vain attempt to articulate the words. This was the last sign of consciousness he ever gave on earth."

A GLANCE AHEAD.

I THINK that before the sun of this century shall set, the last tyranny will fall, and with a splendor of demonstration that shall be the astonishment of the universe, God will set forth the brightness and pomp and glory and perpetuity of his eternal government. Out of the starry flags and the emblazoned insignia of this world, God will make a path for his own triumph, and, returning from universal contest, he will sit down, the grandest, strongest, highest throne of earth his footstool.

Then shall all nations' song ascend
To Thee, our Ruler, Father, Friend,
Till heaven's high arch resounds again
With 'Peace on earth, good-will to men.'

I want to encourage all Christian workers in every possible department. Hosts of the living God, march on! march on! His Spirit will bless you. His shield will defend you. His sword will strike for you. March on! march on! The despotism will fall, and paganism will burn its idols, and Mohammedanism will give up its false prophet, and Judaism will confess the true Messiah, and the great walls of superstition will come down in thunder and wreck at the long, loud blast of the Gospel trumpet. March on! march on! The besiegement will soon be ended. Only a few more steps on the long way; only a few more sturdy blows; only a few more battle cries, then God will put the laurel upon your brow, and from the living fountains of heaven will bathe off the sweat and the heat and the dust of the conflict. March on! march on! For you the time for work will soon be passed, and amid the outflashings of the judgment throne, and the trumpeting of resurrection angels, and the upheaving of a world of grieving, and the hosanna and groan of the saved and lost, we shall be rewarded for our faithfulness or punished for our stupidity.

MORAL MUSCLE.

MUCH of the Christian character of the day lacks in swarthiness and power. It is gentle enough, and active enough, and well-meaning enough, but is wanting in moral muscle. It can sweetly sing at a prayer-meeting, and smile graciously when it is the right time to smile, and makes an excellent nurse to pour out with steady hand a few drops of peppermint for a child that feels disturbances under the waist-band, but has no qualification for the robust Christian work that is demanded.

One reason for this is the ineffable softness of much of what is called Christian literature. The attempt is to bring us up on tracts made up of thin exhortations, and goodish maxims. A nerveless treatise on commerce or science in that style would be crumpled up by the first merchant and thrown into his waste-basket. Religious twaddle is of no more use than worldly twaddle. If a man has nothing to say, he had better keep his pen wiped and his tongue still. There needs an infusion of strong Anglo-Saxon into religious literature, and a brawnier manliness and more impatience with insipidity, though it be prayerful and sanctimonious. He who stands with irksome repetitions asking people to "Come to Jesus," while he gives no strong, common-sense reason why they should come, drives back the souls of men. If with all the thrilling realities of eternity at hand a man has nothing to write which can gather up and master the thoughts and feelings of men, his writing and speaking are a slander on the religion which he wishes to eulogize.

Morbidity in religion might be partially cured by more out-door exercise. There are some duties we can perform better on our feet than on our knees. If we can carry the grace of God with us down into every-day, practical Christian work, we will get more spiritual strength in five minutes than by ten hours of kneeling. If Daniel had not served God save when three times a day he worshipped toward the temple, the lions would have surely eaten him up. The school of Christ is as much out-of-doors as indoors. Hard, rough work for God will develop an athletic soul. Religion will not conquer either the admiration or affections of men by effeminacy, but by strength. Because the heart is soft is no reason why the head should be soft. The spirit of genuine religion is a spirit of great power. When Christ rides in apocalyptic vision, it is not on a weak and stupid beast, but on a horse—emblem of majesty and strength: "And he went forth conquering and to conquer."

INDOLENT LIVES.

ONE of the most awful caldrons of iniquity is an indolent life. All the rail-trains on the Hudson River, all the rail-trains on the Pennsylvania route, all the trains on the Long Island road bring to these cities young men to begin their commercial life. Do you know what one of their great temptations is? It is the example of indolent people in our cities. They are in all our cities. They dress better than some who are industrious. They have access to all places of amusement—plenty of money, yet idle. They hang around our great hotels. You find them around there any day—men who do nothing, never earn anything, yet well-dressed, having plenty. Why should I work? Why should you work? Why drudge and toil in bank and shop and office, or on the scaffolding, or by the anvil, when these men get along so well and do not work?

Some of them hang around the City Halls of our great cities, toothpick in their mouth, waiting for some crumb to fall from the office-holder's table. Some of them hang around the City Hall for the city van bringing criminals from the station-houses. They stand there and gloat over it—really enjoy the disgrace and suffering of those poor creatures as they get out of the city van and go into the courts. Where do they get their money? That is what you ask. That is what I ask. Only four ways of getting money, only four: by inheritance, by earning it, by begging it, by stealing it; and there are a vast multitude among us who get their living not by inheritance, nor by earning it, nor by begging it. I do not like to take the responsibility of saying how they get it!

Now, these men are a constant temptation. Why should I toil and wear myself out in the bank, or the office, or the store, or the shop, or the factory? These men have nothing to do. They get along a great deal better. And that is the temptation under which a great many young men fall. They begin to consort with these men, these idlers, and they go down the same awful steps. The number of men in our cities who are trying to get their living by their wits and by sleight-of-hand is all the time increasing.

O, the numbers of people in these great cities who are trying to get their living not honestly! And they are a mighty temptation to the industrious young man who cannot understand it. While these others have it so easy, they have it so hard. Horatius of olden times was told that he could have just as much ground as he could plough around with a yoke of oxen in one day. He hooked up the oxen to the plough, and he cut a very large circle and ploughed until he came to the same place where he started, and all that property was his. But I have to tell you to-day that just so much financial, just so much moral, just so much spiritual possession you will have as you compass with your own industries, and just so much from the morning of your life to the evening of your life as you can plough around with your own hard work. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise."

A LESSON FROM THE CACTUS.

I WAS once amid the wonderful, bewitching cactus growths of North Carolina. I never was more bewildered with the beauty of flowers, and yet when I would take up one of these cactuses and pull the leaves apart, the beauty was all gone. You could hardly tell that it had ever been a flower. And there are a great many Christian people in this day just pulling apart their Christian experiences to see what there is in them, and there is nothing left in them. This style of self-examination is a damage instead of an advantage to their Christian character. I remember when I was a boy I used to have a small piece in the garden that I called my own, and I planted corn there, and every few days I would pull it up to see how fast it was growing. Now, there are a great many Christian people in this day whose self-examination merely amounts to the pulling up of that which they only yesterday or the day before planted.

THE SAFE REFUGE.

A SOLDIER, during the war, heard of the sickness of his wife and asked for a furlough. It was denied him, and he ran away. He was caught, brought back, and sentenced to be shot as a deserter. The officer took from his pocket a document that announced his death on the following morning. As the document was read, the man flinched not and showed no sorrow or anxiety. But the officer then took from his pocket another document that contained the prisoner's pardon. Then he broke down with emotion at the thought of the leniency that had been extended. Though you may not be moved when I tell you of the law that thundered in its condemnation, while I tell you of the pardon and the peace of the Gospel, I wonder if they will not overcome you.

Jesus is a safe refuge. Fort Hudson, Fort Pulaski, Fort Moultrie, Fort Sumter, Gibraltar, Sebastopol were taken. But Jesus is a castle into which the righteous runneth and is safe. No battering-ram can demolish its wall. No sappers or miners can explode its ramparts, no storm-bolt of perdition leap upon its towers. The weapons that guard this fort are omnipotent. Hell shall unlimber its great guns of death only to have them dismantled. In Christ our sins are pardoned, discomfited, blotted out, forgiven. An ocean cannot so easily drown a fly as the ocean of God's forgiveness swallow up, utterly and forever, our transgressions. He is able to save unto the uttermost.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GOOD WOMEN.

WOMEN, like angels, have their specific work. They were made, they were born, for a special sphere. Man can no more fill her niche in the work world, or home world, or religious world, than can the moon give light by day, to ripen the harvests. Man has his place here, but he will never fill it, till woman fills hers. As well try to make bread from stones, as to make men, real men, apart from the forces God has put in woman, to help him be what he ought. Hence, I now write unto women. This is your lesson, not his.

Outside of God, the Holy Spirit, there is no one so good in this old world, as a good woman. I cannot tell what an angel can do here, but give me my choice, of one of them, and a good woman, and no time will be lost in the selecting. I choose her. She can, with the lever and fulcrum of her faith and love, lift this world nearer God than any power outside of Divine Grace.

And the converse is true. A bad woman can fling this orb hellward, with greater speed than a devil.

What constitutes a good woman? She is not good because of the texture of her garb, or the beauty of her face, or symmetry of her form; beauty is only skin deep; silk can cover sinners as well as saints. No—a woman is good, not because of face or fabric, but because of a good heart. Woman is nineteen twentieths heart, any way: and if that be good, she is good; and if that be bad, she is bad.

I've seen a poor gown, and a very homely face, and a figure twisted somewhat out of shape; but for miles about they spoke of her as "the good woman" of the village. And I've seen those who could vie with Venus for beauty, and yet their goodness was greater than their beauty, and their spirits finer than the silk they wore.

Heart—heart—that is what makes a woman good; a heart given up God, renewed and made so it can love like God; maybe not as much, but as like.

See how men will treat a good woman with every thing; see how they will toil and labor and sweat, just to please and provide. A good woman can make of man almost what she will. No clay yields quicker to potter than man to a woman with heart and brain.

See her influence. Why, her sex is her endowment. It's no single talent, either. Her presence is a power. The rustle of her skirts, the presence of her form, the smile of her face, all have an influence greater than has been measured by mortals.

Take a western mining camp: Two hundred men there, alone; no woman present, and all know, that in morals, they sink to the level of beasts.

Now, put in there one, just one, good woman, and in a fortnight she will have lifted the morals of that camp a hundred degrees heavenward. Such is her power for good.

But, you put in there an evil woman, and though alone they have sunken to the level of beasts, yet now they will sink, by her presence, to the door of hell itself. Thus her power for bad.

I have often wondered if Satan is not a woman in disguise.

On the contrary, when God himself would enter the world, to be seen of men, no door was royal enough for his entrance, save the doorway of womanhood; and when he reveals himself in the kindliest way, no illustration will suffice, save by her: and thus we have—"as one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." The Bible has nothing sweeter than that. That is salvation in its sweetest shape.

See what Scripture has to tell. The greatest gift named therein, is not by prince or king, but by a woman. The widow's two mites are more than others' millions. She gave all she had. Just like a woman! When they give, they give all they have; seemingly, they don't know any better; and I'm glad. It's just like her. A woman's love is no half love, and her gifts are like her love.

Take a man, and let him have two mites; he may give one, but the other he will keep for investment; not so with woman.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE CRISIS IN EGYPT.

ONCE more Egypt has become the most prominent subject of European diplomacy. The question has been forced to the front by an unexpected act of independence on the part of Abbas the Khedive of Egypt, a young man nineteen years of age. He suddenly dismissed his ministers and appointed a new Cabinet. At the head, instead of Mustapha Pasha, a sturdy friend of the English, he placed Fakhri Pasha their most inveterate opponent. Lord Cromer, the English representative at Cairo, protested, but the Khedive asserted his right to choose his own advisers, and in this attitude he was supported by France, Russia and Turkey. Lord Cromer reminded Abbas that he was Khedive only by consent of the Powers, and gave him twenty-four hours to decide whether he would dismiss the obnoxious minister. At the end of that time the Khedive yielded, and also promised that in future he would make no change in the government without the consent of England. Both Russia and France vigorously protested against the English dictation but without avail. England contends that her management of the affairs of Egypt for the past ten years has been an unmixed good to the country. She has established order, suppressed an insurrection, restored the national credit, substituted justice by law for capricious decisions founded on the Koran, protected the poor from the rapacity of their oppressors, inaugurated a constitution and given the country a degree of good government it never enjoyed before. These achievements, England contends, give her the right to insist that there shall not be placed at the head of affairs a man who would thwart all reforms and give his energy to restoring Egypt to the anarchical and corrupt condition it was in thirty years ago. She admits that there is discontent in Cairo, but says that it is confined to the upper classes who before the English advent had an immunity from taxation and had other privileges which have been taken away and have had to bear their share of the expense of government, which formerly was wholly extracted from the poor. So far from yielding to the demand of France that she quit Egypt, England declares her intention of remaining until the reforms inaugurated are fully developed, and the people of Cairo have seen proof of her intention in the regiments of English soldiery which have been promptly landed and marched through the narrow streets. There is valid reason to believe that the young Khedive was incited by France to assert his independence of England, but it appears that he has gained nothing by the step. If he were familiar with the Hebrew Scriptures he would have known that the prophet warned the man who would sit in the seat of the Pharaohs against counsellors who urged him to say "I am the son of the wise, the son of ancient kings" and assert himself. (Isa. 19: 11, 12.)

Saving a Nose.

A YOUNG lady in Boston, Mass., is indebted to a stranger for being saved from disfigurement for life during the recent cold snap. The Boston Herald says that she was walking across the Common in the face of the icy wind when she noticed a man whom she met look at her intently. He turned after they had passed and met her again, and again gazed fixedly on her features. She felt inclined to resent his rudeness, when the stranger apologized. He said that he had lived in Canada and knew the symptoms of a frost-bite, and he saw them in her nose. The end of it was very white while the rest of it was very red. The lady objected that she was only very cold and felt no unusual sensation in the organ but the stranger persisted and as he seemed to know, she consented to accompany him to a drug-store. There he placed her near the stove and rubbed the nose with snow. Soon the severe pain, as if a multitude of needles were being stuck into her face, convinced her of the accuracy of the diagnosis. She complained of the pain, and then the stranger congratulated her on the danger being over, and turned her over to the druggist to complete the cure with his liniments, which was done. No one could be more thankful than she, when she realized the danger she had escaped, that the stranger had persisted in forcing his kind attentions upon her, though at first, not knowing her condition, she had resented them. It is often so with persons who are warned that they are in danger of losing their souls. There may be resentment at first, but afterward when the soul enters into joy and peace, it is replaced by thankfulness. (Rev. 3: 17.)

An Unhappy Bride.

A YOUNG bride applied to a New York Court last week for redress of her wrongs. She stated that just before New Year's she had been married to a young man belonging to a respectable family in the city. After the wedding her husband took her to his father's house where he lived. The father however refused to welcome her, as the marriage had taken place without his consent. As it was late in the evening, however, she was allowed to sleep in the basement while her husband went to his own room in the upper part of the house. The next day she was required to leave and her husband took her to a boarding-house. He did not pay for her board and after paying herself until her money was exhausted she was expelled. She had nowhere to go, and her husband, she learned, was out of employment and she did not know how to live or what to do. The young man was sent for and was warned by the Justice that if he did not make a better provision for his wife than the basement of his father's house he would be sent to prison. The lady seems to have good reason to complain, but she is suffering the penalty of her own imprudence in marrying a man capable of such conduct. It is too late now to retrace that step but it is not too late to enter into spiritual union with him who said: "In my Father's house there are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." (John 14: 2.)

A STREET IN CAIRO, EGYPT.

An Engineer's Prudence.

AN engineer on the Chicago and Erie Railroad was the travelling companion of a reporter of the Chicago Inter-Ocean a few days ago, on a journey. The reporter remarked on the high rate of speed at which the train was going, when the engineer replied that there was no cause for alarm, as the man in charge of the locomotive had a record for being the safest engineer on the road. In proof, he cited an incident which had occurred a few months previously. He said that the same engineer was taking a train at night through a forest near Lima, Ohio. The darkness was intense, but as he proceeded, it was suddenly lighted up by a red glare. He knew that there must be a fire in the forest,' but as it did not seem to be near the track, he went on. He increased the speed to nearly sixty miles an hour, so as to get out of the danger, as speedily as possible. Presently he turned a curve, which brought him to a straight stretch of road of over two miles. He saw that the fire was increasing, and as he ran his eye along the track, he saw a shower of big sparks fly upward, nearly a mile ahead. Instantly he shut off the steam and applied the brakes. In a few moments the train slowed up and came to a dead stop, just at the place where a bridge spans a deep river. On examining the bridge it was found to be on fire, and, as the engineer had suspected, the shower of sparks had been sent up from a burning beam, which had that moment fallen off into the river below. The engineer's presence of mind, in attaching the right meaning to the ascending sparks, had saved the lives of three hundred passengers. It is much to be wished that people were similarly on the alert to avoid moral and spiritual catastrophe. That kind of calamity is much more common, though men are not left for warning to mere inference, but are warned explicitly, that they are going toward the great gulf, and they see others go over the brink of destruction. (Job 12 : 5.)

A Dog's Service.

A railroad accident occurred near Flushing meadows, Long Island, on Jan. 19. Either through a misplaced switch or through the spreading of the rails a locomotive on its way from Flushing to Bridge street, Brooklyn, left the track and rolled down an embankment, landing in a ditch at the bottom. Fortunately, the coupling links broke, or the passenger coaches attached would have gone over, too, and many lives would have been lost. The engineer jumped from the cab when he saw that an accident was inevitable, but the fireman was caught under the engine. A wrecking party was speedily on the scene, and worked with might and main to release the fireman, who was in danger of being suffocated in the snow, under the locomotive. It was slow work, in spite of their efforts, and the man would surely have died had not his dog, a big Newfoundland, been there. The dog crawled beneath the locomotive, and with his paws dug away the snow from the man's face, and so enabled him to breathe while the work of extrication went on. The dog did not show so much sagacity after the engine was raised. He took his stand by his master and would not allow any one to touch him. When the doctor approached he growled ominously and showed his teeth, and it was feared that it would be necessary to shoot him before the man could be removed. He was, however, eventually coaxed away, and the man was taken to the hospital, where he is now on the way to recovery. There could be no question about the dog's love for his master, but, as so often happens, even with human beings, love and wisdom did not always go together. Many a child might have been led to the Great Physician, but for the interference of parents, who loved it dearly, but feared that religion would be detrimental to it. (Matt. 10 : 37.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. G. F. Pentecost, D.D., has definitely accepted the call of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church, London, to the pastorate, subject to the approval of the Synod.

Mr. D. L. Moody's arrangements for Evangelistic services during the World's Fair include services in the churches as well as in specially constructed buildings. The cost is estimated as at least $100,000.

Rev. John Weston, D.D., has recently been holding very successful meetings at the Gross Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago, which is now called the Endeavor Presbyterian Church. A very strong interest has been manifested and a large addition to the membership is expected.

At the meeting of St. John's Guild recently held in New York, it was stated that the receipts of the past year were $32,011.96. The expenditure was $29,811.68, leaving a small balance in hand for this year. The Guild has now a free hospitall for children in West 61st Street.

Rev. E. P. Telford commences services next Sunday in Newtown, L. I., at the Dutch Reformed Church, of which Rev. Howard W. Ennis, is pastor. The meetings at Emory M. E. Church, Jersey City, have been very successful and were continued a week beyond the time fixed.

The trustees of Colorado College, Colo., have received an offer of $50,000 from Dr. D. K. Parsons of Chicago toward the endowment fund of $200,000 which they are trying to raise. Dr. Parsons makes his gift conditional on the balance of the amount being raised within two years.

The Protestant Episcopal Church, according to Whittaker's Almanac for 1893, shows 4351 clergy, an increase of 283; 3157 parishes, a decrease of 28; 2572 missions, an increase of 72, and 547,855 communicants, an increase of 18,565. The total of contributions is set down at $13,565,000, a gain of about $147,000.

Mr. Charles A. Bunting, manager of the Christian Home for Intemperate Men, in New York, would be glad to receive gifts of cast-off clothing. He will send to any person in the city notifying him of their having such articles which they will give him, to collect them. The Home is on Madison Avenue corner of Eighty-sixth Street.

Dr. Andrew A. Bonar the last of the famous trio of brothers, of whom Horatius was the best known, has gone to his rest. Andrew was called the Melancthon of the Free Church movement and was of a singularly sweet and lovable character. He was pastor of the Finnieston Free Church, Glasgow, for thirty-six years.

Rev. John McNeil received recently an invitation to become pastor of the Whitefield Tabernacle in London, as successor to the late Rev. J. Jackson Wray. The evangelist declined the invitation because he has undertaken to labor for a season in Ireland, and he then comes to Chicago to assist Mr. D. L. Moody in his World's Fair special services.

The London Missionary Society has adopted the Salvation Army's idea of a self-denial week. The first experiment was made from Jan. 22 to 29. The churches in connection with the Society were supplied with envelopes in which the members placed the funds saved individually and sent them to the Society. The amount needed is $125,000 with which, if obtained, the Society will send out a hundred more missionaries.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has closed his meetings at New Castle, Pa. The interest was maintained to the end and at the last services nearly two hundred persons decided for Christ, bringing the entire number of converts brought in during the series of meetings up to one thousand. As an outcome of the revival led by Dr. Munhall in Meriden, Conn., the First Congregational Church has received seventy-six persons into membership.

The revival services conducted by Rev. B. Fay Mills at Des Moines, Ia., have been the means of stirring the whole city. A press dispatch says that the climax of the interest was reached on Jan. 25 "when the business houses of the city, big and little, closed their doors and the people united in a series of monster religious meetings. It was like Sunday, except that no Sunday saw so many attendants upon Divine worship. It is estimated that 30,000 people attended the meetings."

CHAPTER XV.

AT THE POST OF DUTY.

ANNE RUSSEL and her sons never went near that grave where the stone bore no letters but H. R., dateless. But Eloise went there often, people thought it was to keep alive a filial memory in the little girl she led by the hand.

Sitting on that grave, Eloise felt free to remember Cecil Grafton as she had first seen him, when his handsome face, winning smile, and musical voice had made him the first and only love of her heart.

During the four years in which they had not met she and Dora had seemed to grow nearer and more sisterly to each other. After Henry Russel's death Eloise wrote to Dora, "Come to me; I have had a hard trial, and it has shaken me. I think I can speak of it to you, and to you only."

The visit at Plymouth was duly paid and it lengthened beyond expectation. Dora and Eloise found in each other a new and sweet congeniality. Dora in the midst of the family which Eloise had collected for herself, felt that her sister had some great comfort and blessing which she lacked. The little Ruth was a very pleasing child with a warmth of affection especially lavished on Eloise.

"But neither am I quite alone and useless," said Dora, "Uncle David and Aunt Lois are very aged and they need me; I am a daughter to them, and I am helpful, as Margaret must give much of her time to the little ones."

"In this world," said Eloise, "no one need be lonely or useless. If we have the courage of our convictions, and force our selfish natures to become large-minded enough to live for others as well as ourselves, life will be full and useful and happy."

The sisters were one day sitting together, making Christmas presents for the children, and Anne was reading to them items from the daily paper. "It is not always," she said, "that sin receives what seems to be its just deserts in this life, but here is a case where justice and divine vengeance have pursued the criminal and overtaken him. Listen: "A very adroit and skillful burglar and bank-breaker, long sought for by the authorities, and long pursuing his occupation with seeming immunity, has come to a fitting end of his career. In an effort to break open with gunpowder the safe of the H—— Bank, by some means he caused an explosion that wrecked himself; the safe-door burst into fragments, one of which shattered the right side of the felon's face, destroying the eye; his arms were both broken, and a piece of iron passed through his body, above the left hip. Those who came running at the sound of the explosion, found the unhappy wretch groaning and conscious. He was carried into the home of Elias Pemberton, Esq., President of the Bank, where he lies in terrible agony, but may live several days. As there is no hospital within fifty miles of H—— and the man cannot be moved, he must remain there till he dies. He has been notorious under many aliases, but probably his real name is Peirce Denham."

The work in Dora's hands had fallen to her lap, as prescient of coming news that bore upon her past, she listened to Anne's reading. As the fatal name was pronounced, she gave a little gasp, and darted from the room.

It was an hour before Eloise followed her. She found Dora seated on the side of her bed, her face pale and disturbed, she had in these last moments been forced to re-live her past.

"Well," said Eloise, "you are going to [illegible]."

"Eloise? You cannot mean it!"

"Who else is there to go? Among strangers and even enemies, scorned and hated, he lies dying in intense agony. A kind look or word [illegible] injured, might save a sinking soul. Dora, you have an errand there. You will do it. I should [illegible] get no train for two hours yet, and in such [illegible] alone—alone with God."

"Eloise!" cried Dora, "you cannot ask me to go!"

"I ask you? Your own conscience asks you. God sends you."

"But why should I —?"

"You should, because you once voluntarily assumed responsibilities toward this man—responsibilities of which you cannot divest yourself. Dora — it is written, 'Love your enemies.'"

"Don't say that word," cried Dora passionately, "not to hate is the greatest stretch of my charity."

"What is meant by love there is that holy Christian mercy that does good to the evil, as God, who sends rain on the just and on the unjust," said Eloise, gently. "Dora, you are told to bless them that curse you."

"He has cursed my life, and there was a time when I wished him all the worst evils that could come upon him; evil like this. Lately, instead of wishing evil to him, I just wished never to hear of him again. Now—when I think of his terrible state, I feel—sorry for him—as I would for anyone."

"Yes the; mills of God grind exceeding small. But you cannot regard this man merely as you would 'any one.' Probably in all the world you are the only person to whom this news comes as a challenge to show a mercy and forgiveness that have something divine in them. Dora, the command of your Master is plain: 'Do good to those who despitefully use you.' Those strangers into whose hands he has fallen, are not called upon, as you are, to care for him. You are the one to go. And Dora, now, if you are there in time, you can learn whether your marriage was valid, whether you are really his wife."

Those words decided Dora. She hesitated still, outwardly, to conceal how much that suggestion meant to her.

"Going will decide much for you," said Eloise. Whether this is the man you married as Peirce Denham you will surely know, and whether or not he dies."

Yes, Dora felt that she must know these things. She rose.

"I would go with you," said her sister, "but we take up such burdens better alone."

"Yes," said Dora, "I will go alone."

"I would pack your valise, but Dora, in such times as these the work of the hands helps to stop the tumult of the heart. You will reach H— at half-past four."

Dora had laid out her valise, and began to pack it. Eloise making helpful suggestions. "Have you plenty of money with you, Dora, for any emergency?"

"Yes, plenty, I think,"

"Telegraph to me if you need more. What is your plan?"

"There is only one thing to be done. I will go to Mr. Giles Pemberton, and tell him I think that the injured man in his house is a relative of mine, of whom I have long lost sight owing to his evil courses. I will ask to be allowed to see him. If I find it is Denham, I will ask permission to stay with him to the end. They may think me wife, sister or cousin, whatever they like—and—I shall only give the first part of my name, Dora Lacy. Not Dora Lacy Maple."

"You have a right to do that," said Eloise, "Say, also the truth, that you heard the news here in Plymouth, where you were making a visit. Telegraph me to-night, and write me to-morrow."

Possibly Mr. Giles Pemberton was never more astonished, than when a beautiful and graceful woman, whose every look and tone bespoke dignity and self-respect, entered his office, and quietly introduced herself as a relative of the burglar dying at his home. "I thought it not right," said Dora, calmly, "that you should be burdened with all the care; families must assume their responsibilities, and so I came. Is he conscious?"

"Yes, poor creature. And when not under the influence of powerful opiates, his groans are so terrible that I have had to send most of my family out of the house. Of course he has to be where he is, until he dies. The wonder is that he holds out an hour. He must be a man of iron strength. He has lived here in town three weeks, became intimate with many of our best people, and even popular with some. I have secured some help in the care of him, from people who knew him, but we have no trained nurses here."

Dora and Mr. Pemberton were walking toward the banker's house as they talked. The short winter day was already darkening, as they opened the door, a sharp cry of mortal pain met their ears. Dora shivered.

"We can't keep him under the opiates all the time, the pain is too much for them, and he comes back to consciousness. This will be hard for you. You are—?

Dora bowed, and simply waved her hand toward the card which Mr. Pemberton held in his fingers. Then he understood that her exact relationship to the felon would not be made known. He scanned her closely as they passed down the hall. She looked about twenty-four or five years old; her face grave for her years; her dress rich and plain; her air that of a woman fully assured of her position, and accustomed to deference. He touched a closed door.

"He is here."

Dora stopped. "Let me take off my coat and hat." She laid the hat, coat and muff on a chair near. He saw her brace herself as for an ordeal, growing whiter about the lips—a set look stealing into her beautiful eyes. "Now!" He opened the door.

Bolstered up on a low couch was the large form of the burglar. His arms, bound in splints, were stretched out on each side, carefully supported; his black hair had been shaved on one side, and half his face was concealed in bandages; the clothes were laid back from his powerful chest as he panted for air. And his knees were partly drawn up. Careful bandaging and packing indicated the fatal wound in his side. A man who was wetting his lips and head moved away. Dora faced the destroyer of her life. Had ever cry for vengeance received fuller answer than this?

The afternoon light from a window behind the couch, fell full upon Dora, as she stopped, shocked, compassionate. Denham saw her: the groan died on his lips—he thought her a dream. And yet in a dream she would have appeared the girl of other years, not with the changing touch of those years upon her.

"Dora."

"I am here," and Dora drew near the couch. Her voice was soft and sweet; pity shone in her face.

"This ends it," said Denham. "You see?"

"I see. I have come to stay by you to the end. There may be words that you could say to me—and could to no other. I have come to tell you that—I forgive."

"I suppose in that you are better than God. Women can do such things."

"God also forgives—the penitent."

"I reckon there are some men who are never penitent! Dora, I seem a hard fellow to kill, but it is coming?" He looked questioningly at the two men.

"Not a shadow of a chance for you," said one of them.

He sighed. "I thought so. Well none of us lasts forever. Go out you two—will you? I want to speak to her."

But when they went out—for a while he could only moan in a terrible agony, increased by the exertion of speaking. Dora wet his lips, gave him a cordial, fanned him. She slipped easily into the duties of nurse.

Finally he spoke again. "I never thought of seeing you. You ran off from me pretty sharply. I tell you the way you went made me miss you. What a hand you would have made in my business—if you'd only taken to it!"

Dora shrank back from him, the sponge fell from her hand.

"You were so young, you seemed so thoughtless, and so fond of me, I thought I could do what I chose with you! I broke it to you too suddenly. I should have led you along by degrees. Thunder! What a game you and I could have played the world if you had stood by me!"

Horrible loathing of this man shook Dora's soul. But she had come to fulfil a duty, and receive a satisfaction. All the strength of her nature now rose up to prevent her being, by disgust, balked of her double errand.

"Tell me — speak truth, you are dying. Was I your wife truly, or was the marriage void because of some earlier one?"

"The child is lost," muttered Denham, "she has become a woman, an iron woman. If I could have made her what I wished!"

"Answer me. I see death stealing over your face."

"Then I'll fight death. I won't die! Yes; you were my wife. I never tried the marriage game but once, and that with you. It is too risky. As you left me, I worked alone, and I've led them a chase! I wish I had it to do over again!"

"You would do better?" said Dora entreatingly.

"You believe I wouldn't. I liked it. I got—well the wild delight of just escaping. You hear bullets whizz by your head—and you are safe, and you are wild with delight. To think that in that bungling fool way I broke up myself!" Again he began to groan heavily; then slowly settled into silence. Twilight fell; Dora lit the lamps on the table, and softly put the disordered room to rights.

When Mr. Pemberton returned all the confusion of the apartments had vanished, all was neat and quiet, and Dora with a white apron and sleeves drawn over her black merino dress, sat fanning the patient.

"He knew you?"

"Yes. When will the doctor come again."

"About ten. Of course there is no chance for his life. The wonder is that he holds out an hour. It is better that way."

"Yes. I will watch with him to-night."

"Very well. I will sleep in the room across the hall. Call me if you need me. But come now to tea, I will send some one in to sit here while you eat."

Dora went out to supper. She felt that the banker and his wife scanned her closely while she was at the table. They saw a beautiful, self-contained woman, her face grave, somewhat sad, with a shocked, troubled look, as any one might wear at such a sight as the shattered burglar presented.

"It is not a deep heart sorrow with her, it is duty, and the pity reason accords to pain," said the banker to his wife after Dora left them. "I'd give a good bit to know how they are related. Miss Dora Lacy, hardly a sister, certainly not a wife. He knew her and called her Dora. Well, I'm glad she came."

"She is a most attractive person and I am glad she came, but I hope people will let her alone and respect her secret, whatever it is. If I were in her place I would not wish to have my burden increased by intrusion and inquisitiveness. Keep the reporters away from her. Don't mention that she is here. As the man cannot be prosecuted, but will die, I don't see why she need to be bothered about him," said Mrs. Pemberton.

"If she knows anything, she will probably have to tell it."

"Then you'd better let Judge Herkimer come here, and take down all she knows and so make an end of it. He is a gentleman and in the name of legal right he won't ask her dozens of questions meant merely to gratify curiosity as some do." Mr. Pemberton laughed. "I'll get Ben Hunt to be quiet about her, and I'll speak to Judge Herkimer and see that she is let alone as much as possible."

The next day Judge Herkimer came and asked for Dora. He wanted whatever information she could give him about Denham.

"It is very little, almost nothing," said Dora.

"Was Peirce Denham his real name?"

"Yes, it was."

"And where was he brought up? Where born?"

"I cannot tell you. As far as I know he had no business and was a professional burglar. For six years I have not had the slightest knowledge of him."

"And before that?"

"I knew nothing of his way of life."

"And what relation are you to him?"

"That cannot make any possible difference to justice, and I prefer to tell nothing of myself. I should not be asked to. You know that a man such as this, brings disgrace upon all connected with him and families are made up of more than one individual. All that I have ever known of him is so little that it cannot be of any use to any person."

"Very well. I shall see that you are not in any way connected with any inquiries that may be made about him. Indeed, as he is bound to die, the whole question about him can be dropped."

MISSIONARIES SUED.

AN effort to save a Chinese child-wife from an unnatural union has involved a Presbyterian missionary in a lawsuit. The Church at Home and Abroad says: "The rescue and protection of Chinese girls on the Pacific Coast is no easy task. Recently Mrs. Holt, the wife of the Rev. W. S. Holt, of our Chinese Mission in Portland, was sued for $2,000, on the charge of 'harboring a runaway wife,' she, with others of our ladies having refused to surrender a Chinese girl who had sought the shelter of our Portland Home. The prosecution failed to establish its case, but one of the friends of Mrs. Holt had to pay $100 for costs. When will these iniquities cease?"

A Gospel Push-Cart.

The Central Union Mission's Ingenious Device for Carrying the Gospel into the Highways and Hedges.

A SHORT time ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a picture of the Gospel-wagon which has been used in connection with the Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C. It was a novel feature when it was first introduced there; but the excellent work it has assisted the earnest workers of that Mission to do, in the outlying districts, has encouraged other Missions in various parts of the country to adopt the same means. The Central Union Mission is again the pioneer in another and similar sphere. The success attending the services held around the wagon in the country districts suggested the thought of the thousands in the alleys and parks of the city itself, who do not go to churches or missions. They belong to that class of which the Saviour spoke in his parable as furnishing the guests to the marriage feast when the servants of the king had gone after them into the highways and hedges and compelled them to come in. The Central Union Mission is intended for just such and has been the means of bringing in thousands of them. But its consecrated laborers are ever on the alert to find new means of reaching more of them. Mr. McMichael, one of the managers of the Mission considering the kind of work required was led to the idea of the Push-Cart, two pictures of which appear on this page. It is the plan of the wagon on a reduced scale and is specially adapted for holding services in the parks and courts of the city. Being light and small, it can be drawn into places inaccessible to the wagon. The sides can easily be let down and affords a standing place for speakers and singers. A light harmonium is carried in the cart and thus there are at hand all the requirements for a bright Gospel service. It is a portable church for those that are out of the way and great good has already resulted from it. The funds for its purchase were contributed entirely by the brethren of Wesley Chapel.

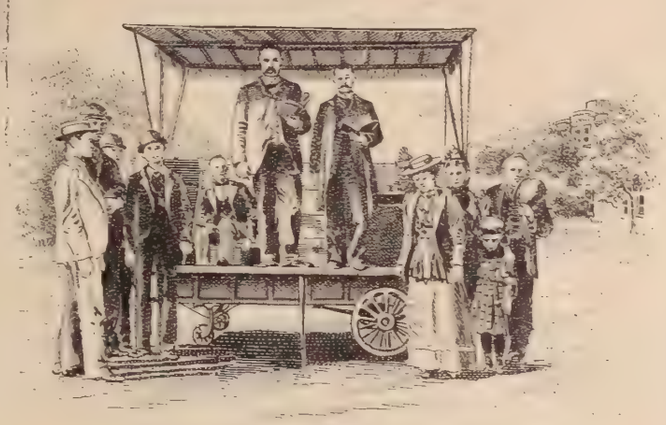
Our friends of the Central Union Mission are, we are glad to learn, comfortably settled in their new building, a picture of which we recently published. They have long needed just such quarters, for their religious and philanthropic work had been restricted by the smallness of the rooms they were occupying. Besides this the work had become "Central" with a meaning they had not at its origin believed possible. Twelve branches have been opened in connection with it, much of the business of which has to be conducted by the parent mission. The new building contains rooms which can be used in providing temporary sleeping accommodation for the many homeless men who come to the Mission and are reclaimed there and need at the beginning of their new life the kindly and hospitable help the mission-workers delight to give. They go to Washington from every State in the Union and there is scarcely a State or Territory unrepresented among the four thousand men who have been saved at the Mission. This fact gives additional force to the plea the managers are making for assistance in paying for their new building. It is a great undertaking which has been forced upon them by their success in soul-saving and by the representative character of the National Capital. Just as Nehemiah required the dwellers in the provinces to help in the building and repairs of the walls of Jerusalem, so on the same principle should aid be rendered to an institution from which all the country derives benefit.

It is gratifying to learn that in many States the Sunday Schools have taken up the work. It was the Sunday Schools that provided the missionary ships, and they did it easily and cheerfully. It is not surprising, therefore, that this work which is distinctly of a missionary character and among our own people, should find favor with the Sunday Schools. If it is adopted generally and each Sunday School sends even a very small contribution, these earnest self-sacrificing and successful Christian workers would soon be relieved of their burden of debt and would have more time and money to spare for the evangelistic work to which they are devoted. Any Church or Sunday School desiring to help in so grand a work may obtain full particulars by addressing Mr. George W. Wheeler, Central Union Mission, Louisiana Avenue, Washington, D. C.

A STRONGHOLD OF HEATHENISM.

ONE of the last entrenchments of heathenism in the world is now on the verge of attack by missionaries on both sides. At the present time Thibet is closed against them and the Gospel of Christ has never been proclaimed there. It lies between India and China and has an area as large as France, Austria and Germany combined. Its estimated population, however, is not more than six millions. It is tributary to China, but Chinese authority is not supreme in the land. The Moravians have stood for many years upon its southwest borders, waiting and praying for an opportunity to enter, and now a flank movement on the northwest is being made by the missionaries of the China Inland Mission, of whom there are now 526 laboring in China. They have entered the provinces of Kan Suh and Szchuen, and are already facing towards Thibet. They are already at work among some Thibetans that live on the border. They have also secured a lodgment in a small village just on the boundary line, and have obtained a house from a friendly Thibetan, and, although an effort has been made to drive them out, they have been defended and protected by Chinese officials, and are still there. In the province of Szchuen their missionaries are pushing towards the west, and are approaching nearer and nearer towards the borders. The religion of the Thibetans is but little known, except that they are steeped in superstitions, and the religious hierarchy of the country has absolute sway over the consciences and lives and property of the people. The Moravians while waiting for the signal to enter, have been engaged in a work of faith, and labor of love, in preparing the New Testament in the Thibetan language ready for use in the country.



THE GOSPEL PUSH-CART OPENED AND USED FOR SERVICE.

A CHINESE PROCLAMATION.

THE recent outrages on missionaries in China are now suspected of being connected with a widely extended plot against the dynasty. The rioters evidently hoped by their attacks on the missionaries to embroil the emperor in a war with foreign powers which might cause his downfall. He appears to be aware of this motive and is taking vigorous measures to protect the missionaries. His latest proclamation which was to the governors of provinces declares that "the doctrine of Christianity has for its purpose the teaching of men to be good. Chinese converts are subjects of China, and are amenable to the local authorities. Peace and quiet should reign among the Chinese and missionaries, but there are reckless fellows who fabricate stories that have no foundation in fact, for the purpose of creating trouble . . . Let the Governors issue proclamations warning the people not to listen to idle rumors or false reports which lead to trouble. Should any person secretly post placards containing false rumors with a view to beguile the minds of the people, strenuous steps must be taken to cause his arrest and vigorous punishment should be meted out to him. The local authorities must protect the lives and property of foreign missionaries, and prevent bad characters from doing them injury. Should it transpire that the measures taken to protect them have not been adequate, and trouble in consequence ensues, the names of those officers that have been truly negligent are to be reported to us for degradation . . . . Let this decree be universally promulgated for the information of the people."

GOSPEL WORK IN CHICAGO.

AT the recent annual meeting of the Chicago Evangelization Society in the Chicago Avenue Church hundreds of converts won through the efforts of the students were present to testify for Christ. Mr. Moody in his address said the Bible Institute men were to the regular ministry what the volunteers were to the regular army. Superintendent R. A. Torrey, reviewed the work of the past year. During the year seventy-nine students have been enrolled. They made 326 visits to hospitals, and 30,461 visits to homes during the year. Over 5,000 meetings were held, every department showing a marked increase.

After the Grip

"I was very weak and run down and did not gain strength, like so many after that prostrating disease. Seeing Hood's Sarsaparilla highly recommended, I began to take it, and was more than pleased with the way it built me up. I think it has made me better than before I was sick. I have also been delighted with HOOD'S PILLS, and alway prefer them to any other kind now. They do not gripe or weaken. I am glad to recommend two such

The Apostle Paul's Early Life.*

ST. PAUL and his parents might seem to an outsider mere Hellenists, but their Galilean origin and training enabled them to retain the intenser Judaism which qualified the Apostle to describe himself as not only of the stock of Israel, but as a Hebrew of the Hebrews. St. Paul's more immediate family connections have also some light thrown upon them in the New Testament. We learn, for instance, from Acts 23: 16, that he had a married sister, who probably lived at Jerusalem, and may have been even a convert to Christianity; for we are told that her son, having heard of the Jewish plot to murder the Apostle, at once reported it to St. Paul himself, who thereupon put his nephew into communication with the chief captain in whose custody he lay. While again, in Romans 16: 7–11, he sends salutations to Andronicus, Junias, and Herodion, his kinsmen, who were residents in Rome; and in verse twenty-one of the same chapter joins Lucius and Jason and Sosipater, his kinsmen, with himself in the Christian wishes for the welfare of the Roman Church, with which he closes the Epistle. It is said, indeed, that this may mean simply that these men were Jews, and that St. Paul regarded all Jews as his kinsmen. But this notion is excluded by the form of the twenty-first verse, where he first sends greetings from Timothy, whom Paul dearly loved, and who was a circumcised Jew, not a proselyte, merely, but a true Jew, on his mother's side, at least; and then the Apostle proceeds to name the persons whom he designates his kinsmen. St. Paul evidently belonged to a family of some position in the Jewish world, whose ramifications were dispersed into very distant quarters of the empire. Every scrap of information which we can gain concerning the early life and associations of such a man is very precious; we may therefore point out that we can even get a glimpse of the friends and acquaintances of his earliest days. Barnabas the Levite was of Cyprus, an island only seventy miles distant from Tarsus. In all probability Barnabas may have resorted to the Jewish schools of Tarsus, or may have had some other connections with the Jewish colony of that city. Some such early friendship may have been the link which bound Paul to Barnabas and enabled the latter to stand sponsor for the newly converted Saul when the Jerusalem Church was yet naturally suspicious of him. "And when he was come to Jerusalem, he essayed to join himself to the disciples: and they were all afraid of him, not believing that he was a disciple. But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles." (Acts 6: 26, 27.)

Then, again, there are other friends of his youth to whom he refers. Timothy's family lived at Lystra, and Lystra was directly connected with Tarsus, by a great road which ran straight from Tarsus to Ephesus, offering means for that frequent communication in which the Jews delighted. St. Paul's earliest memories carried him back to the devout atmosphere of the pious Jewish family at Lystra, which he had long known, where Lois, the grandmother, and Eunice, the mother, had laid the foundation of that spiritual life which under St. Paul's own later teaching flourished so wondrously in the life of Timothy.

At five years old Jewish children of parents like St. Paul's advanced to the direct study of the law under the guidance of some doctor, whose school they daily attended, as another rabbi had expressly enacted, "At five years old a boy should apply himself to the study of Holy Scripture." Between five and thirteen [illegible] or industrial training. It was at this [illegible] he had learned from [illegible] the trade of tent-making, which during [illegible] stead, rendering him independent of all [illegible] were [illegible]

At thirteen years of age, or thereabouts, young Saul, having now learned all the sacred knowledge which the local rabbis could teach, went out to Jerusalem just as our Lord did, to assume the full obligations of a Jew and to pursue his higher studies at the great Rabbinical University of Jerusalem. To put it in modern language, Saul went up to Jerusalem to be confirmed and admitted to the full privileges and complete obligations of the Levitical Law, and he also went up to enter college. St. Paul himself describes the period of life on which he now entered as that in which he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel.

AT ANCHOR.*

WHILE pale with rage the white surf springs
Athwart the harbor bar,
The safe ships fold their snowy wings,
Beneath the evening star.
In this calm haven rocked to sleep
All night they swing and sway,
Till mantles o'er the morning deep
The golden blush of day.

Here, safe from every storm of fate,
From worldly pride and scorn,
Thus let me fold my hands and wait
The coming of the morn;
While all night long, o'er moon-lit turf,
The wind brings in from far
The moaning of the baffled surf
Athwart the harbor bar.

The Late Secretary Blaine.

Close of a Remarkable Career—Teacher, Statesman, Author and Cabinet Officer.

AFTER a long illness, the result of a complication of disorders, ex-Secretary of State James Gillespie Blaine died in Washington on the morning of January 27th. Although the immediate cause of death was heart-failure, the organic troubles from which he suffered had for many months been regarded as beyond remedy.

Mr. Blaine was born in Brownsville, Pa., in 1830, and came of ancestors who bore an honorable part in the early settlement of the Western section of that State. One of them, Col. Ephraim Blaine, was a Commissary General in the Revolutionary Army, and took part in several of Washington's campaigns. When thirteen years old, James Gillespie Blaine entered Washington College in his native county, and soon became distinguished for his quickness in study and his love of English literature and mathematics. Even in those early days, he showed wonderful proclivities for debate. While he was at college, his father died, and it became necessary that he should earn his own livelihood. He accordingly accepted a situation as teacher in the Western Military Institute at Blue Lick Springs, Ky., and it was while there that he met Miss Harriet Stanwood, a teacher, who afterwards became his wife. After his marriage, he went to Philadelphia and became a teacher in the Institute for the Blind in that city; but his wife did much to inspire him with wider ambitions, and he soon relinquished his charge and went to Maine, where he became editor of the Kennebec Journal and afterwards of the Portland Advertiser. In 1859 he gave up journalism and adopted politics, being elected to the State Legislature in that year. He was re-elected four successive terms, during the last two of which he acted as Speaker. In 1862 he went to Congress.

His Congressional career for nearly twenty years was one of surpassing interest. He supported Lincoln in his policy during the Civil War, and bore a prominent share in all the great debates of that exciting period, as well as those that took place during the era of reconstruction that followed. He was one of the most vigorous opponents of the proposition to pay the public debt in greenbacks which was violently agitated in 1867. In 1869 he was chosen as Speaker of the House of Representatives, and served continuously in that capacity until the Democratic Party regained control of the Lower House. As Speaker he was both brilliant and successful, his rare familiarity with parliamentary law and his promptness in decision being something remarkable.

At various times in his career, Mr. Blaine experienced the bitter attacks of party opposition and personal enmity that fall to the lot of every prominent man in public life. He had, however, a very large circle of friends throughout the country, who loved him for the many excellent qualities he possessed, and who stood by him nobly during his trials. His dispute with Senator Roscoe Conkling, which led to a life-long alienation, was always regretted by Mr. Blaine.

Our readers are familiar with the later history of Mr. Blaine and his Presidential aspirations. His first great political disappointment occurred in 1876, when his friends confidently expected his nomination by the Cincinnati Convention, which selected ex-Gov. Rutherford B. Hayes instead. Again, in 1880, the nomination of Gen. Garfield postponed the realization of his hopes. In 1884, he was finally nominated by the Republican National Convention at Chicago, and after a most exciting campaign, was defeated by Mr. Cleveland, the election being decided by the result in New York State.

Mr. Blaine, whose whole career had been one of activity and excitement, failed greatly in health after that memorable contest, and he went abroad in 1886. His physical condition, however, was not so serious as to cause his friends to abandon hope of yet securing his nomination; but although an effort was made to do this at the Chicago Convention in 1888, the prize fell to Gen. Harrison. After the election, Mr. Blaine held the portfolio of Secretary of State under Harrison, as he had previously done during Garfield's administration. Of late years, severe domestic afflictions were added to Mr. Blaine's other burdens, and his vital powers began to show signs of giving way. Still the old fires of ambition smouldered, and shortly before the last National Republican Convention he resigned the office of Secretary of State, and placed himself again in the hands of his friends, as a candidate for the Presidency. The disappointment that followed was the deathblow to all his political hopes. He practically retired from public life, and lived quietly in Washington, in what is known as the old Seward Mansion, in which his family had resided during the administration of President Harrison. It is a house gloomy with the memories of historical tragedies; for it was in one of its chambers that Secretary Seward was attacked by an assassin, and before its doors Phillip Barton Key was shot down by Gen. Daniel E. Sickles. In the same building the wife of Secretary Belknap died while her husband was its tenant. Since the Blaines have occupied it, three members of the family—Walker Blaine, Emmons Blaine, and Mrs. John J. Coppinger (a daughter), have passed away. Here, also, Mr. Blaine died, in a room from the windows of which could almost be seen the Executive Mansion—the goal of his earthly ambition, which he had come so near reaching, only to fail in the end.

Those who knew Mr. Blaine best, declare that beneath the dignified official exterior, the late Secretary of State was warm-hearted, impulsive and kindly; a loving father and a good friend. He was a member of the Presbyterian congregation over which Rev. Teunis C. Hamlin presides in Washington, and was one of a number to guarantee a fund necessary for defraying the expenses of the church.

The American people admired him as one of the most brilliant public men of his time, a magnetic orator, a powerful debater, and a statesman whose abilities, counsel and aid were given to his country freely and unreservedly when most needed. His book, entitled "Twenty Years in Congress," is a masterpiece of historical autobiography, and while not wholly free from the bias of party, it is yet so just and able that it has won its author a high place among the standard historical writers of America.

HAWAII'S QUEEN DEPOSED.

For a long period, the little island kingdom of Hawaii, in the Pacific, has been distracted by internal strife. Not only were opposing commercial interests disturbing the tranquility of the country, but ever since the death of King David Kalakaua, the popular antagonism to a monarchical form of government has been growing and permeating all classes. Queen Liliuokalani, the successor of Queen Kapiolani on the Hawaiian throne, took measures to check this growing republicanism, which threatened suddenly to overthrow the monarchy. She distrusted even the members of her Cabinet, some of whom were undoubtedly favorable to a new order of things, and she took counsel with a few trusty advisers. Early in January a crisis was reached. The Queen's intimates informed certain Cabinet officers that "a blow was to be struck," and that Liliuokalani was about to coerce the Ministry into signing a new Constitution, under which the powers of the throne would be greatly increased, the franchise taken away from foreign-born citizens and the sovereign made absolute ruler. It was also learned that preparations had been made to secure the persons of the Cabinet officers, and imprison them, if extreme action became necessary. The Cabinet waited on the Queen, and urged her not to violate the laws, and tried in various ways to dissuade her from a revolutionary course; but Liliuokalani persisted, and even threatened violence. The Ministers, thereupon, appealed to the people to resist the Queen's despotic encroachments on their liberties. Another effort was made to induce her to reconsider her course, but it was futile. So alarming was the situation that an armed force of 300 marines and sailors from the U.S. warship Boston, was landed at Honolulu, and disposed at points where they could act to best advantage in keeping the peace in the event of a riot. The populace were furious against Liliuokalani. They had long wanted a new Constitution, but not of the nature she now intended forcing upon them. A great mass-meeting was held at which a Provisional Goverment was organized and a Committee of Public Safety appointed.

The new government assumed control of the palace and the army barracks, and the Queen, after formally yielding up her authority, retired to her private residence. A few days after her abdication, the Hawaiian steamer Claudine, with five Commissioners of the new government aboard, sailed for the United States, the Commissioners being instructed to negotiate a Treaty of Annexation with our own government. The Commissioners have arrived and are now in Washington. It is likely that the annexation proposition will be the subject of a prolonged negotiation, and may ultimately result in the establishment of an American protectorate for Hawaii. England, which has declined to recognize the new government at Honolulu, has large commercial interests in Hawaii, and may oppose annexation, and make an effort to place Princess Kiulani on the Hawaiian throne.

INTO GOSPEL LIGHT.

The Good Work Missionary Harry S. Prescott is Doing among the Blind in New South Wales.

MISSIONARY work among the blind is a class of service seldom thought of by those who enjoy the blessings of sight. Yet if an authentic record could be made of the services that have been rendered to humanity by those deprived of their natural sight, it would prove one of the most interesting and encouraging chapters of achievement that has ever been penned. Such names as Fawcett, Armitage, Campbell and Moon rise at once before the mental vision, as those who, while themselves shut out from the light of day, have brought the light of comfort and happiness, and the joys of a useful life, to many of their afflicted fellow-creatures.

Harry Schoolbridge Prescott (whose portrait from The Christian of London, we reproduce on this page), is a native of Staplehurst, Kent, England. He began active life in the humble role of a bricklayer's laborer. Having lost the use of one eye, he thought to better his prospects by emigrating. After some experience in this country he found his way to New Zealand. There, while a member of the police force, he became totally blind, and was the inmate of a hospital for nearly a year. Through the suggestion of a hospital visitor he learned to read from the raised characters for the blind and his reading of the Scriptures was the means of letting the light of heaven and salvation into his soul. While he was reading from the Acts of the Apostles one Sunday afternoon, in the Institute, a lame, blind lad stumbled against him as he groped his way along by the wall. Learning who he was, the boy asked him to read to him. The sound of the reader's voice attracted others, and thus began a regular Sunday reading class conducted by Mr. Prescott for both sexes. No proper religious teaching, it appears, had been provided at that time for the inmates of the Institute, and these Bible readings, with a daily prayer-meeting which was started, were a means of saving and guiding grace to not a few.

Mr. Prescott had now found his vocation; and with perseverance and growing success he has steadily pursued it. He went to Sydney in 1877 and the value of his work among the destitute blind soon began to be recognized, and a committee was formed to further it. His operations extended to other parts of the colony; and when he revisited England in 1886 he was able to say that he had traveled 60,000 miles seeking out, teaching, evangelizing, and otherwise helping his blind brethren and sisters. The mission was extended to South Australia and Queensland. In addition to teaching the blind to read, and supplying them with good literature, the mission embraced industrial work for those able to earn a livelihood, and a benevolent fund for the helpless and indigent. The Australian Government appreciated the value of the mission and subsidized it by giving an equal amount to that subscribed by the public.

The part taken in this good work by Mrs. Prescott, the wife of the missionary has been almost equal in importance to that borne by her husband. She was impressed with the [illegible] Institution in New South Wales into which could be gathered such blind women as could be found [illegible] secured a house, [illegible] it a number of [illegible] committee co-operating with her and [illegible] developed the work. In 1890, a plot of three acres in the Sydney suburb of Strathfield was bought on which to erect an Industrial Home for Blind Women. The Legislative Assembly generously refunded the purchase-money, £1,650, which went to swell the building fund. The Home was erected at a cost of £8,595. The memorial stone was laid by Lady Jersey, wife of the Governor-General, in March, 1891. The new home is a spacious, well-designed structure, having accommodation for some fifty inmates. Thus do this Christian couple lay out their lives for the good of those who are bereft of the blessing of vision.

A PRAYER IN A SHOW.

ONE of Mr. Whitefield's most devoted followers, Howell Harris by name, used to relate of himself that, being once on a journey through a district where he was not known, he was subjected to great temptations to desert his Master's cause, when he said, "Satan, I'll match thee for this!" "And so I did," he used to add, "for I had not ridden many miles before I came to a revel, where there was a show of mountebanks, which I entered, and just as they were commencing, I jumped into the midst of them and cried out, 'Let us pray,' which so thunderstruck them that they listened to me quietly, while I preached them a most tremendous sermon that startled many of them into real anxiety about their souls."

BALANCED WITH GOLD.

IN a letter from Neyoor, in Southern India, the Rev. I. H. Hacker, says: "We have been having a most instructive illustration of the great hold Hindoo notions have upon the rulers of their native state, in a ceremony which the Maharajah of Travancore, has been through under the guidance of Brahmin priests. In order to gain some privilege he was weighed in gold, and this gold made into coins to be distributed to the Brahmins. On the morning when the ceremony was performed, the Maharajah spent some time in worshipping the idol and repeating prayers. He then retired to his palace, changed his clothes, put on all his royal apparel, and armed with a shield and sword, he again went to the temple.

There were assembled all the Brahmins of the state, standing around the scales where the ceremony was to be performed. The King then walked around the scales three times, prostrated himself before the sacred part of the temple, and, receiving permission of the priests, he mounted the scales. Gold was put into the other until the Mahajarah, with shield, sword, and all his ornaments, rose high in the air. He was then allowed to descend, and having told the Brahmins to take the gold, he returned to his palace. This ceremony in which the King was 'worth his weight in gold' to the priests, cost 200,000 rupees or $100,000—all given to the Brahman caste. This is a most striking instance of the migbty power that priestism still has in the high places of India; and we must pray that the time may come that through Christ this native king may be weighed and not found wanting.

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. Its perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts slowly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and as scientific discovery never attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications to force all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE spares neither roots nor blossoms.

——Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.——

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Doings in Jerusalem.

A Letter from Rev. A. Ben-Oliel, the Presbyterian Missionary Pastor.

THE brain of the thoughtful resident of Jerusalem or that of the reflective tourist is crowded and oppressed, surcharged and bewildered, by the almost endless panorama-like procession of nationalities and costumes; bellicose, contending sects, contradictory, irreconcilable traditions concerning holy places; and the sound of diverse tongues and jargons found here. Foremost come the generally grave, proud, domineering, fatalistic Turks, Dervishes and fanatic Hadjis, intermixed with Moors, once masters of Spain, Drures from the Lebanon mountains, and Arabs from beyond Jordan—from Idumea, Moab, Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, Greeks or so-called orthodox Latins or Papists; Armenians, Copts, Melslutes, Maronites, Lutherans, Anglican Episcopalians, high and low, and now at last Presbyterians also. Then follow the Jews, the rightful heirs of the Land divided into Talmudists and Karaites, Cabalists and Chasidim, Sephardim and Ashkenazim, Yemanites and Moghrabin. In fact men of all lands and climes—from the jet-black negro of the Soudan, swelling with Mussulman pride and arrogance; intermediate Abyssinians, yellow Hindoos selling pretty stuffs and trinkets; to fair Europeans—intermingled with priests, monks and nuns of diverse sombre apparel. The Armenian priests are distinguishable by heads covered with the hoods of their long, black gowns. Patriarchs, Abbots, Bishops, Mufties, Talibs, Cadis, Pashaws, Effendis, fond of sweet bakshish; white-sheet-enveloped women, the Moslem sisters with veiled faces; tourists and pilgrims, the latter consisting in great part of Russian peasants; all interspersed with the abject poor, ragged, unwashed men, women and children, cripples, blind and half-blind, in larger proportions, alas! than in any other city. The picture of a railway speeding on, is superadded to the harassed, bewildered brain. When one goes outside the walls, lepers by the wayside claim thought and commiseration, besides importunate beggars everywhere. Travelers with the Jews uppermost in their thoughts, imagine that nearly all the beggars they meet must be Jews, whereas it is rare to see one begging of strangers in the streets. The Holy City is a very Babel of nationalities, religious systems and tongues. Those who ought to know aver that from twenty to thirty languages and dialects are spoken within its precincts.

The number of tourists from Protestant lands is yearly increasing, the United States sending a growing proportion, sometimes whole steamer-loads.

Those who have read of our work among the poor neglected Spanish Jewesses here will be pleased to hear that the mother's weekly sewing-meeting has been recommenced after the several Jewish feasts and fasts which occur during the month of October, when the Jewesses cannot work. We re-opened on Nov. 2d, and the difficulty was to decide which out of the many applying were to be admitted. It was necessary to limit the number to twenty, for at present I am single-handed. Also our funds, for buying materials, being exhausted, we felt it necessary to admit only the most needy, but many plead so hard to be taken on that it makes one's heart ache to have to refuse them. We have selected poor, deserving widows with several children, and the wives of blind men and invalids. The first part of the time is taken up by cutting out the garments needed; then when all are at work, while sewing, they learn a text and sing hymns, and at the close the missionary addresses them on the text and explains it, after which we give them a cup of coffee and a roll of bread.

My first visit to the Holy City was in Aug. 1889. On the morrow we went round the city, outside the walls, and my thoughts were centred on the search for Golgotha—"Gordon's Golgotha"—though others before the lamented General had been forcibly struck by its remarkable similitude to a skull; and so was I after going over it and around it thoughtfully; aye, pensively, with soft, almost trembling steps. Is it weakness to confess it? Approach the hillock, rather the detached northern end of the range of the Temple hill, which, contrary to general belief, I hold to be the true Zion—the City of David—more on this same time or other, and, as one nears it, it cries out in indubitable unmistakable accents, "Golgotha! Kranion!" the place that resembles a skull! It is so marvelously like a skull! There is no elevation or mound like it outside the walls of Jerusalem, nor inside either. Most assuredly, it is not the Turks who hold possession of it—for it is a Moslem cemetery—that have intentionally transformed it into that incontestable resemblance of a human skull. It must have assumed that shape long before the Turk was heard of. Another decisive fact is, the Jews call it to this very day—"the place of stoning"— of the execution of criminals. Thirdly, anything taking place on the top of it would be visible from the streets and houses on the declivities of the Tyropeon Valley, inhabited by the common people; from the roofs of all houses, and from the ramparts of the Temple area, and serves as a warning and terror to malefactors and rebels against the authority of proud priests and corrupt pharisees. Fourth, it is close to the portals of the ancient gate—leading to the then Gentile profane world—Samaria, Phœnicia, etc. Fifth, it is in proximity to the heaps of ashes—the sacrificial ashes, as I firmly believe, for there is no evidence that soap was ever manufactured in Jerusalem, as it is at Nablous; and, moreover, why should the ashes be mixed up with bits of charred bones? Sixth, it is within a short distance from the Pretorium—Pilate's judgment seat, and close to an undoubtedly ancient wall of the city. Seventh, a place of public execution would be selected for its prominence, visibility, and easy access, and on the defiled, polluted part outside the walls; and no other spot fulfils all these conditions so very markedly. It is therefore, in all probability the true Golgotha.

Telegraphic orders have been received from the Porte suspending transfers of landed properties in Palestine to Jewish purchasers, as also licences to build, causing perplexity to speculators and the fall of prices.

Jerusalem, Dec. 27, '92. A. BEN-OLIEL.

CONCILIATION IN CHINA.

THOUGH the Chinese officials are now disposed more than formerly to protect the Christians, the missionaries are very wisely averse to appealing to them until every milder resource has failed. Dr. J. W. Carlin, the Baptist missionary at Swatow writes: We have in the last six weeks preached and sold books in about forty towns and villages, at three fairs and two theatres. During that time we sold over one thousand books, and preached to more than ten thousand people, baptized seven, and I think, by the help of the Lord, put an end to persecution of Christians in one village where the Christians have suffered for two years.

Recently, one brother's rice field was invaded, and his rice pulled up or trodden down; another brother's house was broken into and robbed. I sent for the suspects, who, after repeated denials, acknowledged guilt. We then expostulated with them kindly on the sin and folly of such conduct, exhorting them to reinstate the brethren, and live in peace with them, which they agreed to do. They have paid all damages, and are now regular attendants upon Sanday service. The leading man of the village, who has been regarded as leader in these persecutions, had been sick for months, having besought his idols in vain to heal him; I gave him medicine, he recovered, and declared his intention to abandon idols. He bought some Christian books, which he read, as he said, with pleasure.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Mr. John Brooks, Sinnamahoning, Pa., writes apropos of a recent paragraph in "Our Mail-Bag:"

"I believe the Jews are correct as to Shem being Melchizedek as he was probably the greatest man living at the period of the Battle of the Kings, being in the line of the Messiah, spanning the deluge. He lived until Isaac was fifty years old, according to Bible chronology."

Mrs J. E. Decker, Echo Lake, N.J. I have read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the story of Blue Bird, and how she went to associates in the Tombs after she herself was converted, also how one associate became a Christian. I would like to do something for these people?

Write to Mrs. Whittemore, at the Door of Hope, 102 East Sixty-first Street, N. Y. City.

L. A. Allen, Pokagon. Mich. What is the magnetic pole?

The fact of a suspended magnet taking a fixed position led to the conclusion that the earth itself is a magnet, having its north and south magnetic poles near the poles of the axis of rotation, and that the magnetic needle turns to them as it would to the poles of a neighboring magnet. The north magnetic pole attracts the south pole of other magnets and vice versa. When large masses of iron are stationary for a long period, they become magnetized, and it is to the inductive action of the earth's poles acting throughout ages, that the magnetism of the loadstone is to be attributed.

Mrs. White, Corinth, N. Y. 1. What is the meaning of Urim and Thummim? 2. How many times was the Temple rebuilt?

1. The words mean "light and perfection." Moses was commanded to put the Urim and Thummim inside Aaron's breastplate and they passed with the other symbols of high priesthood to Aaron's successors, but no explanation is given of what they were. Josephus mentions the tradition that they were stones and that a supernatural effulgence glowed in them at times, the absence or presence of which was interpreted as an answer from God in difficult questions. 2. It was rebuilt by Zerubbabel in 516 B. C. and was afterward restored piecemeal by Herod about 9 B. C. and the work was not finally completed till 64 A. D. In the excavations recently made the excavators believe that they could trace the foundations in each case.

Rachel P. Whiting, Cedar Rapids, Mich. What authority have you for the statement that the world was occupied by destructive monsters before man was created?

The authority of fact. The fossil remains of those monsters are in all the large museums. They were found in a stratum of rocks which were evidently formed by conditions of climate and temperature, in which human life could not have existed. Every student of geology is convinced that there must have been a time in the history of the earth when there were no men upon it and the only living beings were fishes and animals of a low order of development.

S. C. Dodd, Randolph, Ia. 1. Is the Decalogue binding on Christians now? 2. Do saved men become angels in heaven or are they of a different order?

The Decalogue simply prohibits the more flagrant violations of moral laws. Its provisions do not cover the Christian's whole duty. If a man kept the whole ten commandments he might still fall short of Christ's requirements. The Decalogue is elementary. The Christian who is not under law but under grace must have the higher standard of the Gospels. 2. We can know very little of the conditions of life in heaven. Such hints as we get in the Bible appear to indicate that angels are a different order of beings from glorified men. See 1. Peter 1: 2; Ps. 103: 20 and other passages where both angels and spirits of men are mentioned.

[illegible] magistrate

1. He was a prominent resident, but whether a magistrate or not is unknown. 2. Commentators hold that for the crime of looking back, with longings toward Sodom, she was overtaken by the fire, and in dying was fixed to the soil for a time by saline or bituminous incrustations. There have been similar cases of persons who have been literally encrusted by [illegible] overwhelmed. Josephus, the Jewish historian, avers that he himself saw this pillar, and Clement of Rome his contemporary also asserts the fact. A pillar of this character—of solid salt, capped with carbonate of lime—was found on the S.W. shore of the Dead Sea near the ancient site of Sodom, or as it is now known, Usdum, by an American exploring party under Lieutenant Lynch in recent years. 3. He availed himself of his Uncle Abram's liberality in conceding the choice of pasture grounds and selected the rich and fertile "land of the plain" not far from Sodom, while Abram took the land at the foot of the mountains.

F. Guider, ——. In II. Kings 8: 26 it is stated that Ahaziah was twenty-two years old when he began to reign and in II. Chron. 22: 2 that he was forty-two years old at the time. How can you reconcile the two statements?

The statement in Kings is correct. That in Chronicles is clearly an error as it would make the man older than his father. The letter the Hebrews used for twenty is so like the one they used for forty that the merest speck on the paper might make the sign for twenty appear the sign for forty and at some time a copyist mistook it and his blunder has gone on down to the present time. There is so strong a prejudice against making a change in the text of the Bible that it has been deemed unwise to correct even an obvious clerical error which probably was not in the original.

Louis Schoelkopf, Bear Creek, Wis. How do you reconcile the two following contradictions: 1. In II. Samuel 6: 23 it is stated that Michal Saul's daughter had no child and in II Samuel 21: 8 she is represented as the mother of five children. 2. In Acts 9: 7 it is stated that the men with Saul heard the voice and in Acts 22: 9 that they did not hear it?

1. The five children mentioned do not appear to have been the sons of Michal herself. She is stated in the passage you quote to have brought them up for Adriel who as you will see by referring to 1. Samuel 18: 19 was the husband of Merab another daughter of Saul. The natural inference is that Merab died and Michal became foster mother to her sister's children. 2. The statement in Acts 22: 9 probably means that the men heard the voice but did not distinguish the words, did not hear it articulately. It is quite common for people to say they could not hear a speaker when they mean they could not catch the sentences so as to follow his meaning.

Buffalo Lithia Water

A POWERFUL SOLVENT OF STONE IN THE BLADDER.

The following plate is from a photograph which forms a part of a communication of Dr. George H. Pierce, of Danbury, Conn., to the New England Medical Monthly for November, 1890 (see page 76 of that journal), and represents some of the largest specimens of Two Ounces and Twenty-seven Grains of Dissolved Stone discharged by a Patient designated as "Mr. S." under the action of Smaller Particles and a Quantity of Brick Dust Deposit, Dr. P. states, were not estimated.

G. Halsted Boyland, M.A., M.D., of the Faculty of Paris and University of Leipzig, formerly Professor in the Baltimore Medical College, etc.:

"73 AVENUE D'ANTIN, PARIS.

"In Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Acute or Chronic, BUFFALO LITHIA WATER, Spring No. 2, is in my experience without a rival, whether in the Parenchymatous form or Interstitial Nephritis. In cases in which Albumen reached as high as fifty per cent., I have known it, under a course of this Water, gradually diminish and finally disappear, at the same time other alarming symptoms were relieved and the sufferers restored to health.

"The best results which I have witnessed from and remedy in Gouty and Rheumatic Affections have been from this Water, and in all diseases of Uric Acid Diathesis it possesses great excellence.

"In Stone in the Bladder of the Red Lithic Acid and the White Phosphatic Deposit, its Solvent power is unmistakable. Its value, however, in such cases is not restricted to its Solvent power over these deposits, but it meets the important indication, that of so changing the Diathesis on which the formation depends as to prevent re-formation."

These waters are eminently a NERVE TONIC, and in all NERVOUS EXHAUSTION and any FORMS of DYSPEPSIA and in female complaints are among the most potent of known remedies.

ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR RAMEY'S MEDICATOR. TAKE NO OTHER

MONUMENTS.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

BEHIND me one day, as I was traveling on a train in Ohio, sat two gentlemen talking about monuments. Style, material and price, were discussed in detail, and their dead friend, if he heard what they were saying, must have felt flattered by the way they proposed to keep his memory green. I was tempted to ask why their friend did not build his own monument while he lived, but I refrained. I did want to tell them of a woman, who did that very thing, and it may be, those men will read the story if I let my pen tell it here.

Oh, she was was a glorious woman, but she had such old-fashioned notions. For instance, she believed that those who heard the "good tidings of great joy," and had been made happy thereby, ought to go and tell those "good tidings" to some one who had not heard them. And, strange to say, she really thought those who were furthest away and the deeper down in sin, ought to hear them as well as other folks. This idea got so deeply rooted in her very nature, she decided to carry the "good tidings" to the drunkards and magdalens of the big city. Her home was as beautiful and comfortable as ample means could make it, and she moved in the best circles of society. Some would have said she belonged to the "first-cut," but there must have been some mistake about that, as a visit to any old saw-mill in the country will show that the "first-cut" is generally a slab. The nose of society went up, as this glorious woman went down—down among the outcast, down where vice was queen, down where men drank ruin and women stood on the pit infernal—down, down, down. And down went the "good tidings" with her. They were in her very face, in the grip of her hand, in her sweet voice, in the tears of sympathy that filled her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. Oh! she was "good tidings" herself, for Christ was with her. At her coming, the drunkard put away his cups and became sober; the magdalen gave up her sin, and found "great joy;" the poor became rich; the bound became free; all hell cursed her, while all Heaven rejoiced. Many a dying outcast had the pillow smoothed by her hand, while the "good tidings" were sung into willing ears, and talked and prayed into hungry hearts.

Oh! she was a glorious woman! For she gave all—even herself. One day, or night rather, she carried down the "good tidings" for the last time, and brought back disease that soon laid her low in death. She gave her life, and society said, "Such a sacrifice and no return." No return! Who dare say that? Come to the funeral and behold the return. House and stoop, and sidewalk and street crowded with the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the woman in velvet and the outcast in rags, "upper ten" and "lower twenty." See that man with patched clothes and streaming eyes, crowding and pushing his way up the stoop and saying with choking voice, "Please let me get in. I must see her face once more before they bury her." Broadcloths and silks gave way before that plea, and then at the coffin side stands the pleader. Such grief! He looks around furtively and then, leaning over reverently he kisses the brow of the dead woman, and as his tears fall on her face, he moans out, "Oh, God, what shall I do? What shall I do? She saved my soul What shall I do now?" Behold the return, and let society give her answer to the question, does it pay? Many a man and woman in that throng of mourners, would have gladly given all their wealth to have been sure of a monument like that poor man's tears and testimony. "She saved my soul!"

Up in Chautauqua County, in New York State, is a grave, over which stands a marble monument; but the grandest monument was the one built in that man's heart and life; for, when marble shall crumble, and Buffalo shall disappear, and this old world is gone, that monument of a soul saved will be a star that shall shine in that glorious woman's crown forever and ever.

Would that there were many more than there are, who would have notions so old-fashioned, as would insure the "good tidings of great joy" being carried to the "uttermost" place where this "whosoever" sinner is to be found.

PREACHING TO FRENCH SOLDIERS.

FROM one of Dr. McAll's Evanglists in the French capital comes the report of very successful efforts to preach the Gospel to the soldiers. It was at first done by conversations with single men and groups in the streets. "The Lord blessed this beginning," he says, "with two or three conversions, which encouraged us to believe that a great work might be done if we could have a hall for the purpose. The Mission approved, but had no money for this purpose. However, the Lord made my way easy. A prayerful doorkeeper of the Mission was successful in immediately finding a proper place, which a very kind Roman Catholic landlord was quite willing to lease to me. He even refused some better proposals and accepted the small sum of money I could afford to give. The house was just between the two largest barracks of Paris, near the Champ de Mars and the military school. The whole of the small house was hired for nine years, with a right to keep it other nine years if it pleased us. A converted Roman Catholic priest was engaged to give lessons every evening, and as soon as all was arranged, some soldiers, four at first, increasing between fifty and sixty, came every evening from five to nine o'clock during the winter. Bible classes and divine services are regularly held, and are appreciated just as much as the games and singing lessons. Addresses and lectures have been given by our best men, even by deputies and political men. Dissolving views have been found attractive, and as we get better known and our premises made still more convenient, we can expect a far more successful winter this year. Among the two or three hundred soldiers who are accustomed to drop in more or less frequently, the very best spirit has always prevailed."

DREADED PORTENTS.

THE people of Madura City, India, are deeply concerned over an accident which occurred at the recent idolatrous festival. The idols were drawn through the streets of the city, which were crowded with the people of the city and many others who had come from the villages for many miles around to witness the ceremony. Fifty Christian evangelists were preaching at various open spaces. It appears that the chief car on which was carried the principal idol stuck fast in the street, and could be moved only by getting a jack-screw from the railway shop. Another accident dampened the zeal of the worshipers. A famous idol, which had been brought from a temple twelve miles distant, was insecurely fastened to its frame, and tumbled off with its priest. The priest was wounded, and one of the pullers was fatally injured. The devotees at the great temple were much disturbed over these disasters which they regard as dire omens.

THOUSANDS OF HAPPY PENSIONERS.

Disregarding the Wiles of the Saloon-keepers, they Crowd like an Army Around "The Christian Herald" Free Check-Cashing Bureau, with Their Pension Warrants — A Glorious Work at the G. A. R. Mission in New York—Scenes and Incidents.

DURING the first week of the present month, a scene of unusual interest—which has now been repeated at regular intervals every three months for a full year—occurred at the United States Pension Building on Canal Street, New York. The occasion was the opening for the fourth time since May, 1892, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Free Check-Cashing Bureau for the use of Army Pensioners. All night long, the large hall of the Grand Army Mission, in the Pension Agency building, had been crowded with veterans or their relatives and dependents, many of them coming from a great distance. Strains of sacred song, and the voice of prayer and exhortation had floated out from the densely-thronged hall into the bitterly cold street, where long lines of pensioners had been formed awaiting the hour when Col. Frank C. Loveland, the Government Pension Agent, would open his office. Throughout the night, Col. H. H. Hadley, the evangelist and his associates in the charge of the Mission, spoke to an interested though constantly changing audience, to whom coffee and sandwiches were served in the intervals of worship.

WAITING THEIR TURN.

Shortly after daybreak, on Saturday, Feb. 4th, the issuing of pension checks began for the first quarter of 1893. At each successive quarter the number of veterans who have availed themselves of the facilities of the Free Check-Cashing Bureau has greatly increased, and on this occasion it exceeded all precedent. During the period of payment, Agent Loveland issues checks at the rate of $50,000 per hour, and every check is cashed in gold, silver or bank bills as soon as presented at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Check-Cashing Bureau in the Mission Hall. As on the three previous occasions, sufficient funds for all contingencies were provided by Mr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who again personally superintended the operations of the Bureau, assisted by the usual force of expert clerks and messengers. The total issue of government pension checks aggregated $2,500,000, and all checks presented at the desk of the paying teller in the Free Check-Cashing Bureau, after endorsement were promptly honored.

Some of the older and more feeble among the pensioners suffered greatly from the cold and were glad to gain the comfortable shelter of the Mission. As usual, there were many women in the crowds that gathered from day to day. Every stage of physical disability was represented among the veterans; the lame, the legless, the blind, the paralyzed and others whose weary dragging of the tottering limbs showed that for them, at least, the end of life's march had nearly been reached and that soon they would have to answer the last roll-call. Empty sleeves and crutches were everywhere. And let it be said to the credit of the old soldiers that it was a sober gathering in comparison with those of other years, when the rum-shops had it all their own way. True, the saloons in the neighborhood, as on former pension days, made a tempting display of their attractions in the way of free lunches and bars dazzling with crystal and plated ware; but the veterans, having once routed the old enemy, resolutely turned their backs upon the saloons and after enjoying the services and hospitality of the Mission and cashing their checks at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bureau, went home, carrying with them many thousands of dollars which otherwise would have dropped into the bartenders' cash drawer.

Smarting under previous defeats, the saloon-keepers had resorted to new devices to entice the old soldiers into the bar-rooms. A number of them had canvassers at work among the crowds that surrounded the Pension Office, and some were even so brazen as to enter the Mission hall. There were women canvassers, too — poor, shameless creatures, who urgently invited the wives and daughters of the veterans to come to the rum-shops. Fortunately, there were but few responses.

At different times during the cashing of the checks by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bureau incidents occurred that showed the keen appreciation and hearty gratitude of the pensioners at their emancipation from the saloons. The weather outdoors was intensely cold.

"Oh!" exclaimed an elderly woman — a soldier's widow—"I had to come early this mornin', 'cause I needed the money bad. God bless the men who advance the money to us poor creatures, for he only knows wha. we would do without it." "Come this way, father," said a tall, slender girl to a blind man. "Come to the front. They give blind folks their money first, don't you mister?" she asked of a clerk of the Bureau. "Ye see, sir, father is blind and old now Will you wait on him? Oh, thank ye, mister! Here father, let me put the money in yer coat, for ye. Good-bye, sir," and the pair moved off as a policeman cleared the way for them through the crowd. "You ought to hear them," said a stout, elderly veteran, as he hobbled forward on his crutch —"I mean the saloon fellows. They came to me and held out all kinds o' promises if I'd come there with my paper; but I want to go home. They rob me every time, and heaven knows my wife and the little folks need all the pension I get." He deposited his cash in an inner pocket, buttoned up the faded overcoat and limped away smiling "They shan't get a cent of me this time," he observed to a friend, as he left the hall.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

THE COLOSSEUM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Romans 1: 15, "I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome, also."

ROME! What a city it was when Paul visited it! What a city it is now! Rome! The place where Virgil sang and Horace satirized and Terence laughed and Cataline conspired and Ovid dramatized and Nero fiddled and Vespasian persecuted and Sulla legislated and Cicero thundered and Aurelius and Decius and Caligula and Julian and Hadrian and Constantine and Augustus reigned, and Paul, the Apostle, preached the Gospel.

I am not much of a draftsman, but I have in my memorandum book a sketch which I made in the winter of 1889, when I went out to the gate through which Paul entered Rome, and walked up the very street he walked up to see somewhat how the city must have looked to him as he came in on the Gospel errand proposed in the text. Palaces on either side of the street through which the little missionary advanced. Piled up wickedness. Enthroned accursedness. Templed cruelties. Altars to sham deities. Glorified delusions. Pillared, arched, domed, turreted abominations. Wickedness of all sorts at a high premium and Righteousness ninety-nine and three-fourths per cent. off. And now he passes by the foundations of a building which is to be almost unparalleled for vastness. You can see by the walls, which have begun to rise, that here is to be something enough stupendous to astound the centuries. Aye, it is the Colosseum started.

Of the theatre at Ephesus where Paul fought with wild beasts, of the temple of Diana, of the Parthenon, of Pharaoh's palace at Memphis, and of other great buildings, the ruins of which I have seen, it has been my privilege to address you, but a member of my family asked me recently why I had not spoken to you of the Colosseum at Rome, since its moral and religious lessons are so impressive.

Perhaps, while in Rome, the law of contrast wrought upon me. I had visited the Mamertine dungeon where Paul was incarcerated. I had measured the opening at the top of the dungeon through which Paul had been let down and it was twenty-three inches by twenty-six. The ceiling, at its highest point, was seven feet from the floor, but at the sides of the room, the ceiling was five feet, seven inches. The room, at the widest, was fifteen feet. There was a seat of rock two and a half feet high. There was a shelf four feet high. The only furniture was a spider's web suspended from the roof, which I saw by the torchlight I carried. There was the subterraneous passage from the dungeon to the Roman forum, so that the prisoner could be taken directly from prison to trial. The dungeon was built out of volcanic stone from the Albano Mountains. Oh, it was a dismal and terrific place. You never saw coal hole so dark or so forbidding. The place was to me a nervous shock, for I remembered that was the best thing that the world would afford the most illustrious being, except One, that it ever saw, and that from that place Paul went out to die. From that spot, I visited the Colosseum, one of the most astounding miracles of architecture that the world ever saw. Indeed I saw it morning, noon and night, for it threw a spell on me from which I could not break away. Although now a vast ruin, the Colosseum is so well preserved that we can stand in the centre and recall all that it once was. It is in shape ellipsoidal, oval, oblong. It is, at its greatest length, 612 feet. After it had furnished seats for eighty-seven thousand people, it had room for fifteen thousand more to stand, so that one hundred thousand people could sit and stand transfixed by its scenes of courage and martyrdom and brutality and horror. Instead of our modern tickets of admission, they entered by ivory check, and a check dug up near Rome within a few years, was marked: "Section 6, Lowest Tier, Seat No. 18." You understand that the building was not constructed for an audience to be addressed by human voice, although I tested it with some friends and could be heard across it, but it was made only for seeing and was circular and at any point allowed full view of the spectacle. The arena in the centre in olden times was strewn with pounded stone or sand, so as not to be too slippery with human blood, for if it were too slippery, it would spoil the fun. The sand flashed here and there with sparkles of silver and gold, and Nero added cinnabar and Caligula added chrysocolla. The sides of the arena were composed of smooth marble, eleven feet high, so that the wild beasts of the arena could not climb up into the audience. On the top of these sides of smooth marble was a metal railing, having wooden rollers, which easily revolved, so that if a panther should leap high enough to scale the wall and with his paw touch any one of those rollers, it would revolve and drop him back again into the arena. Back of this marble wall surrounding the arena was a level platform of stone, adorned with statues of gods and goddesses and the artistic effigies of monarchs and conquerors. Here were movable seats for the emperor and the imperial swine and swinesses with which he surrounded himself. Before the place where the emperor sat, the gladiators would walk immediately after entering the arena, crying: "Hail, Cæsar! Those about to die salute thee." The different ranks of spectators were divided by partitions studded with mosaics of emerald and beryl and ruby and diamond. Great masts of wood arose from all sides of the building, from which festoons of flowers were suspended, crossing the building, or in time of rain, awnings of silk were suspended, the Colosseum having no roof. The outside wall was encrusted with marble and had four ranges, and the three lower ranges had eighty columns each and arches after arches, and on each arch an exquisite statue of a god or a hero. Into 180 feet of altitude soared the Colosseum. It glittered and flashed and shone with whole sunrises and sunsets of dazzlement. After the audience had assembled, aromatic liquids oozed from tubes distilled from pipes and rained gently on the multitudes, and filled the air with odors of hyacinth and heliotrope and frankincense and balsam and myrrh and saffron, so that Lucan, the poet, says of it:

> At once ten thousand saffron currents flow,
> And rain their odors on the crowd below.

But where was the sport to come from? Well, I went into the cellars opening off from the arena, and I saw the places where they kept the hyenas and lions and panthers and wild boars and beastly violences of all sorts, without food or water until made fierce enough for the arena, and I saw the underground rooms where the gladiators were accustomed to wait until the clapping of the people outside demanded that they come forth armed to murder or to be murdered. All the arrangements were complete, as enough of the cellars and galleries still remain to indicate. What fun they must have had turning lions without food or drink for a week upon an unarmed disciple of Jesus Christ! At the dedication of this Colosseum, nine thousand wild beasts and ten thousand immortal men were slain; so that the blood of men and beast was not a brook but a river, not a pool but a lake. Having been in that way dedicated, be not surprised when I tell you that Emperor Probus on one occasion threw into that arena of the Colosseum a thousand stags, a thousand boars and a thousand ostriches. What fun it must have been! the sound of trumpets, the roar of wild beasts and the groans of dying men! while in the gallery the wives and children of those down under the lion's paw wrung their hands and shrieked out in widowhood and orphanage, while one hundred thousand people clapped their hands, and there was a "Ha! Ha!" wide as Rome and deep as perdition. The corpses of that arena were put on a cart or dragged by a hook out through what was called the Gate of Death. What an excitement it must have been when two combatants entered the arena, the one with sword and shield and the other with net and spear. The swordsman strikes at the man with the net and spear; he dodges the sword, and then flings the net over the head of the swordsman and jerks him to the floor of the arena, and the man who flung the net puts his foot on the neck of the fallen swordsman, and, spear in hand, looks up to the galleries, as much as to say: "Shall I let him up, or shall I plunge this spear into his body until he is dead?" The audience had two signs, either of which they might give. If they waved their flags, it meant spare the fallen contestant. If they turned their thumbs down, it meant slay him. Occasionally the audience would wave their flags and the fallen would be let up, but that was too tame sport for most occasions, and generally the thumbs from the galleries were turned down, and with that sign would be heard the accompanying shout of "Kill! Kill! Kill! Kill!"

Yet it was far from being a monotone of sport, for there was a change of programme in that wondrous Colosseum. Under a strange and powerful machinery, beyond anything of modern invention, the floor of the arena would begin to rock and roll and then give away, and there would appear a lake of bright water, and on its banks trees would spring up rustling with foliage, and tigers appeared among the jungles, and armed men would come forth, and there would be a tiger hunt. Then, on the lake in the Colosseum, armed ships would float, and there would be a sea fight. What fun! What lots of fun! When pestilence came, in order to appease the gods, in this Colosseum a sacrifice would be made, and the people would throng that great amphitheatre, shouting: "The Christians to the wild beasts," and there would be a crackling of human bones in the jaws of leonine ferocity.

But all this was to be stopped. By the outraged sense of public decency? No.' There is only one thing that has ever stopped cruelty and sin, and that is Christianity, and it was Christianity, whether you like its form or not, that stopped this massacre of centuries. One day while, in the Colosseum, a Roman victory was being celebrated, and one hundred thousand enraptured spectators were looking down upon two gladiators in the arena stabbing and slicing each other to death, an Asiatic monk by the name of Telemachus was so overcome by the cruelty that he leaped from the gallery into the arena and ran in between the two swordsmen, and pushed first one back and then the other back and broke up the contest. Of course, the audience was affronted at having their sport stopped, and they hurled stones at the head of Telemachus until he fell dead in the arena. But when the day was passed and the passions of the people had cooled off, they deplored the martyrdom of the brave and Christian Telemachus, and as a result of the overdone cruelty, the human sacrifices of the Colosseum were forever abolished.

What a good thing, say you, that such cruelties have ceased. My friends, the same spirit of ruinous amusements and of moral sacrifice is abroad in the world to-day although it takes other shapes. Last summer in our Southwest there occurred a scene of pugilism on which all Christendom looked down, for I saw the papers on the other side of the Atlantic ocean giving whole columns of it. Will some one tell me in what respect that brutality of last summer was superior to the brutality of the Roman Colosseum? In some respects it was worse, by so much as the Nineteenth Century pretends to be more merciful and more decent than the Fifth Century. That pugilism is winning admiration in this country is positively proved by the fact that years ago such collision was reported in a half dozen lines of newspaper, if reported at all, and now it takes the whole side of a newspaper to tell what transpired between the first blood drawn by one loafer and the throwing up of the sponge by the other loafer, and it is not the newspaper's fault, for the newspapers give only what the people want, and when newspapers put carrion on your table, it is because you prefer carrion. The same spirit of brutality is seen to-day in many an ecclesiastical court when a minister is put on trial. Look at the countenances of the prosecuting ministers and not in all cases but in many cases, you will find nothing but diabolism inspires them. They let out on one poor minister who cannot defend himself, the lion of ecclesiasticism and the tiger of bigotry and the wild boar of jealousy, and if they can get the offending minister flat on his back, some one puts his feet on the neck of the overthrown Gospelizer and looks up, spear in hand, to see whether the galleries and ecclesiastics would have him let up or slain. And, lo! many of the thumbs are down.

In the worldly realms look at the brutalities of the presidential election eight years ago. Read the biographies of Daniel Webster and Alexander H. Stephens and Horace Greeley and Charles Sumner and Lucius Quintius Lamar and James G. Blaine, and if the story of defamation and calumny and scandalization and diatribe and scurrility and lampoon and billingsgate and damnable perfidy be accurately recorded, tell me in what respects our political arena and the howling and blaspheming galleries that again and again look down upon it are better than the Roman Colosseum. When I read a few days ago that the Supreme Court of the United States had appropriately adjourned to pay honors to the two last distinguished men mentioned, and American journalism, North, South, East and West, went into lamentations over their departure and said all complimentary things in regard to them, I asked, When did the nation lie about these men? Was it when, during their life, it gave them malediction, or now, since their death, when bestowing upon them beatification. The same spirit of cruelty that you deplore in the Roman Colosseum is seen in the sharp appetite the world seems to have for the downfall of good men, and in the divorce of those whose marital life was thought accordant, and in the absconding of a bank cashier. Oh, my friends, the world wants more of the spirit of "Let-him-up," and less of the spirit of "Thumbs-down." There are hundreds of men in the prisons of America who ought to be discharged, because they were the victims of circumstances or have suffered enough. There are in all professions and occupations, men who are domineered over by others and whose whole life is a struggle with monstrous opposition, and circumstances have their heel upon the throbbing and broken hearts. For God's sake, let them up! Away with the spirit of "Thumbs-down!" What the world wants is a thousand men like Telemachus to leap out of the gallery into the arena, whether he be a Roman Catholic monk or a Methodist steward, or a Presbyterian elder, and go in between the contestants. "Bessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

One half the world is down and the other half is up, and the half that is up has its heel on the half that is down. If you, as a boss workman, or as a contractor, or as a bishop, or as a state or national official, or as a potent factor in social life, or in any way, are oppressing anyone, know that the same devil that possessed the Roman Colosseum oppresses you. The Diocletians are not all dead. The cellars leading into the arena of life's struggle are not all emptied of their tigers. The vivisection by young doctors of dogs and cats and birds most of the time adds nothing to human discovery, but is only a continuation of Vespasian's Colosseum. The cruelties of the world generally begin in nurseries and in home circles and in day schools. The child that transfixes a fly with a pin, or the low feeling that sets two dogs into combat, or that bullies a weak or crippled playmate, or the indifference that starves a canary bird, needs only to be developed in order to make a first-class Nero or a full armed Apollyon. It would be a good sentence to be written on the top line of a child's book, and a fit inscription to be embroidered in the arm-chair of the sitting-room, and an appropriate motto for judge and jury and district attorney and sheriff to look at in the court house: "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

And so the ruins of that Colosseum preach to me. Indeed the most impressive things on earth are ruins. The four greatest structures ever built are in ruins. The Parthenon in ruins. The Temple of Diana in ruins. The Temple of Jerusalem in ruins. The Colosseum in ruins. Indeed the earth itself will yet be a pile of ruins, the mountains in ruins, the seas in ruins, the cities in ruins, the hemispheres in ruins. Yea, further than that, all up and down the heavens are worlds burned up, worlds wrecked, worlds extinct, worlds abandoned. Worlds on worlds in ruins! But I am glad to say it is the same old heaven, and in all that world there is not one ruin and never will be a ruin. Not one of the pearly gates will ever become unhinged. Not one of the amethystine towers will ever fall. Not one of the mansions will ever decay. Not one of the chariots will ever be unwheeled. Not one of the thrones will ever rock down. Oh, make sure of heaven, for it is an everlasting heaven. Through Christ, the Lord, get ready for residence in the eternal palaces.

The last evening before leaving Rome for Brindisi and Athens and Egypt and Palestine, I went alone to the Colosseum. There was not a living soul in all the immense area. Even those accustomed to sell curios at the four entrances of the building had gone away. The place was so overwhelmingly silent, I could hear my own heart beat with the emotions aroused by the place and hour. I paced the arena. I walked down into the dens where the hyenas were once kept. I ascended to the place where the Emperor used to sit. I climbed up on the galleries from which the mighty throngs of people had gazed in enchantment. To break the silence, I shouted, and that seemed to awaken the echoes, echo upon echo. And those awakened echoes seemed to address me, saying: "Men die but their work lives on. Gaudentius, the architect who planned this structure, the sixty thousand enslaved Jews brought by Titus from Jerusalem and who toiled on these walls, the gladiators who fought in this arena, the emperors and empresses who had place on yonder platform, the millions who, during centuries, sat and rose in these galleries, have passed away, but enough of the Colosseum stands to tell the story of cruelty and pomp and power. Five hundred years of bloodshed." Then, as I stood there, there came to me another burst of echoes, which seemed throbbing with the prayers and songs and groans of Christians who had expired in that arena, and they seemed to say: "How much it cost to serve God in ages past, and how thankful modern centuries ought to be that the persecution which reddened the sands of this amphitheatre have been abolished." And then I questioned the echoes, saying: "Where is Emperor Titus who sat here?" The answer came: "Gone to judgment." "Where is Emperor Trajan who sat here?" "Gone to judgment." "Where is Emperor Maximinus who sat here?" "Gone to judgment." "Where are all the multitudes who clapped and shouted and waved flags to let the vanquished up, or to have them slain, put thumbs down?" The echoes answered: "Gone to judgment." I inquired: "All?" And they answered: "All." And I looked up to the sky above the ruins, and it was full of clouds scurrying swiftly past, and those clouds seemed as though they had faces, and some of the faces smiled and some of them frowned, and they seemed to have wings, and some of the wings were moon-gilt and the others thunder-charged, and the voices of those clouds overpowered the echoes beneath. "Behold he cometh with clouds and every eye shall see him." And as I stood looking up along the walls of the Colosseum, they rose higher and higher, higher and higher, until the amphitheatre seemed to be filled with all the nations of the past and all the nations of the present and all the nations of the future, those who went down under the paws of wild beasts, and those who sat waving flags to let up the conquered, and those who held thumbs down to command their assassination, and small and great, and emperor and slave, and pastor and people, and righteous and wicked, the amphitheatre seeming to rise to infinite heights on all sides of me, and in the centre of that amphitheatre, instead of the arena of combatants, a great throne stood, rising higher and higher, higher and higher, and on it sat the Christ for whom the martyrs died and against whom the Diocletians plotted their persecutions, and waving one hand toward the piled up splendors to the right of him, he cried: "Come, ye blessed," and waving the other hand toward the piled up glooms on the left of him, he cried: "Depart, ye cursed." And so the Colosseum of Rome that evening of 1889 seemed enlarged into the amphitheatre of the Last Judgment, and I passed from under the arch of that mighty structure, mighty even in its ruins, praying to Almighty God, through Jesus Christ, for mercy in that day for which all other days were made, and that as I expected mercy from God, I might exercise mercy toward others, and have more and more of the spirit of "Let-him-up" and less and less of the spirit of "Thumbs-down." We may not all be able to do a sum in higher mathematics, but there is a sum in the first rule of Gospel arithmetic which we all may do. It is a sum in simple addition. "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity."

A Royal Convert.

How Katagery, Sultan of the Tartars, was Won by the Gospel.

ONE of the most brilliant triumphs of Christianity among the Tartars, during the early missions to that country, was the conversion of Sultan Katagery, a powerful Mohammedan ruler of the Sonnas, concerning whom Mr. Brunton, a missionary, wrote:

"For some time he appeared in a very unhappy state of mind, and neither adhered to the Mohammedan nor to the Christian religion. At last he formed a resolution of denouncing the delusion in which he had been educated, and after making it known to some of us privately, he publicly declared his belief in the Christian religion, and his determination to abide by it. He continued steadfast in the profession of Christianity, notwithstanding the persecution he met with from his relations, and the derision with which he was treated by his acquaintances. His talents were of a superior kind. He could soon read a chapter in the Bible with little difficulty. He frequently attempted to support the Christian religion, even against the Molos and Effendis. He met with much persecution from his friends and others, on account of his religion. They seldom addressed him but by some opprobrious name.

"Katagery daily, zealously and eloquently defends Christianity. One evening I read to the family, in the Tartar language, the 14th and 15th chapters of St. John's Gospel. Katagery was standing behind me. Hearing him make some noise, I looked round. The tears were running plentifully down his cheeks; and he was so affected with what he had heard, that for some time he could not speak. Next morning he sent me word that he wished his baptism should be no longer delayed, as he did not know how soon he might die. Having no scruples in my own mind, I desired Mr. Mitchell to mention the matter to the brethren. They were all heartily willing. Accordingly, when sermon was ended in the afternoon, I mentioned the business to our little congregation, and as no objection was made, I administered to him the ordinance of baptism.

"Katagery visited Doulet, talking for some hours with the people on religious topics. Among other things, he told them, that, according to their own confession, they were sinners: that some way of being delivered from the consequences of their sins was desired by all: that the best of them were very bad: that it was impossible for them to form a just estimate of the quantity of virtue requisite for their salvation, according to the law of the Koran; that although this law was bad in itself, yet their conduct was worse; therefore they could not be saved by it: that if we considered a religious law in the light of a covenant, to break any part of it was to render the whole useless: that Mohammed's own conduct was exceedingly immoral, consequently neither his law nor his intercession could be of any avail to them: that all men acknowledged the necessity of a mediator: that no mediator but Jesus Christ had qualifications requisite for completing their salvation; and that the character of Jesus was to be learned from the New Testament, the truth and divine authority of which no Mohammedan doctors would venture to deny. He then enforced his discourse by a view of the future consequences of continuing in sin."

The history of this young man is particularly interesting. He was lineally descended from the khans of the Crimea, and was allied to some of the greatest families in the east. His father being one of the chiefs in the immediate neighborhood of Karass, he became acquainted with Mr. Brunton soon after his arrival in Tartary. Mr. Brunton, interested by his amiable appearance and disposition, began to instruct him in the principles of Christianity; and it was not long till he perceived its vast superiority to the religion in which he had been educated. He publicly professed himself a Christian, and zealously endeavored to spread the Word.

Katagery labored much to convert to Christianity his uncle, Islam Gerry, who showed him great kindness, and listened more to what he said than was agreeable to some of the Tartars. Ali, the son of Shaker, a Mirzah, one of whose wives was Islam Gerry's daughter, called Katagery an infidel dog, and asserted that it would be meritorious to kill him, on account of his efforts to make his countrymen Christians. Islam Gerry was finally converted.

The result of Katagery's labors was the inbringing of many Tartars to the Christian fold. He has now passed to his promised reward, but the Church of Christ in Tartary holds his memory in high esteem as the one brave chieftain who, in those days of trial, came out boldly as the friend of the missionaries and risked all for Jesus.

READING THE LAW.

S. S. Lesson For Feb. 26 Neh. 8: 1-12. Golden Text, Ps. 119: 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT was God's doing when, after rebuilding the temple and then the city wall, "all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the broad place that was before the water gate and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Moses." Such a movement never originated with man. It is a good sign when a people thirsts for the word of the living God. It is one of the three precious gifts which the Lord Jesus gave to those whom the Father had given him: his "life," his "word," his "glory." The Lord Jesus himself was A Bible Student.

Even as a child, he astonished the doctors in the Temple by his knowledge of the word, "his understanding and answers." As man, he had to learn as well as to suffer like other men; he was taught as other men are; and here again, his knowledge of the Scriptures was manifest for in each temptation he met the enemy with words of Scripture: "It is written," and not with his own words. Again and again in dealing with the Pharisees and Sadducees. He appealed to them from the written word: "Have ye not read?"

The returned Jewish captives, who, in their humiliation, were in a condition to learn, sought for a true and practical knowledge of the word. Ezra was "a ready scribe in the law of Moses, which the Lord God of Israel had given." This was the man they needed. It was on a solemn day, the first day of the civil year, "a memorial of blowing of trumpets," a feast day, in which they were allowed to do no work. Their souls were thirsting for God, the living God; and they called on Ezra to bring forth and read to them the word of their God. They hired no large building, and brought no seats; the bazaar was closed, a Sabbath-silence was over Jerusalem, and people remained unwearied, hour after hour, in the open street, to hear! "Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation, both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding, upon the first day of the seventh month. And he read therein before the street that was before the water gate from the morning until mid-day, before the men and the women, and those that could understand; (i. e. all the children that were old enough to take in what was read): and the ears of the people were Attentive unto the Book of the Law."

Oh how ready people are to run and hear man's words, an eloquent preacher, one who says racy things, etc.! How ready to treat the preacher's voice "as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument!" But no words of man have the penetrating, mastering, convincing power which accompanies God's own Word. "Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces" (Jer. 23: 29)? "The Word of God is quick (living), and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." (Heb. 4: 12.) Many of those who have "itching ears" are like the poor prodigal, who tried to satisfy his hunger "with the husks that the swine did eat."

The most truly powerful preaching is that which is composed almost entirely of the word of God, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. We cannot expect to feed those people which are "spirit and life," and yet there are [illegible] they cannot understand or get anything out of God's word.

It was a wonderful sight to see a whole people standing in the street of their great city waiting for God's word, and Ezra standing upon his wooden pulpit and opening the roll which contained the words of the living God, a number of the teaching priests and Levites being on either side of him. The whole mass of the "people stood up: and Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: they bowed their heads, and worshiped the Lord with their faces to the ground." Thus this national Bible-reading began with praise, in which all joined, and a spirit of worship which meant a willing obedience to all which they should learn.

The mass of people must have been far too great to hear the voice of one man. The priests and Levites took part, probably speaking from various platforms, far enough from each other to avoid disturbing; they "caused the people to understand the law: and the people stood in their place. So they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading." Whether this was in the way of explanation which followed the reading, or whether it was in personal conversation with individuals is not clear. In any case it was understood by individuals, the word of the Lord had free course and was glorified. The word of God had made a deep impression on the people as the result of only one day's study, and Nehemiah, with the other teachers, encouraged them, saying: "This day is holy unto the Lord your God." He had an eye for the unseen, and saw how the mighty God himself was moving to and fro amongst his people. "Mourn not, nor weep. Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord; neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

Was this the wisest way of dealing with a people who were just manifesting signs of brokenness under the penetrating power of God's Word? Might not the wounds which his two-edged sword had made be too slightly healed? It is just when the heart is broken by the Lord that it is his joy to come in, and manifest himself. It is only the broken whom he can bind up, only the truly weeping ones who are ready to enter into his joy. Nothing makes us so happy as to know the will of God with certainty as soon as he has so far conquered us that we are decided to do it at any cost. "The people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them."

One day was not sufficient; the second day it was not so possible for all the people to come: mothers with families, must look after their children; the fields and the cattle, the business, and the ordinary duties of life must be attended to. But the spirit of hearing was upon the people, and the second day "the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests and the Levites," were gathered "unto Ezra the scribe, even to understand the words of the Lord." O how blessed is that people whose leaders, political and spiritual, can gather together to study the Word of God, with a heart to enjoy it! They Made a Discovery.

The feast of tabernacles had fallen into disuse through their long captivity, the remembrance of how they had been pilgrims and strangers in the wilderness was no more kept up among them. But, finding the observance commanded (Lev. 23: 39-43), they celebrated it with great joy, and while they dwelt in booths, according to God's command, "day by day, from the first day to the last day (Ezra) read in the book of the law of God."

The impression made upon the people was no light and transient one. As soon as the feast of tabernacles was at an end, lasting as it did, from the 15th to the 23rd day of the seventh month they observed an additional day, the 24th, when they assembled themselves, not to hear, but to do the will of God. They came before God with deep humiliation, "with fasting and with sackclothes, and earth upon them. And the seed of Israel separated themselves from all strangers, and stood, and confessed their sins, and the iniqnities of their fathers." Nehemiah was right, the word had gone in; they might rejoice on the first day, for God had got real hold of them. "And they stood up in their place, and read in the book or the Law of the Lord their God one fourth part of the day; and another fourth part they confessed, and worshipped the Lord their God." (chap. 9: 1-3.)

Something Was Done.

God's people were purified; there was a witness among the nations that they were a people, "holy unto the Lord." And then the Levites cried out: "Stand up and bless the Lord your God," and in a long ascription of praise to God, which took in a sketch of all their past history and of God's faithfulness to them, the Levites and people worshipped their God, and laid before him the present distress of the people, because of those that had rule over them; and they made "a sure covenant," writing it, and sealing it that a lasting result might remain from this awakening. The priests and Levites having led the way, the people also took their part in the covenant, "everyone having knowledge and having understanding. They clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses." Such was the result of a truly Scriptural awakening; such is the fruit of the Word of the living God.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE office of Governor of Jerusalem was no sinecure in the hands of Nehemiah. His first business was the repair and rebuilding of the wall of the city as described in last week's lesson. That completed, he set about the moral and spiritual reform of the city. It would appear that the people knew nothing of the law against taking usury of a brother or of the prohibition of mixed marriages. They had not been aware that they were breaking the law. Nehemiah's reproofs and stern dealing surprised them, and there was consternation throughout the land. This trouble was still disturbing them when the month Tishri (September—October), of the year 444 came around. This was the period when the solemn feast of Trumpets and the Feast of Tabernacles were to be celebrated. They corresponded with our New Year's and Thanksgiving. The people were to come up to Jerusalem to celebrate them and many doubtless came with trembling, not knowing but on their arrival they might be excluded for some violation of the law, they had never seen. They heard that Ezra was in the city. As nothing is said of him during the time of the trouble about the wall, we may suppose that he had been away from Jerusalem, probably at the Persian court. The people knew him to be a man learned in the law and they availed themselves of his presence to ascertain what the laws were. They asked him to read it to them. Doubtless Ezra was delighted with the request, and consented to do what was asked of him. The people were convened in the space called Ophel, between the wall of the Temple and the wall of the city. A platform had been erected there, on which Ezra stood, with thirteen helpers, who may have been necessary to translate the Hebrew into Aramaic for the benefit of those who had been born in Babylon. After opening the service with prayer, he produced the sacred roll on which the law was inscribed, probably such a manuscript as that shown in the initial of this article. In this book, most likely that which we now know as Deuteronomy, he read all the morning, propably five or six hours, expounding as he went on. The account of this interesting service and its effects on the people is the subject of to-day's lesson.

The law of Moses which the Lord commanded. It is important to remember the latter fact when reading the Bible. We go to it to learn the will of God, as it was revealed to the men who wrote the various books which it contains. One man tells one message and tells it in his own way, another tells another message giving a further revelation, as it was revealed to him, but all the writers are telling us the message which God sent through them. This was the law of Moses which the Lord commanded. Dr. Seiss tells the story of an old woman who while reading the Bible, was approached by a sceptic, who asked her: "What are you reading there, my good woman, that seems to interest you so much?" "The Word of God," said the woman. "The Word of God? How do you know it is God's word? You never heard him say it was." Not accustomed to discuss questions of theology, the woman was a little confused. Recovering herself, she said: "Sir, can you prove to me there is a sun up there in heaven?" "Prove it?" said the man, "Why do you ask me to prove it. It proves itself. It warms me and I see its light; what better proof can any one want?" The woman smiled and said: "Just so. And that is just the way God tells me this Book is his Word. I read it, and it warms me and gives me light. I see him in it, and what it says, is light and warmth which none but God can give; and so he tells me it is his Word. What more proof do I need?"

Attentive unto the Book of the Law. When people give their attention to the Bible they are sure to get light and guidance One strong proof of the book having come from God is its adaptation to every age. These people, more than two thousand years ago, were helped by the book that helps us to-day. It is not an encyclopædia or a text-book of details, but, as a great preacher has said, it enlightens the understanding and the conscience, and instils into the heart general principles applicable to every situation and duty in life. Men of all times have admired it. When Franklin was in Paris, among the infidels and scoffers of that day, he was ridiculed for loving the Bible. He determined to find out how many had read the book at which they scoffed. He informed one of the learned societies of which he was a member, that he had come across a story of pastoral life in ancient times that appeared to him very beautiful, but he would like the judgment of the Society upon it. On the evening appointed, Franklin had a reader of finely modulated voice read to them the Book of Ruth. They were in ecstacies over it, and one after another rose to express gratification and admiration and the desire that the manuscript should be printed. "It is printed," said Franklin, "and it is part of the Bible."

With their faces to the ground. They hung their heads. They had discovered that they had broken the law of God who had blessed and protected the nation from its infancy and they were ashamed. A striking spectacle was witnessed in the Four Courts of St. Louis, recently. A young man had been convicted of some crime. Before being sent to the prison where he was to serve his sentence, he was taken to the photographer's room, and his picture taken, to be sent to the various cities keeping "rogues' galleries," to be hung up on the walls with the faces of other criminals kept there. The description of the feeling manifested by the young man on this occasion is both touching and suggestive. "Big tears formed in his eyes and fell down on his cheek. He dropped his head on his breast and cried. He was so overcome with emotion that he could not speak until he was again placed in his cell in the jail. After swallowing great lumps in his throat, he said he now felt he had dropped from the role of a gentleman to that of the lowest criminal; and the thought of his picture being hung in the rogues' galleries of the cities was more than he could bear. Even if he reformed after he came out of prison there was nothing he could do that would remove his picture from those galleries of criminals. But God says to those who repent that their sins and their iniquities shall be remembered no more; though they were as crimson they shall be white as snow.

To make great mirth. There was good reason for them to be happy. They had been told how the burden that oppressed them could be removed—how their sins could be forgiven and they were glad. Religion is not a gloomy thing. It gives the most solid reason for joy. If a man rejoices because of his wealth or his honors he must have an uneasy feeling that either or both may be swept away or he may die and leave them, but a man who has religion knows it is his for all eternity. So he has the best reason for happiness. Dr. Guthrie had been spending an evening with genial Christian friends and had been laughing merrily over funny anecdotes which had been told, when he was called on to pray. He prayed earnestly and fervently for appropriate blessings on all present. When he rose from his knees, one of his friends said, "Guthrie you must be a happy man. If I had been laughing as much as you did awhile ago I could not have prayed for four and twenty hours." "Oh," said Guthrie, "laughing is no hindrance. God likes to have his people cheerful, I go to him when my heart is joyful as willingly as when it is sad."

THE REVOLUTION IN HAWAII.

A Flowery Kingdom, once Savage but now Christianized—Missionary Progress in the Beautiful Islands Which May Yet Become Part of Our Republic.

LAST week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contained a brief statement of the troubles affecting the island kingdom of Hawaii, in the Pacific Ocean, which had culminated in the overthrow of Queen Liliuokalani's government, and the deposition of that monarch. It was further explained that the crisis had been precipitated by the Queen's attempt to force upon the Hawaiians a new Constitution which was peculiarly offensive to them, as it encroached upon their liberties and conferred upon the throne powers amounting to absolute despotism. The Queen, finding herself opposed by Cabinet, army, and populace, and menaced by force if she persisted in violating the Constitution of the country, abdicated under protest, and withdrew to her private palace near Honolulu, leaving the machinery of administration in the hands of the people, who had already organized a Provisional Government. Before retiring, however, she appealed to England to protect her rights; but the revolution was already an accomplished fact, and the appeal was too late to be of service in the present emergency. The change of government was fortunately effected without bloodshed. Shortly before the crisis, a force of sailors and marines was landed from the United States cruiser Boston, then at Honolulu, and their presence was doubtless the means of preserving the peace and protecting foreigners. In announcing her abdication, Queen Liliuokalani referred to the presence of this armed display, and declared that she "yielded to force."

DEATH OF CAPT. COOK.

L. A. THURSTON.
(President Hawaiian Commission.)

One of the first acts of the new regime was to despatch a Commission to the United States, to present to the Government at Washington, a request for annexation. This request was finally presented in due time, and is now a subject of consideration by the President and Cabinet. While there is a strong feeling in favor of annexing Hawaii, it is considered probable that in view of the other interests affected a protectorate may be ultimately agreed upon rather than annexation, which might excite a protest from England. President Harrison is said to personally favor the policy of guaranteeing the autonomy of the newly-organized Republic. In the Senate, Mr. Chandler has introduced a resolution instructing the President to negotiate a treaty with Hawaii. It is not improbable that some formal communication from the English Government may shortly be made through Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Minister at Washington, which may have the effect of changing the situation very materially.

R. W. WILCOX OF HAWAII.
(Leader of the Republican Movement)

Hawaii, which has been called "the crossroads of the Pacific," occupies a commanding position, and its possession would be exceedingly valuable to any of the great maritime powers, but more particularly to England or the United States. To England it would add another link to her great colonial chain, which already well-nigh belts the globe. To the United States, which has not only the natural right of propinquity, but also the demand of the Hawaiians themselves in support of annexation, its acquisition would be a most valuable one, both for naval and commercial purposes. It is the only land in a tremendous expanse of ocean at which a vessel can call within 4500 miles of San Francisco. It is a most convenient port of call for steamers plying between California and China, and is therefore of the highest importance in connection with the American trade with Asia. American commercial interests, may be said to preponderate in Hawaii, although those of England are also quite extensive. Ex-Queen Liliuokalani who spent several years in England, has always had strong British affiliations, and Princess Kiluani, the heir-apparent, is now being educated in that country. Thus while the islands are to some extent indispensable to the naval and commercial security of the United States in the Pacific, English interests cannot be overlooked in any arrangement that may be ultimately reached. Meanwhile, to provide for possible contingencies, the American naval force at Honolulu will be strengthened immediately.

Hawaii is rich in sugar, rice and other products, the annual sugar crop alone amounting to between two and three millions of pounds. The climate is delightful, and is one of the most salubrious on the globe. The total area of the island group is nearly eleven thousand square miles. The people are simple and hospitable. This little archipelago of thirteen islands was first discovered by Captain Cook, the famous English explorer, in 1778, who found the inhabitants a race of wild, tattooed savages, who worshipped the white sailors as gods. Subsequently, on returning to the islands, a quarrel occurred, and Captain Cook determined to punish some native pilferers by seizing the person of the King, Terreeoboo. The scheme failed, and while endeavoring to escape to his vessel, Cook and his men were compelled to fire on the savages, who stabbed him to death and secured the body and ate it. A monument was afterward erected to his memory on one of the islands.

In 1820, the first missionary set foot on the Sandwich Islands, and since that time Christianity and civilization have made steady progress there. Before that year, there is no evidence that any religious instruction had been imparted to the natives. Trade had sprung up between the islands and civilized countries, and the natives had already learned the use of spirits and firearms. In 1809, two native boys were brought to New York by an American vessel, one of whom was a Christian convert. Their arrival excited the interest of the Foreign Missionary Societies, and in 1819 a movement was started in the Park Street Church, Boston, to send several missionaries and their wives to Hawaii. Among the number sent were several Americans and three young Sandwich Islanders, who had already been converted and who were now chosen to carry the Gospel back to their native land. On their arrival, on March 31, 1820, they learned, with surprise and gratitude, that the idols and altars of the Hawaiians had been overthrown by an edict of King Kamehameha III., and that the native priesthood and its rites had been abolished. The missionaries had a warm welcome, the King himself being prominent in greeting them, and they found the people ready to believe in and embrace the Gospel. This wonderful transformation from savagery to a readiness to accept Christian doctrines, is one of the most marvelous illustrations of God's power working through unexpected agencies, ever known in missionary fields. The seed of the Gospel had been sown there many years before, by some Christian trader or captain, and had grown wondrously. As the islands became Christianized, work was extended to other islands, even as far as the Caroline, Marshall and Gilbert groups in the distant Pacific. Among the devoted missionaries who have done noble service for the Master in Hawaii were Rev. Titus M. Coan, D.D., Rev. William Armstrong of Pennsylvania, Col. Judd and others.

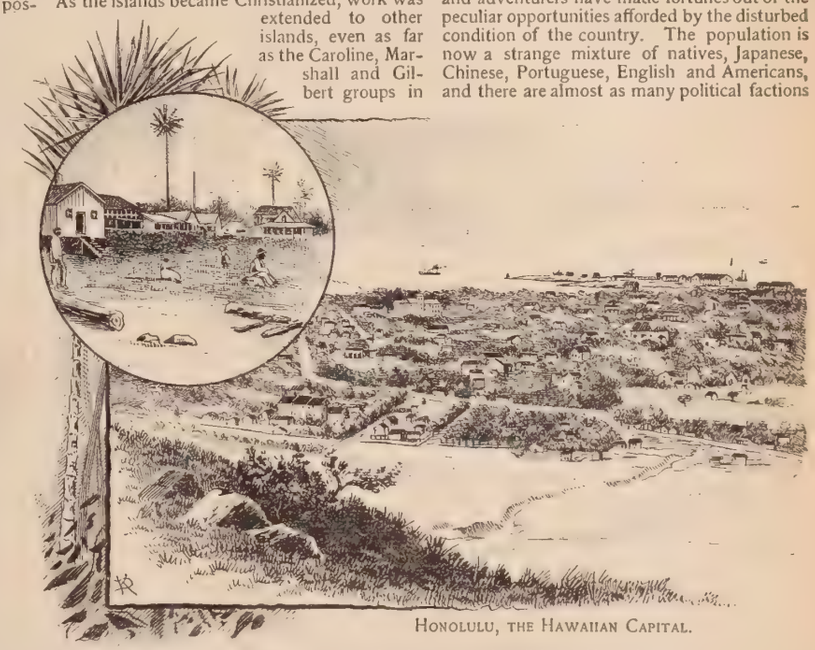
EX-QUEEN LILIUOKALANI.

Such was the marvelous success of those consecrated workers, that on one occasion a congregation of not less than 10,000 natives assembled to listen to the missionaries. Great buildings were erected, capable of holding audiences of 5,000 persons; schools were established throughout the islands and were conducted by 400 teachers, having an attendance of 250,000 people, including adults. In the year 1870, a national jubilee was held at Honolulu to thank the Almighty for his goodness in sending them the Gospel. Services were conducted by the American missionaries, after which 7,000 people sat down to a feast of Christian fellowship and social enjoyment.

When Dr. and Mrs. Coan went to Hawaii in 1835, they found it a beautiful and populous country, and, through their efforts, thousands were instructed in the truths of Christianity and the habits and customs of civilization. From the extreme north of Hawaii to Hilo, there were soon established numbers of quaint little white churches. Sunday Schools were also opened, and, in a short time, even those portions of the islands that had been inhabited by naked savages were hearing the blessed Gospel and learning to read and write. Dr. Coan presided over the church at Hilo and regularly visited many churches at other points, examining and instructing the natives. He continued this good work uninterruptedly until his death in December, 1882, consecrating all his energies to the evangelization of Hawaii. He was a native of Killingsworth, Conn., and had already seen missionary service in the Patagonian field before going to the Sandwich Islands. In a sense, he may be regarded as the pioneer missionary in Hawaii, having founded the mother church at Hilo and established the system under which the work of evangelization was so successfully conducted.

Thus under divine favor, the United States has conferred both material and spiritual blessings on these islands, and it is not surprising, therefore, that the people, having now cast off the monarchical form of government and become a republic, should desire union with their benefactors.

For many years past, the interests of Hawaii have been more or less under foreign control, and adventurers have made fortunes out of the peculiar opportunities afforded by the disturbed condition of the country. The population is now a strange mixture of natives, Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, English and Americans, and there are almost as many political factions as nationalities. Hawaii's history as a monarchy runs back through many centuries. The late king David Kalakaua believed that his country's ultimate destiny was annexation to the United States and while he did nothing to bring about such a result, he entered into a treaty of reciprocity and did everything that lay within his power to establish friendly relations.



HONOLULU, THE HAWAIIAN CAPITAL.

On this page, we present a portrait of the deposed Queen, together with a view of Honolulu, the capital city. Portraits are also given of Mr. R. W. Wilcox, the leader of the republican party in Hawaii and of Hon. L. A. Thurston, President of the Commission sent by the Provisional government to this country to negotiate annexation.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

IN No. 9 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be published the opening chapters of a new and very interesting serial story, entitled :

"BRAVE BARBARA,"

by the late Rev. J. Jackson Wray. This story, written shortly before Mr. Wray's death last year, is probably the very best narrative of Christian life and experience that has ever come from his brilliant pen.

ANNOYANCES.

ANNOYANCES may come to us in the shape of friends and acquaintances who are always saying disagreeable things. There are some people you cannot be with for half an hour but you feel cheered and comforted. Then there are other people you cannot be with for five minntes before you feel miserable. They do not mean to disturb you, but they sting you to the bone. They gather up all the yarn which the gossips spin, and peddle it. They gather up all the adverse criticisms about your person, about your business, about your home, about your church, and they make your ear the funnel into which to pour it. They laugh heartily when they tell you, as though it were a good joke, and you laugh too—outside. These people are brought to our attention in the Bible, in the book of Ruth. Naomi went forth beautiful and with the finest of worldly prospects into another land, but after awhile she came back widowed, and sick, and poor. What did her friends do when she came back to the city? They all went out, and, instead of giving her common-sense consolation, what did they do? Read the book of Ruth and find out.

Perhaps these small annoyances will come in the shape of a domestic irritation. The parlor and the kitchen do not always harmonize. To get good service and to keep it is one of the great questions of the country. Sometimes it may be the arrogancy and inconsiderateness of employers; but whatever be the fact, we all admit there are these petty annoyances winging their way out of the culinary department. If the grace of God be not in the heart of the housekeeper, she cannot maintain her equilibrium. The men come home at night and hear the story of these annoyances, and say: "Oh! these home troubles are very little things." They are small, small as wasps, but they sting. Martha's nerves were all unstrung when she rushed in asking Christ to reprove Mary, and there are tens of thousands of women who are dying, stung to death by these pestiferous domestic annoyances.

These disturbances may also come in the shape of business irritations. There are men we know who went though panics without losing their balance, who are every day unhorsed by little annoyances—a clerk's ill-manners, or a blot of ink on a bill of lading, or the extravagance of a partner who overdraws his account, or the underselling of a business rival, or the whispering of business confidences in the street, or the making of some little bad debt which was against your judgment, just to please somebody else. It is not the panics that kill the merchants. Panics come only once in ten or twenty years. It is the constant din of these every-day annoyances which is sending so many of our best merchants into nervous dyspepsia and paralysis and the grave. These annoyances come upon us to culture our patience. The annoyances in life are a moral gymnasium, each worry a peg by which we are to climb higher and higher in Christian attainment. When you stand chin-deep in annoyances is the time for you to swim out toward the great headlands of Christian attainment, and when your life is loaded to the muzzle with repulsive annoyance—that is the time to draw the trigger. Nothing but the furnace will ever burn out of us the clinker and the slag. It takes just so much trouble to fit us for usefulness and for heaven.

SUPPOSE!

SUPPOSE, on your way home, a runaway horse should dash across the street, or between the dock and the boat you should accidentally slip, where would you be at twelve o'clock to-night or seven o'clock to-morrow morning? Or for all eternity where would you be? I do not answer the question. I just leave it to you to answer.

But suppose you escape fatal accident. Suppose you go out by the ordinary process of sickness. I will just suppose now that your last hour has come. The doctor says, as he goes out of the room: "Can't get well." There is something in the faces of those who stand around you that prophesies that you cannot get well. You say within yourself: "I can't get well." Where are your comrades now? Oh, they are off to the gay party that very night! They dance as well as they ever did. They laugh as loud as though you were not dying. They destroyed your soul, but do not come to help you die.

Well, there are father and mother in the room. They are very quiet, but occasionally they go into the next room and weep bitterly. The bed is very much disheveled. They have not been able to make it up for two or three days. There are four or five pillows lying around, because they have been trying to make you as easy as they could. On the one side of your bed are all the past years of your life—the Bibles, the sermons, the communion-tables, the offers of mercy. You say: "Take them away." Your mother thinks you are delirious. She says: "There is nothing there, my dear, nothing there." There is something there! It is your wasted opportunities. It is your procrastinations. It is those years you gave to the world that you ought to have given to Christ.. They are there; and some of them put their fingers on your aching temples, and some of them feel for the strings of your heart, and some put more thorns in your tumbled pillow, and you say: "Turn me over." And they turn you over, but, alas! there is a more appalling vision. You say: "Take that away!" They say: "There is nothing there, nothing there." There is—an open grave there! Take it away! They cannot take it away.

You say: "How dark it is getting in the room!" Why, the burners are all lighted. Your family come up one by one, and tenderly kiss you good-bye. Your feet are cold, and the hands are cold, and the lips are cold, and they take a small mirror and they put it over your mouth to see if there is any breathing, and that mirror is taken away without a single blur upon it; and they whisper through the room: "She's gone." And then the door of the body opens and the soul flashes out. Make room for the destroyed spirit!

You cannot say that you did not hear about heaven, the other alternative, for you hear of it now: "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." No sorrow, no suffering, no death. Christ offers you now escape from all peril, and offers to introduce you now into the peace and pardon of the Gospel, preparing you for that good land. The sides of Calvary run blood for you. Jesus, who had nowhere to lay his head, offers you his heart as a pillow of rest. Christ offers with his own body to bridge over the chasm of death, saying: "Walk over Me; I am the Way."

OPEN WINDOWS.

YOUR windows are open toward Jerusalem. Your father and mother are buried there. It may have been a very humble home in which you were born, but your memory often plays around it, and you hope some day to go and see it—the hill, the tree, the brook, the house, the place so sacred, the door from which you started off with parental blessing to make your own way in the world; and God only knows how sometimes you have longed to see the familiar places of your childhood, and how in awful crises of life you would like to have caught a glimpse of the old, wrinkled face that bent over you as you lay on the gentle lap twenty or forty or fifty years ago.

When the foreign steamer comes to the wharf, you see the long line of sailors, with shouldered mail-bags, coming down the planks, carrying as many letters as you might suppose would be enough for a year's correspondence, and this repeated again and again during the week. Multitudes of them are letters from home, and at all the post-offices of the land people will go to the window and anxiously ask for them, hundreds of thousands of persons finding that window of foreign mails the open window toward Jerusalem. Messages that say: "When are you coming home to see us? Brother has gone. Sister is dead. Father and mother are getting very feeble. We are having a great struggle to get on here. Would you advise us to come on to you, or will you come to us? All join in love, and hope to meet you, if not in this world, then in a better. Good-bye."

Yes, yes; in all these cities, and amid the flowering Western prairies, and on the slopes of the Pacific, and amid the Sierras, and on the banks of the lagoon, and on the ranches of Texas there is an uncounted multitude who, this hour, stand and sit and kneel with their windows open toward Jerusalem. Some of them played on the heather of the Scottish hills. Some of them were driven out by Irish famine. Some of them, in early life, drilled in the German army. Some of them were accustomed at Lyons or Marseilles or Paris to see on the street Victor Hugo and Gambetta. Some chased the chamois among the Alpine precipices. Some plucked the ripe clusters from Italian vineyards. Some lifted their faces under the midnight sun of Norway. It is no dishonor in our land that they remember the place of their nativity. Miscreants would they be if, while they have some of their windows open to take in the free air of America and the sunlight of an atmosphere which no kingly despot has ever breathed, they forgot sometime to open the window toward Jerusalem.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GOOD WOMEN.

THE greatest prayer in Scripture is not by man. That Syrophenician woman there, pleading for her daughter, has no parallel in all the word of God.

And the greatest homage paid the Saviour, by whom was it? By her, who poured that alabaster box of pure spikenard over the head of Jesus. Its fragrance spread, till the ends of the earth were perfumed, and the sweetness will never leave the world till its end.

Men have done much for God, but it was a woman who gave us God. God revealed. You hear of no woman betraying him, or denying him. Take the women out of that little upper room, and I doubt if the men would have clung together, praying, ten long days. Paul's first convert in Europe was a woman. A man of Macedonia gave him the call to come, but a woman's heart first yielded to the Gospel. The fact is, we don't find a man about, under his first sermon; for there it reads in Acts xvi—13:

"And on the Sabbath we went out of the city, by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made; and we sat down, and spoke unto the women which resorted thither."

As then, so now; women make the prayer meetings; I believe it. Take the good women out of the churches and prayer meetings, and death and the devil would have the whole business in a decade.

For the good women of our land and other lands, let us thank God. Let us sing the doxology:

May he give us more of them, and you, dear reader, numbered amongst the rest.

Scripture for Women.

"Scripture for women?" Yes, for women."

"But is not all scripture for them?"

"Yes and no."

Yes in the general, no in the particular; or rather, there is special scripture for them, which is putting it better.

Take the "wife's chapter," Proverbs 31: that is for women, for young women. No girl ought to think of getting married, till she learns it by heart. The fact is it was written by a woman. Don't startle for fear I have made a mistake. You will say it was by king Lemuel. Yes, I know, but you will notice before the first verse ends, it says, "The prophecy his mother taught him." He would have known nothing about such things, unless she told him. In that chapter, a man is simply an amanuensis. The "marriage chapter," Ephesians 5, belongs largely to the sex named, and Judges 13, which is "the mother's chapter," belongs wholly to her. So with "the widow's chapter," Isaiah 54, and 1. Timothy 5. The "harlot's chapter," Proverbs 7, is for warning to women, as well as men. The "household chapter," Colossians 3, "wives' and husbands' chapter," 1. Peter 3, together with "the father's and mother's Psalms," 127 and 128, are portions unto women. So is the bigger part of 1. Corinthians 7, which is not for public reading, but for a woman, a wife, to read when she is alone in her closet, and thus be taught to foil the enemy of souls.

Take the second chapter of Titus. Here Paul writes to the preacher, that he speak the things which become sound doctrine; and what does he say? Here his message is, unto the women of riper years. Telling the aged women they must be teachers of good things; and no doubt is left as to what they are to teach, and to whom they are to teach it.

Listen!

"That they may teach the young women to be sober." And if any lesson is needed now-a-days, that is it; girls giddy and thoughtless, rushing into pleasures, and into company, and into marriage, with as little thought about the outcome, as a runaway colt. No sobriety whatever; no judgment, no reason; rushing on, whither their likes and emotions lead them, regardless of consequences; sadly do they need this.

"To love their husbands,"—one divorce to every eight marriages in staid, old, puritanical New England: and why?—because this lesson is not taught. Love has no use for divorce courts.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A NEW TRIBUNAL.

LONDON has made a new departure which is likely to become popular with the citizens. A Court of Arbitration has been established in the English capital, under the auspices of the Lord Mayor and Corporation for the settlement of disputes without the expense and delay incident to the ordinary course of litigation. The Court is intended primarily for arbitration in differences between employers and their employees, but other disputants may bring their cases before it if they prefer to do so, instead of taking them into a court of law. It will also act as a Court of Reference to adjudicate in cases involving technical trade details, which may be referred to it by the Judges of the law-courts. Its Judges are appointed jointly by the Corporation and the Chamber of Commerce, and they have been selected on account of their knowledge of business methods, rather than of legal procedure. The fees of the Court are to be five dollars for a hearing and ten dollars for a decision, and disputants may conduct their own cases if they wish, or appear by counsel. The illustration on this page represents the Court in session. The Court will doubtless prove a great boon to the city; for not only will it reduce the cost of justice, but it will provide a tribunal of experts specially fitted by experience in business to understand and adjudicate in cases of trade complications. Every litigant realizes how valuable is the latter characteristic in a Judge. To the Christian who is approaching the judgment-seat of Christ there is nothing so reassuring as the knowledge that his Judge is not one "who cannot be touched by the feeling of his infirmities, but was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin." (Heb. 4: 15.)

A Child Starts the Cable.

AN interesting inaugural experiment took place in New York on Feb. 1. The long work of substituting cable power for that of horses on the Broadway surface railroad has been so far completed as to admit of a test of the machinery. In the great power-house on Fifty-first Street are the powerful Corliss engines, with their eight enormous driving wheels and fly wheels to operate the miles of endless heavy steel cable which lie ready for use in the conduits. When all was prepared for the experiment, and the fires under the gigantic boilers had been kindled for the first time, several engineers and gentlemen interested in the road arrived at the power-house. One of them led by the hand a little girl ten years old, the daughter of one of the contractors. After various congratulatory speeches, the signal was given, the child turned a small wheel and in a moment the engines and the hundreds of tons of machinery were in motion carrying the cable through its underground channel at a six mile an hour speed. To a person who did not understand the application of steam power, it would seem incredible that a little girl should be able to put such heavy machinery in motion, yet there was no difficulty about it. If Christians only realized what a mighty force is at the disposal of the humblest among them in the gift of the Holy Spirit, there would be less reluctance than there is to undertake great things in Christ's cause. (Matt. 21: 21.

A Treacherous Alkali Spot.

A THRILLING story of a rescue from a terrible death is related by a Wyoming correspondent of the New York Sun. He says that he and a companion who assisted him in herding cattle in Wyoming were sent out by the superintendent to look for thirty cattle which had strayed or been stolen. They had started at daybreak, and had ridden about forty miles when they came to an "alkali spot" on the prairie, several acres in extent. They had often seen such places before, but none so large. They marked the places where alkali had exuded from the soil, giving it the appearance of having been sprinkled with lime. As they started to cross it, the correspondent heard a cry from his companion, who was a hundred yards to his right and a little ahead of him. Looking in the direction of the cry, he saw the man trying to get his horse on firm ground. Riding toward him, he felt the ground quiver beneath his horse's feet, and foresaw that with a few more steps he would be in as much need of rescue as his companion. Halting instantly, he called to the man to get his feet free of the stirrups and clasp his hands behind his head. Then he threw his lariat, and watched with sickening suspense to see if his aim had been true. To his great joy he saw the lariat coil around his chest, and then turning around, he literally dragged him from the horse's back to solid ground and safety. As they skirted the alkali spot they realized how narrow the escape had been, for the horse had been engulfed before they were out of sight of him, and, a little farther on, the tips of several pairs of horns protruding from the soil, explained what had become of the lost cattle. It is evident that the man would have died a horrible death if his rescuer had not had the presence of mind and the skill necessary to save him. In no other way could he have been saved, for any one going to his rescue would only have shared his fate, without helping him. But for the presence of his friend with the lariat, his condition would have been a type of the condition of the whole human race, for "none could by any means redeem his brother" (Psalm 49:7). All men being in like danger of perishing, only God himself in human form, could work out salvation (Rom. 8:3).

Cannibalism at Sea.

NEWS comes from Hamburg of the arrest of three sailors on a horrible charge. They belong to the Norwegian ship Thekla which foundered recently on her voyage from Philadelphia for the Baltic ports. It appears from their own statement, that when all hope of saving the ship was abandoned, the captain and some of the crew left the ship in a boat. Four sailors remained who when the ship went down, climbed to the upper rigging, which was above water. There they held on, suffering intensely from cold and hunger. When their pain became intolerable they decided to kill one of their number. Lots were cast and twice in succession the lot fell on the same sailor, who was a Dutchman. The other three set upon him and killed him and ate a portion of the body. They were eventually rescued by the Danish ship Herman and taken to Cuxhaven, near Hamburg. There, their confession of what they had done was made public and they have been arrested for murder. Their crime is not without precedent. A few years ago, a sailor was arrested in England for a like offence committed at sea and he was tried and convicted, but was not punished. Probably these men also will escape. There is no law justifying the crime but it will be recognized that they committed the horrible deed under the impulse of the instinct of self-preservation, which, as everyone knows, is common to all men. That fact, however, sets in strong light the infinite grandeur of the sacrifice of the Saviour, who reversed this instinct in his own person. While these men sacrificed another that they might live, he gave his own life that others might have life eternal. (John 15: 13.)

A SESSION OF THE LONDON COURT OF ARBITRATION.

Joseph's Successor in Egypt.

AN authority usually well informed on Egyptian affairs says that Riaz Pasha, the new Premier of Egypt is of Jewish birth. If the statement is true, the fact is very suggestive. Riaz holds under Abbas, the successor of the Pharaohs, the office which, about thirty-six hundred years ago, Joseph held under Pharaoh. Like Joseph, Riaz is "ruler over all the land of Egypt," and the peculiar position he occupies in being endorsed by England, while Abbas is distrusted by her, gives him even more of actual power than is possessed by the Khedive himself. Strange thoughts must fill his mind as he visits the treasure-cities which the Hebrews built for Pharaoh during their long and cruel bondage, and as he looks upon the river where long ago floated the cradle in which lay the future lawgiver of his race. The opportunity is now in his hand, though he is, doubtless, too wise to use it, to take vengeance on Egypt for the wrongs of his ancestors. Rather, it may be hoped, he will return good for evil by giving the land the good government to which it has long been a stranger. Although he cannot interpret dreams and foresee famines, as Joseph did, he may alleviate the burdens of the people and his rule may be a blessing to the nation if, like Joseph, he puts his trust in God. (Gen. 39: 2.)

A Long Buried Ship.

A STRANGE discovery was made in New York on Jan. 31. The workmen engaged in excavating the foundations for the power-house of the Broadway cable-road on Front Street near Broad, had reached a depth of twenty feet, when they struck the side of a large ship. Two houses had been built over the wreck, one of which is still standing. The other was burned to the ground some time ago. The foundation of the houses had been dug without finding the buried ship although the wall of the house still standing is seventy-five feet high. The ship is ninety feet long and had three masts. Her oak ribs are as firm and hard as if they were new. It is thought she must have been a war-ship, as among the articles found on board were a bayonet, a cannon ball and some brass regimental buttons bearing the English royal arms. It is cetrain that the ship must have been sunk not less than a century ago, as maps of the city made in 1797 show that the place where she lies had then been rescued from the sea, filled in, and a street built over it. As there were coins found on the ship bearing dates varying from 1678 to 1727, it is evident that she must have gone down at some period between the latter date and 1797. There is no record of the wreck of such a ship between those years, and no name-board has yet been found to disclose her identity. Her shape and the soundness of her timbers prove that she must have been in her day a noble ship capable of doing good service in war or peace; but for a century she has been lying idly under the soil and mud of a New York street, the fact of her existence absolutely forgotten. So is it with moral and spiritual wrecks. Many a youth of fine physical and mental equipment, capable of doing good service in his day and generation, has gone down in some storm of temptation into an existence of uselessness and oblivion. (Eccles. 7: 29.)

A Dangerous Spring.

THE existence of a mineral spring with remarkable properties is reported by one of the officials of Plumas County, California. The spring is on the mountain side above the Butte Creek House and is known to the miners as the "Chloroform Spring." The water does not differ in color from pure water, but is slightly brackish to the taste. It is in its effects that its pecularity consists. Persons who have drunk a small cupful feel in about half an hour as if they had taken a heavy narcotic. A large quantity renders the drinker insensible and he does not recover consciousness for several hours. The Indians call the spring "Heap Sleep Water" and they say that many a man has died from drinking of it. Their statement is corroborated by the fact that the official beforementioned, counted the carcases of five deer lying within a few yards of the spring when he visited the spot recently. He tested the soil around it but could not discover any cause for the death-dealing effects of the water. He urges that it should be analyzed and a warning displayed above it to warn strangers who might drink of it and be poisoned. It has not been done hitherto as it is on an almost inaccessible ridge of the mountain to which very few people attempt to climb. Nevertheless, few as they may be, the warning should be placed there as it may save life. It would surely be heeded, though in spite of reiterated warnings in the Bible and from our pulpits, people continue to drink of the river of sin which brings death, and neglect that other water which if a man drink he shall have everlasting life. (John 4 : 14.)

BRIEF NOTES.

One of the latest utterances of the late Bishop Phillips Brooks was: "I want to live; the next twenty years will present the most glorious opportunity for work and results which the church has ever seen in this country."

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections in New York have not yet been all forwarded to the treasurer of the fund, but he has already received $51,398.57. Of this amount, $4,200 came from the ladies' committee.

The Church of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, has sent a unanimous invitation to Rev. Henry A. Stimson, D.D., pastor of the Pilgrims Congregational Church, St. Louis, to become its pastor in succession to Dr. William M. Taylor, who resigned recently on account of ill health.

Evangelist Redding, one of the young students of the Bible Institute of Chicago, is winning golden opinions from pastors and people whom he visits. At York, Neb., the Evangelical churches of the city united in the movement. Mr. Redding sang and preached twice a day and there was a great ingathering of souls.

The First Congregational Church of Sioux City, Iowa, received into membership at the last communion, eighty-seven persons who ascribed their conversion to God's blessing on the services recently held there by Rev. B. Fay Mills. Churches of other denominations have also received large additions on the same account.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding successful children's meetings at Troy, N. Y. He has been much blessed, also, at Waterford and Lansingburg. At the three places there were 350 cards signed by young converts, who thereby made public profession of Christ. On Feb. 5 Mr. Hammond commenced services at Albany, N. Y.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy listened, on Feb. 7, to an address from Prof. A. G. Hopkins, of Hamilton College, on "Seneca, the Reformer." The next meeting will be on March 7, when Dr. W. W. McLane, of New Haven, will deliver a lecture. The meetings are held in Columbia College on the first Tuesday of every month.

Evangelist L. P. Rowland has been holding a series of union meetings, at Marseilles, Ill., and a most blessed work has been wrought in the hearts of Christians and many conversions have occurred, especially from among the members of the different Sabbath-Schools. Heads of families are also among the converts. Thence Mr. Rowland went to Alma, Mich.

Rev. W. F. ReQua is still endeavoring, as our readers would see by an advertisement in this journal last week, to arouse the sympathy of the Christian public in the spiritual condition of the Indians. Mr. ReQua has made many sacrifices to carry the Gospel to the tribes in the Indian Territory, and himself labored there for some time. We wish the new effort he is making all success.

Great preparations are being made at St. Paul and Minneapolis for the visit of Rev. B. Fay Mills next month. A large chorus of voices in each city is in training and special prayers and meetings and Bible readings are being held. Prof. White of Xenia, O., is assisting in the preparations A great Tabernacle is to be erected at Eighth Street, near Wabash, St. Paul, for the meetings in that city. It is intended to hold the Minneapolis meetings at the exhibition in which the great Christian Endeavor Convention was held.

Mr. E. F. Miller's services in Trinity M. E. Church, New York, have been the means of a large accession to the membership. Mr. Miller accompanied Mr. D. W. Potter and assisted him at the commencement of the services in January and continued with the church after Mr. Potter left. It is estimated that there were no less than 150 conversions. On one Sunday evening there were seventy persons at the altar seeking salvation. From New York Mr. Miller went to London, Ohio, thence he goes to Chicago for a series of meetings, after which he has promised to conduct meetings at Jacksonville, Ill.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

CONFESSION, FORGIVENESS, CLEANSING.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, Feb. 12, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." 1. John 1: 19.

THESE words have given comfort and inspiration to many doubting and fearful hearts. They have often come as a message from God himself to sinful and struggling souls. They sing themselves in our hearts now as strains of sweet and heavenly music. They might well have a place in the solemn litany of the most stately liturgy. They are often repeated by us in our private, our social, and our public prayers. They will never lose their meaning, nor their inspiring ministry until this sinful world is fully converted to God. They stand in this Scripture in close connection with the assertion that if we say we have no sin we are guilty of deceiving ourselves, and thus we prove that the truth is not in us. But while we are obliged to confess we have sin, we may plead his gracious assurance of forgiveness, and we may cherish the joyous hope of being cleansed from all unrighteousness. No man in his senses will say in the sight of God that he is free from sin; but every penitent soul may go to God confessing his own guilt and pleading God's promise, and soon he will rejoice in the cleansing power of God's grace. Around three words suggested by the text the teaching of this Scripture gathers—confession, forgiveness, cleansing.

Confession.

The first of these three words to be considered is confession. Divine forgiveness always presupposes human confession. We have no assurance that forgiveness will be imparted except full acknowledgement of sin is made. Confession as here emphasized is not simply confession of the mouth; neither is it simply contrition of the heart. There may be lip-confession without heart-contrition; and heart-contrition without lip-confession. The desired outward confession springs from inward contrition; it is the heart voicing itself in confession with the mouth. The apostle Paul teaches that, "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."

To whom, then, is this genuine confession to be made? Manifestly to those whom we have injured. There is a sense in which we are to make confession to ourselves. Every unconverted man has wronged his own soul; every such man has sinned against the noblest instincts of his nature, against his intelligence, against his reason, and against his conscience. The apostle Paul said to the alarmed jailor, "Do thyself no harm." This is the teaching of religion to every man concerning himself. It enjoins upon men by pernicious habits, or by indulgence in sin of any kind. True religion seeks the highest welfare of all men. If this teaching were always and everywhere obeyed men would never do themselves harm. Every man who disobeys God dishonors himself. He takes the crown of noblest manhood from his own brow and tramples it beneath his feet in the dust. The true penitent is willing to go with a lighted candle through the chamber of his own soul. He is willing to humble himself before God that he may be exalted by God before men. Acts of this kind test a man's sincerity and reveal his true character. Many men do not wish to know themselves; they do not dare to be alone with themselves; they are afraid of the rebukes of their own conscience. They quail in the light which their own illumined judgment flashes upon their crooked paths and their sinful deeds. But the humbling revelation which such an examination produces is often the first step toward a full confession and toward eternal salvation.

Confession is also to be made to our fellow men. Directly and indirectly in living a life of sin we have wronged others as well as ourselves. No man has a right to set a bad example; no man can live for himself. Every act is far-reaching in its influence and its consequences. One wrong act may start a circle of influences which will reach even to eternity, as a pebble dropped into the quiet lake starts ever-widening circles which reach both shores. This is a tremendous thought. It makes life real and terrible, if it be a life of sin; it makes life rich and glorious if it be spent in the service of God. This fact suggests

A Terrible Law.

The guilt of one person involves many in its consequences. If a man could sin and suffer alone sin would still be bad enough; but since the innocent must suffer with the guilty, sin becomes unspeakably sinful and terrible. The law which has its illustration in these experiences is universal and immutable as gravitation. If you refuse Christ to-day you not only injure yourself, but you injure all your friends and neighbors. Disobedience to God is injury to man. A full and frank confession to those we have wronged is manly and divine. The unmanliness consists in the perpetration of the wrong. The guilt of our sin and not the confession of that sin should suffuse our cheek with shame. We often act as if the shame of sin was in its discovery and not in its committal. Peace of mind cannot be secured until the wrong is confessed and the sin is forgiven. The laws of nature as well as the laws of God teach this great lesson.

To God especially is our confession to be made. This form of confession includes all other elements of confession. There can be no true confession to ourselves or to our fellowmen except as there has been confession unto God. If we have not made confession to him our confession to man is practically insincere and so worthless. When we turn to the two the 32nd and the 51st lesson is made clear and this element in confession made most emphatic. David had sinned against many others as well as against God. He had offended against human laws and against the recognized principles of social life. His sin against Uriah and his family was deep, dark and devilish; but still he says to God, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned and done evil in thy sight." The chief heinousness of his offence was in its violation of the law of God. Every true penitent can understand the significance of this strong language on the part of the psalmist. He did not make this confession simply because his sin might bring to him poverty, but chiefly because it was an offense against the pure and holy God; it was a violation of his law and was offensive to the last degree in God's sight. Except there be this element in confession we may well doubt its sincerity. Every deeply penitent soul is ready to say unto God with the broken-hearted David, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned. The same great truth is taught us in the words of the prodigal son as he is returning to his father. He also recognized that his sin consisted chiefly in disobedience to that father and in departure from his home and heart. His words find a response still in the heart of every true penitent: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee." God help us to recognize our sinfulness against him, and to introduce this element into our confession as the honest expression of the contrition of our hearts.

Forgiveness.

The second great word suggested by this text is forgiveness. As we examine the text we discover that there is a conditional element in the forgiveness here suggested, "If we confess." Always in the Word of God pardon implies confession. This implication is not an arbitrary command on the part of God. God's commands are sovereign, but never arbitrary or capricious. There are profound reasons underlying all God's requirements. If we could see as God sees, we would always act as God acts. If we could know as God knows, we would always demand what God demands. The laws of nature are not contradictory to the laws of grace. Revelation introduces us into a higher sphere than creation, but the lessons taught in both spheres are harmonious. To our limited vision and restricted faculties some of God's laws may seem to be arbitrary; but if our vision were broader and our faculties more acute we would see that God's sovereign demands are in harmony with the dictates of the highest reason. There can be no real forgiveness except there be true confession. Only the penitent's heart can receive divine peace as the result of forgiveness. So long as men are impenitent even the great and merciful God cannot bestow upon them true forgiveness. God would be practically casting pearls before swine, if he offered men the treasures of forgiving grace before they showed their preparation for his mercy by the sincerity of their penitence. God's method of pardoning is thus seen to be in harmony with the highest reasoning, and with the scientific conclusions of rational minds.

The Promise Certain.

But when the condition is met the forgiveness is assured. We are here taught that God is faithful in bestowing forgiveness. He is faithful to his plighted word and to his oft-repeated promises; he will assuredly grant us the forgiveness which he has so graciously promised. God cannot deny himself; than this truth nothing can be more certain. When we make humble and hearty confession of our sins we cast ourselves in Christ's appointed way on God for forgiveness and we must thus attest the faithfulness of his promises in granting us his forgiveness. If we can trust God for anything it is for the full and free forgiveness of sin when we have complied with his requirements. That he might cleanse us from all sin Christ came into the world, lived his life of obedience to God, and died as the atoner for sin. He sits at the right hand of the Majesty on high now to give repentance and remission of sin. We may put full faith in his willingness and ability to grant us remission.

But, furthermore, he is just in bestowing forgiveness as well as faithful. The forgiveness which he imparts is Justifiable Forgiveness.

God must be just or cease to be God. We cannot for a moment think of God as unjust. One act of injustice on the part of God would overthrow his throne and leave this universe without a judge, without a father, without a Saviour, without a God. The attribute of absolute justice is inseparable from all true ideas of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In bestowing his mercy he will be true to his promises. He will be just to his Son in the covenant of redemption, and he will be just to men who have put their implicit trust in Jesus Christ. The atonement of Jesus Christ satisfies the sense of justice and enables them to see how God can now be just while he is the justifier of those who believe in Jesus Christ.

The apostle Paul clearly teaches the possibility of perfect harmony between God's attributes of justice and mercy. This great truth this apostle brings out in his letter to the Romans, the third chapter and the twenty-sixth verse. That verse is in many respects the very essence of the Gospel. It shows that God retains the integrity of his character while he remits the penalty due to sinners; it shows that he can forgive sinners being penitent without sacrificing his divine and eternal justice. By giving his Son as a substitute for sinners he now can forgive sinners while he maintains the integrity of the divine law against sin. The salvation of men at the expense of the justice of God is unthinkable. No human intellect however lofty or profound could have answered the question, "How should man be just with God?" This question staggered all thinkers in all ages. It has been the great inquiry ever before the mind of earnest students. Every man knows that he is a sinner, and must feel that God would be just in inflicting punishment proportioned to his guilt. The effort to answer this question has given rise to all the forms of religion among men; to all the penances and sacrifices of different faiths among many nations, but only in the Christian revelation can the answer be found; only through the infinite merits of the Redeemer can men conscious of their guilt be forgiven while God's law is honored and their own sense of justice is satisfied.

Cleansing.

The third word around which the thoughts of the text gather in appropriate order is cleansing. The characteristics of the cleansing here promised are worthy of our attentive consideration. To cleanse is more than merely to forgive. We see at once that we have advanced a step in our consideration of God's wonderful grace to the children of men. Forgiveness were much, forgiveness were an indescribable blessing; but cleansing introduces us into a nobler condition and a sweeter relation. To forgive is to justify; but to cleanse is to sanctify as well as justify. It is a mark of wonderful condescension on the part of God, and a token of marvelous blessing in our own experience. For cleansing as well as forgiveness we must earnestly seek; for purification as well as pardon we must constantly strive.

Careful study of the text shows us that it is a personal cleansing. The promise is that he will cleanse us from all unrighteousness. We must personally be washed in the precious blood of the Son of God. Religion is intensely personal. A wall high as heaven and deep as hell separates every personality from every other. Personality is eternal. Individuality outlives death and the judgment. Moses and Elijah were Moses and Elijah though they had been respectively about 1500 and 1000 years in heaven. We cannot be saved because of the righteousness of others. There must be a personal cleansing in the fountain opened for sin and cleansing. To that fountain I now invite you. Oh, come, wash and be yea, wash and be whiter than snow! It is God's desire that every man should be justified; that every man should be saved with an eternal salvation. It is observable also that this is divine cleansing; for it is God who is here represented as forgiving and cleansing. He alone can cleanse from sin. Only the blood of Jesus Christ his Son possesses cleansing power. The fountains of earth can never wash away the sins of men. As well might an Ethiopian attempt "by nitre and much soap" to make nimself white as for a sinner to expect to make himself white by any application of his own merits and righteousness. As a ground of salvation all our doings are deadly; no man can be saved by good works as a ground of acceptance with God. Good works are the fruit of the faith implanted in the soul. There is only one fountain that can wash away the stain of sin. Oh come to that fountain here and now, wash and be clean! We observe also that it is a perfect cleansing—"cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The sin which abides in the heart as conscious guilt may be removed by God's pardon. The sin which abides in us as pollution requires divine cleansing. All men might receive forgiveness and cleansing if they would but confess their guilt and receive divine mercy. There is no sin so dark but that the blood of Christ can Wash it Away;

Clean Now;

there is no heart so foul but that it may be made whiter than the driven snow. Every form of unrighteousness is sin, and as such is to be cleansed from the soul. It is the duty and privilege of every child of God to have his heart cleansed from remaining depravity, and to keep himself unspotted from the world and in sweet fellowship with his Redeemer.

Do I here advocate doctrines of sinless perfection? If I did the verse following the text would rebuke me and contradict my teaching. In that verse it is distinctly said, "If we say that we have not sinned we make God a liar, and his word is not in us." No man may claim sinless perfection. Such a claim as this the Apostle Paul never made but distinctly repudiated; but whether men ought to claim that they have attained to the higher life it is certain that all of us might live a much higher life than we do now. Many of us are content to be servants, when we might be sons; many of us are satisfied with the porter's lodge, when we might dwell in the king's palace. It is a false humility which insists on calling ourselves servants, when God calls us sons and daughters. By being cleansed from all unrighteousness we are certainly taught that we may have all kinds, classes and degrees of sin forgiven; that there is no stain so dark or deep that the blood of Christ cannot take it away. Think of the various mentioned in the Bible. Almost every possible condition of life is represented among the redeemed whose salvation is described on the inspired page. Here are the men and women who were outcasts from society, whose hands were red with blood, whose honor was trampled in the dust, whose purity was as a flower stained and rejected, but the grace of God cleansed them from sin and enrolled them among the heroes and heroines of faith. Behold the blood-washed throng before the great white throne. They are there from every nation; they are there cleansed from every kind and degree of sin. The fountain is still open; its cleansing tide flowed full and free. I stand here to-day finding as John the Baptist found my highest joy, my sweetest privilege and my most solemn duty in pointing to Jesus Christ and saying, "Behold, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

PROTECTING THE VETERANS!

"Checks! checks!" cried a strident voice, in the stairway. A couple of hundred faces instantly turned in that direction. It was a saloon tout, who, with lit cigar, stood on the steps. "Checks cashed free two doors below," he vociferated. "No waiting; cash 'em while you wait; and give yer somethin' inside ter keep ye warm besides. Come on—we'll do ye good."

"Yes, you'll do us as ye did us afore!" called out a veteran. "Ye've done us up nice all these years, ye loafer. Git out!"

But the admonition was not needed, for catching a glimpse of a bluecoat approaching through the crowd, the tout quickly vanished.

"My son is here, back o' me," said a frail old man, with thin, gray hair, "an he'll take care o' me. We've been here before, and you used me kindly. Here's my paper (producing the check). Thank you, I'll put the money away here afore I leave." It's all we have to carry us thro' the balance of this winter, an' we've been waiting for days to get it. I never had any full money till I came here, and we've every reason to bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the men who are doing this kind work for us old men. It's the drink, sir—the drink—that's what ails most of us. Praise God; I'm done with it!"

"COME THIS WAY, FATHER!"

One aged and very feeble pensioner entered the hall, shaking with the cold. For two hours he had stood with his wife outside, waiting for his check, and when he reached the Check-cashing Bureau he was in a fainting condition. A policeman rubbed him, got him by the Mission fire and gave him some hot coffee. "Ah!" said he, as he opened his eyes, "Now, I'm all right, honey. This is better than the saloon, isn't it, Mary? Ay, and I will get our money, all of it, into the bargain, which we couldn't do till Dr. Talmage and his paper made it easy like this. Ah! my friend," he said, turning to the officer, as he drained the last of his coffee, "when ye get ould, like me, ye'll know the value of a friend who helps to put coal and wood in the house and bread on the table, and, indeed, that's what they're doing to us ould chaps. My word! That coffee makes me feel like marchin' again."

There is a strong probability that the service rendered to the veterans by the Free Check-cashing Bureau in New York will soon be extended to other cities, where Pension Offices are located. Letters of inquiry have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from philanthropic, Christian people in different parts of the country, asking for full information with regard to the Bureau's system, with a view to the establishment of similar Bureaus elsewhere. If public-spirited, Christian men and women would unite in this work for the moral and social elevation of the old soldiers, the latter would soon cease to be the prey of the saloon-keepers on quarter-days. Besides, every Bureau so established would not only have a direct missionary influence, but would be equal in its own district to a general increase of pensions, since it would save a very large percentage of the amount now wasted in Columbus, Indianapolis, Topeka, Philadelphia and Boston by the pensioners, in cashing their checks across the bars of the whiskey shops.

There is no nobler battle for temperance and morality which Christian men and women could engage in; it is a field ripe for energetic, consecrated workers, and one which will yield an abundant harvest.

1. A lit-tle ship was on the sea, It was a pret-ty sight;
2. And all, but One, were sore a-fraid Of sinking in the deep;
3. He to the storm says, "Peace, be still!" The raging bil-lows cease;
It sail'd a-long so pleas-ant-ly, And all was fair and bright,
His head was on a pil-low laid, And He was fast a-sleep;
The might-y winds o-bey His will, And all are hush'd in peace;
When lo! a storm be-gan to rise, The wind grew loud and strong;
"Mas-ter, we per-ish! Master, save!" They cried,—their Master heard;
Oh, well we know it was the Lord, Our Sav-iour and our Friend,
It blew the clouds a-cross the skies, It blew the waves a-long.
He rose, rebuked the wind and wave, And still'd them with a word.

MY TESTIMONY.

THOUGH I cannot "speak like angels,"
Though I cannot "preach like Paul";
Yet have I a tongue to tell you
Of my Christ, my "All in All."

I can tell you how he cleansed me
From the stains of sin and shame;
How he succors, guides and keeps me
Glory to his holy Name!

Tell you how the Saviour saw me
Restless, discontented, roam;
Peace spoke to my soul, and gave me
A contented, happy home.

Then I'll tell you how he bade me
Work for him, and gave me grace,
Faithfully, with joy to serve him,
Till I see him face to face. —B. V.

"'TWAS BUT"

'TWAS but a hand-press and a tear
Where life was sad;
Only a smile of joy and cheer
Where all was glad;
Such tiny deeds they seemed to me,
As from a child;
Yet on the hand-press, on the tear,
The great God smiled.

'Twas but the lifting of the Cross
Laid at thy feet;
Only the letting go my will
My Lord to meet;
But weakly things they seem—and all
By sin defiled—
Yet on the gift of will and heart
The great God smiled.

HELP THOU ME.

"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily, and follow me." Luke 9: 23.

"JESUS, I my cross have taken,"
Help thou me its weight to bear;
Go with me o'er life's rough pathway,
And with me each trial share.

Thou canst strengthen, guide, and hold me,
As life's journey I pursue;
Give me grace for every conflict,
And for thee my love renew.

Help me, Lord, to read thy message,
And proclaim thy love so mild;
So that nations yet in darkness
May to thee be reconciled.—JACOB HENN.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A CARD FROM DR. TALMAGE.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 9, 1893.

To whom it may concern:

I receive hundreds of letters making inquiries of me concerning the Tanquerey Portrait Society, the Brooklyn Art Union and other portrait concerns, who in their advertisements and circulars use my name among their references. I have no knowledge whatever of any of these establishments, and therefore do not know how good or bad their business methods may be. I most emphatically decline any responsibility whatever in this matter, and any use of my name in this connection is altogether unauthorized.

Mrs. Louisa Fennell, Pawnee City, Neb., writes:

I was very much interested in reading about "The Travelers' Club," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: it did my heart good to read it. I hope there will be many more of them for I say with you, fill the hungry mouths and then preach religion.

She was of the tribe of Judah, but as to the names, circumstances and occupation of her parents, nothing definite is known. Creswell and several other commentators hold that the genealogy given by Luke (2. Chapter) is that of Mary rather than Joseph and that her father's name was Heli; while others who assert that Joseph married his cousin, affirm that she was the daughter of Jacob, the brother of Heli, sons of Matthat.

THE PREMILLENNIAL ADVENT.

Common Errors about its Time, Character and Purpose.

BY THE REV. A. L. BRAND

IN common with all the fundamental doctrines of the Bible, that of the second coming of Christ has been opposed, controverted, and misrepresented, even by the professed friends of the Coming One. It has been associated with error by fanciful interpreters, whose zeal was much more conspicuous than their wisdom. The doctrine is as scriptural and important now as it was in the days of the primitive church, and it should be more precious to us as we are so much nearer its realization.

The second coming is yet future. It would scarcely seem necessary to offer proof in support of a proposition so evident as this, and yet you are aware, that there were those in St. Paul's day who affirmed that the event had already occurred. That class have their representatives in the world to-day. I will only take time to specify four reasons:

1. It is yet future because the world has not yet been apprised of its accomplishment. "Behold, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him."—Rev. 1: 7.

2. Because the merciful and long-suffering silence of God is still unbroken, "Our God shall come and shall not keep silence" (Psa. 50: 3.) In the latter part of this Psalm we learn that God is silent with respect to the judgment and punishment of evil doers. This silence will be broken when he comes. St. Paul affirms that "He shall be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them who know not God and obey not the Gospel."—II. Thess. 1: 7, 8.

3. The resurrection has not yet taken place. "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive, but every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming."—1. Cor. 15: 22, 23.

4. The kingdoms of this world have not yet become the kingdoms of Christ. "And the seventh angel sounded and there were great voices in heaven saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever."—Rev. 11: 15.

I shall now proceed to the question proper; but first offer two negative propositions.

1. The coming of Christ does not take place at the death of a believer. Christ is with him then, as he is all through his Christian life—in spirit. It is the enemy, death, who comes, and Christ sustains and accompanies through the valley, and in the shadow; along the pathway which he hath trod before, and the lamp of his life is the guide through the gloom. When he comes, death will be destroyed. He comes as the Prince of life. We may now say, as did Mary and Martha, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, our brother had not died." Or sing with Bickersteth:

[illegible]

Hush! be every murmur dumb,
It is only till he come.

2. It is not fulfilled in any sense, by the visitation of wrath, either of an individual or nation. I need only quote one passage—"When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another." All nations will then be judged, not as nations but as individuals; and each will be rewarded or punished according to condition. With these remarks on these negative propositions, I now turn to the affirmative, and affirm that the coming of Christ will be visible, glorious, personal and premillennial.

Visible—"Every eye shall see him," (Rev. 1: 7.) Glorious, "Looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great [illegible]." (Titus 2: 13.) Personal. "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts 1: 11.) "The Lord himself [illegible] resurrection of the saints takes place at the commencement of the thousand years, and as that takes place at his coming (see 1. Cor. 15: 23; and 1. Thess. 4: 16), [illegible]

SENDING PORTIONS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Feb. 26. Nehemiah 8: 10; Acts 3: 5-9.

WHEN some great good has fallen into a man's possession, if he be a true man his first impulse is to make some one else happy. The people mentioned in the first passage selected for the Topic were relieved of the burden of their sin. They had discovered that they were worse sinners than they had supposed, and were stricken with shame and alarm. Then came the relief, the pardon of their sins, and their joy finds expression in sending portions to them for whom nothing had been prepared. It is a type of the spiritual process we call conversion. First conviction, with its accompanying distress, then the entering into joy and peace and the consciousness of forgiveness. There, too, we expect the same effect. There is no surer sign of genuine conversion than that the subject of it feels an outgoing of love to everyone. He, too, should let that love be manifest by sending portions to those who are in need.

But what are the portions that should be sent? The simplest and that which gives the least trouble is money. In every great city there are thousands in bitter need of that portion. Christ and his apostles insist on the duty of Christian charity. Individuals may do, and have done much, but the time is at hand when the Church in its corporate capacity must take up this awful problem of poverty and provide a remedy for it better than that of alms-giving. However we may try to close our eyes to the fact, God does not see with approval men kept by our social conditions on the brink of starvation, unable to earn an honest living though they are quite willing and eager to work, while men who call themselves Christians have more money than they can ever use, and are struggling to get more. Among the portions to be sent out must be this of the opportunity to every man of supporting himself honestly. But that is only elementary. If we give of our own best things we must come closer than that. The enlightened man does not regard his riches as his most precious possession. His education, his culture, his mental endowment are something dearer far to him than houses or lands. His duty in sending portions is not done until he has made a strenuous effort to impart something of a mental and moral stimulus to those who are living on the level of beasts, who see no higher good than the gratification of physical appetite. A better portion to send out is that being sent out in the College Settlements now at work, in teaching mental and moral refinement to men and women who know not its value. But the best portion of all is that which the poorest Christian may send. He knows of a joy better than wealth, better than refinement, and in telling of that and the way to attain it, he is sending out the best of all portions. He may be unable to give largely of money, or culture, but he does a better service than in giving either, when, realizing the value to him of the joys of divine sonship he looks around on the toiling, hopeless, joyless drudge whom he may meet on any street, and says to him: "Such as I have give I thee."

THE CHILDREN AT WORK

DEEPLY interesting are the evidences furnished by the reports sent to the Silver Cross from all parts of the country, of the spirit of helpfulness which has been aroused among the children by the Order of King's Daughters. One of the Chicago Circles composed exclusively of children have put their mites together for the purchase of a rocking-chair which has been placed in a church parlor. Every Sunday the chair is occupied by some mother who can bring her baby and sit there and listen to the service instead of remaining at home a prisoner for the baby's sake. An interesting feature of this achievement of buying the rocking-chair was that the children earned the money for its purchase. No contributions were accepted of money that had been given to them. Some extra duty was undertaken by each little Daughter of the King, either in the home, or school, or neighborhood for which compensation was given and the little earnings went to the fund for the purchase of the rocking-chair. The earnings were all in pennies and in some instances a great deal of work was done for a penny, but in the end the fund mounted to the $25 required for the chair. The children are delighted with the result and with the extent to which it is appreciated by the mothers in the church, and, like David at the threshing floor of Araunah, they are able to say they have not given that which cost them nothing.

A SUCCESSFUL B. Y. P. U. PRESIDENT.

ONE of the most vigorous and aggressive Baptist Young People's Unions so far formed is that of the Maritime Provinces. Its President is Mr. J. Kaye Ross, whose portrait appears on this page. Mr. Ross is a native of Prince Edward Island and is in his thirty-second year. He is a son of the Rev. Malcolm Ross, whose title of "Father" Ross, by which he is known far and wide, indicates the affectionate reverence in which he is held by the people. Mr. Ross was converted in his nineteenth year and united with the Cavendish Baptist Church. He made teaching his profession and succeeded in building up a large and successful school. He also engaged successfully in extensive farming operations, which proved very lucrative. He now resides in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, where he devotes himself largely to religious and philanthropic work. Mr. Ross is a member of the First Baptist Church in that town, whose pastor is Rev. J. A. Gordon, the present President of the Baptist Convention of the Maritime Provinces. The church is a well organized, aggressive body, doing an excellent work in the town. Mr. Ross is one of its most active members, and he took a special interest in the formation of the local Young People's Union in the church. The extension of the movement in the churches of other towns had his hearty sympaty and co-operation, so that when the Provincial Union was organized recently at Bridgetown, Nova Scotia, Mr. Ross was naturally the man to whom the Unions turned in looking for a vigorous and able President. Much of the success that has attended the Baptist Young People's Union of the Maritime Provinces, is due to the energy and ability with which he has performed his duties.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

EXTENSIVE preparations are being made in Washington, D. C., for the great mass-meeting which the Fourth General Conference District are to hold there in May next.—An effort is being made to change the date of the great international Convention at Cleveland, Ohio, from the first to the third week in July. The League has accepted the offer of the Saengerfest Hall which has been made by the committee in charge of the Hall. It is only a temporary structure but it has seating accommodation for 12,000 persons.—The Chapter of Laurence, L. I., has spent a hundred dollars in fitting up handsome rooms for its use and is beginning to collect a library. The Chapter has sixty members.—At Matteawan the League rents a good pew at fifty dollers a year which it has furnished with hymn-books and placed at the disposal of the church for the use of strangers.—The League in South Dakota has been making a field-day of its second anniversary. A great convention was held at Huron which continued four days. Mr. F. A. Burdick was re-elected President and a vice-president was elected to represent each conference district. The utmost enthusiasm was manifested by the delegates.—At Madelia, Minn., some excellent methods of work have been adopted. Among others self-addressed postal cards from the Mercy and Help Department have been handed to the physicians of the town, who, when they have a patient in need of help either of nursing or of medicines or medical appliances, have merely to fill in and mail the card and the League attends to the case to the best of its ability. Arrangements are also made by which families moving into the town receive a call from a representative of the League, who invites the family to church.

DR. F. E. CLARK IN JAPAN.

FROM Dr. Clark's letter to the Golden Rule, we extract the following: Japan the wonderful! Japan the beautiful! Japan the country that has leaped with a bound into the charmed circle of great civilized nations! Here we are, and here we have been for eight busy days. Into these days have been crowded thirteen meetings and several hundreds of miles of railway travel.

After seven days from Hong Kong, of wild tossing on the China Sea, the Peru anchored in the tranquil harbor of Yokohama. The next day was Sunday, and besides preaching at the two services in the Union Church "for foreigners," I spoke to the girls of the two large schools of Yokohama, the Ferris Seminary of the Reformed Church, and the Woman's Union Mission School. The meeting was held in the hall of the latter school, and it was as bright and interesting an audience as I ever addressed. The next day a vigorous society was organized in the Union Church, among the foreigners, from which the honored and beloved pastor, Rev. Dr. Meacham, of the Canadian Methodist Board, expects great things.

The Methodist Protestant Board of Missions also has a good station here, and Rev. A. R. Morgan and his helpers I greatly enjoyed meeting. Before my visit, Mr. Morgan had the only Christian Endeavor Society in Yokohama, among the Japanese young people; and he speaks very highly of its work. His church is about to organize a Junior Society.

Tuesday we went a hundred miles north, into the interior of Japan, to attend a conference of the native pastors of all denominations at Takasaki. After speaking to them as well as I could through an interpreter, Mr. Yokoi, who by the way, is one of the most eminent native pastors in all Japan, I went to the neighboring city of Maebashi, where Rev. W. H. Noyes, of the Berkeley Temple Mission, is holding the fort in heroic style, far from any of his brethren, assisted by his noble wife and two lady missionaries. Here, the same evening, I spoke to a popular audience of Japanese, and the next morning we had a chance to see a genuine Japanese town of the interior. We have very little time for sight-seeing, except incidently in travelling from place to place. At noon, the next day, we started for Tokyo, the capital of Japan.

My first appointment in Tokyo was before a Japanese audience of five or six hundred, to whom I attempted to explain our Society as well as possible. This meeting was held in "Dr. Eby's tabernacle," as it is called, a fine church belonging to the Canadian Methodist Missionary Board. The Presbyterians have, I suppose, the largest missionary force in Tokyo, though the Baptists, Episcopalians, and Methodist Episcopalians are well represented, while, though there is but one Congregational missionary family in Tokyo, that of Dr. and Mrs. D. C. Greene, the pioneer missionaries of the American Board in this land, there are several strong Congregational Japanese churches. It was our great pleasure to meet nearly all these missionaries, one hundred in all, at a delightful reception that was tendered us at the home of Rev. W. J. White, in Skiji, the foreign concession of Tokyo. This reception and the public meeting that preceded it were under the auspices of the Tokyo conference, which embraces missionaries of all denominations. I went again to Yokohama, where many of the Japanese pastors are on the point of starting societies, had a large audience in the Shiloh Presbyterian Church, and addressed three other meetings in Tokyo, in Japanese churches. Rev. T. Harada, a leading pastor, has compiled a thirty-page leaflet about Christian Endeavor, of which five thousand will be distributed soon. Everything is hopeful.

THE BIRD'S NEST.

NOW only look what I have found,
A sparrow's nest upon the ground:
A sparrow's nest, as you may see,
Blown out of yonder old elm tree.

And what a medley thing it is!
I never saw a nest like this;
So neatly wove with decent care,
Of silvery moss, and shining hair.

Think had these odds and ends been brought
To some wise man renowned for thought;
Some man of men, a very gem—
Pray, what could he have done with them?

How would the man of learning vast,
Have been astonished and aghast;
And vow that such a thing had been
Ne'er heard or thought of, much less seen?

Ah, man of learning, you are wrong,
Instinct is more than wisdom strong,
And He who made the sparrow, taught
This skill beyond your reach of thought.

And here in this uncostly nest,
These little creatures have been blest;
Nor have kings known in palaces
Half their contentedness in this—
Poor simple dwelling as it is.

In Earthquake Lands.

The Recent Calamity at Zante—Some of the Famous Earthquakes Recorded in Sacred and Profane History.

EARTHQUAKES are of rare occurrence in our own favored land, and the slight shocks that are experienced occasionally are seldom attended by any considerable loss of life or property. If we except the great Charleston earthquake several years ago and the occasional seismic disturbances on the Pacific Coast, it may be said that there have been no notable earthquakes in the United States in a generation or more. There are, however, many other countries not so happily situated. Mexico and South America generally have frequently recurring earthquakes, attended by loss of life and wrecking of buildings. The countries of Southern Europe, and more particularly Italy, Greece, and the islands of the Mediterranean Sea and the Greek archipelago are more frequently visited by such calamities than any other part of the globe. On January 30th, the island of Zante, off the west coast of Greece, was shaken, and many business houses and dwellings were wrecked, the occupants being driven in terror into the streets, in their night-clothes. The roof of a prison fell in and many persons were injured, the principal hospital sank several feet, and its walls were shaken and cracked. All the towns-people fled in panic to the outskirts. Hundreds of dead are said to be buried in the ruins of the wrecked buildings. Meanwhile the people of Zante are homeless and the government has undertaken to provide them with food and shelter. The island has 45,000 inhabitants of whom 2000 are Jews. It is built on volcanic rocks which are believed to cover subterranean fires. The town of Zante has about 16,000 inhabitants.

The island of Zante, where the earthquake occurred, is one of the Peloponnesian group in the Mediterranean. On this page our illustration shows the town of Zante, the ancient Zacynthus, which stands on the margin of a lovely semicircular bay. It is flanked by two high hills; on one is the castle. The hill to the south is called, from its extensive view, Mount Scoto; probably it is the same as the ancient Elatus, or "mountain of silver firs," which formerly, as may be presumed from its name, gave a reason, no longer existing, for the "woody Zacynthus," mentioned by Homer, the poet. Much has been said concerning the origin of the name of Zacynthus itself, and, as is usually the case, heroes have been created at will, from whom that appellation has been derived; but names of places are generally assigned in consequence of some peculiarity existing in the sites themselves. Cynthus, in the early Greek language, was a general term for a hill. Looking at these two mountains in the picture and the town placed between them, one need go no further than the immediate neighborhood of Zacynthus for what it so well supplies, namely: the reason for its designation, which may be compared to that of a woody mountain of Epirus, called Za-longus, of which word that latter part (longus) is the general romaic term for a forest while Za denotes size

The interior of the town of Zante has not much to recommend it. The streets have dark, dwarfish arcades: in the houses are latticed windows, and in the shops none at all. There are pretty lanes and hedges of pomegranates, quinces, smilax and aloes, toward the southwest district, and in the distance are long lines of cypresses. On the left of the road is a wine-vat similar to those in which Dionysius is represented treading out the grapes in ancient monuments. It consists of two compartments, three feet deep, and covered over with stucco.

Scientific authorites hold that earthquake shocks are caused by concussions or sudden blows delivered underground at some definite centre, which is termed the seismic focus. From this centre longitudinal waves are propagated in all directions through the solid material of the earth's crust, and these earthquake waves are accompanied by similar undulations of the water. Those marine disturbances sometimes extend hundreds of miles in a circle (from the common centre.) A friend of the writer, who was in Messina during an earthquake several years ago, thus described the peculiar and never-to-be-forgotten sensation:

THE ISLAND OF ZANTE, OR ZACYNTHUS.
(Scene of the recent destructive earthquakes)

"I had left my steamer at the dock to go up street and, when a few rods away, I experienced a dizzy, sea-sick sort of feeling and tried to grasp at something to steady myself. The street seemed to rise and fall and I felt certain I was going to be quite ill, when, looking around, I saw to my astonishment that the houses were also rocking. I staggered as well as I could to the middle of the road. Looking up and down I saw the roadway undulating like the waters of the sea. The dwellings swayed inward and outward and in several places, great pieces of plaster and stone fell crashing to the street raising a blinding dust. People tumbled shrieking from the doorways, and fell as they tried to run. Then it flashed upon my mind that I was caught in an earthquake!

"Falling and stumbling repeatedly, I managed to retrace my steps to the pier where the steamer lay and was just in time, for my crew were casting off the cables to make for the open sea. We moved away and then (for the shocks continued in quick succession) we saw that many buildings had fallen and others were tumbling. Fugitives were running in all directions—some were fortunate enough to come on board before we moved out. It was soon over, but while it lasted it seemed as though it had been hours instead of minutes. The loss of life and property in that brief space was appalling."

The earthquakes recorded in history are so numerous as to excite wonder in the minds of those who, like ourselves, dwell in a country so far removed from the "seismic belt." From 1606 B.C. to 1842 A.D., between 6000 and 7000 earthquakes are known to have occurred in different parts of the world—both by land and sea. A number are mentioned in the Bible. Psalm 16: 7 relates how "the earth shook and trembled." Korah and his company were swallowed up by a similar convulsion (Numbers 16: 32), and at the time of the Saviour's death (Matt. 27: 51), a memorable earthquake occurred. In Ahab's time (I. Kings 19: 11,12), an earthquake terrified the wicked Israelites, and in the reign of Uzziah (781 B.C.) the temple was rent by a seismic shock (Zech. 14: 5.) At Oppido, in Calabria (1738 A.D.) at Lisbon, at Puteoli and around the Dead Sea, destructive visitations attended by great loss of life have occurred at different times during the world's history.

Don't be Afraid of Work.

It is well, in my opinion, says George W. Childs, to accustom one's self early to work, and not to be afraid of any kind of work that is honest and useful. I began to support myself when I was only twelve years old, I had some schooling, but not much. I never went to college, not because I did not think a college career might be a good thing for those who could afford it, and who could make a good use of it, but because I did not feel that it was not so important to me as to be earning my own living.

A man can be industrious, and yet his industry may not achieve much valuable result. You must not only work, but you must order your work with intelligence. You must be preparing the way for what you intend to become as well as do with care what lies to your hand. While I was working as errand and office boy I improved such opportunity as I had to read books, and to attend book sales, so as to learn the market value of books and anything else that might be useful to me hereafter. It was my aim always to be in a position where I could use my best talents to the best advantage. I fixed my ambition high, so that, even if I did not realize the highest, I might at least, always be tending upward. A man should not only use all his faculties, but be constantly developing them so that he can do more. If you jump at a thing with your whole heart and mind, though you may not be exceptionably able, it is wonderful how much you may accomplish. But if you are half-hearted you will fail. You must not yield to the temptation to relax your efforts, and turn off and amuse yourself.

The Emperor and the Farmer's Wife.

A CHARACTERISTIC story is told of the German Emperor's late visit to Austria. When, on a hunting expedition, he found himself at midday very hungry and three miles from the luncheon baskets. He asked his companion, Count Dohna, anxiously, if there were nothing at all eatable in the neighborhood. The Count remembered that there was a small farm not far away. Thither they went, and the woman of the house told them them that she had only milk, bread, butter, and wurst to set before them, and very little of that. "Milk, bread, butter, and wurst," exclaimed his Majestly: "why, that is a meal to set before a king." And he set to with such a good will that soon only a few fragments remained. "And now my good woman," said the Emperor, taking a golden double eagle from his pocket and placing it in the hands of the farmer's wife, "go and buy yourself more wurst and more bread, and, if you can afford it out of the change, a twenty cent picture of the Kaiser, for you can point to it and say, 'I once saved that poor man from starvation.'"

AFRICAN WIVES.

FROM a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Hackensack, N. J., comes the following very interesting extract from a letter written by a missionary friend in Africa, a student at Rev. A.B. Simpson's Training College, who was sent to the foreign field last Spring.

NAGANDA, AFRICA.

I am stationed at Naganda, seventy miles from Stanley Pool. I live in a little house built of brick, with a thatched roof. There are only two rooms in it, and I have one furnished with home-made articles. My work is to teach the children of the Swedish Mission how to read, write, sew and keep house.

We have no railroads or horse cars here, but travel on foot or by hammocks. I traveled seven days in one of these, walking over the high hills.

We held our first baptismal service last Sabbath. Three missionaries started with about seventy of our boys for a creek two miles away. We passed villages on the road where a white woman had never been seen. When we arrived at the place appointed for the meeting, the boys sat down on the bank of the stream; then we had singing, prayer and Scripture reading, after which Mr. Loison took one of the boys into the water and baptized him, giving him the name of Abraham.

I do not know much about the customs of the people, yet will tell what I have already learned. When a man dies, his body is suspended from the roof, a fire is built under it, and it is smoked about six months. His widows enter the apartment and are not allowed to leave until the end of that time. Other women bring food, water and wood. One sits there to see that they do not turn their faces away from the dead man. When the days of mourning are over, the body is taken down and dressed in a red cloth suit much too large for it; then the garment is stuffed with straw. The face is marked out with black grease, then placed on a litter and ten men dance around with it, thinking the dead is enjoying the performance as much as the living. They feast, shout and dance for several days and then take it to its last resting-place.

An African can have as many wives as he is able to buy. I am acquainted with one who has ten. Some are too poor to purchase, so they hire them. If they fail to pay the price, the women are returned to their owners, the children going with the mothers. No one cares for a wife who has no children, so she is sold from one to another. Women are valued more highly than men. They work out in the fields all day and cook their husbands' food at night, so we have but little chance to speak to them. When a man is in debt and has no boys to sell he will dispose of his sisters. We have three girls who came to us in this way, and there is no other way of getting them. If the missionaries did not buy them they would be sold to others and taken very far away, so we only free them from a life of bondage. Cloth, beads and knives are used instead of money. The girls can be bought for about ninety dollars' worth of these things, sometimes for less.

It is no trouble to get boys as they do not find employment in the villages and their parents are glad to let them come to school because they receive in return that which they can exchange for food. We have to turn many of them away for we cannot take care of them all. Those that we now have are supported by people in Sweden. Twenty dollars will keep a boy in school for a year. Many of them are led to drop their idols by being in school.

A STORY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HOME

CHAPTER XVI.

A RECOGNITION.

GUIDED by one or two young men of H——, who volunteered to watch with him at night, Dora for three days took all the care of Peirce Denham. Perhaps it was owing to her tender, womanly care that the patient grew no worse, and terrible as were his injuries, life seemed to be striving to reassert itself.

"Living," said the doctor, "is impossible, but the lingering is wonderful."

Peirce Denham said little, and for the most part seemed to be deaf to all that passed about him. Once he said, "Dora, you are very kind to me."

"I do my duty," said Dora shortly. "Have you no duty to yourself in these hours before death?"

"Duty and I never got acquainted," said Denham. "Then, Dora, suppose I got well? Would you stay with me?"

"No;" said Dora with energy. "Your character and way of life are more dreadful to me than ever."

"How have you lived? Who takes care of you?" asked Denham.

"I live with my uncle in a little five-roomed house by the railroad track," said Dora, "and part of my time I have taught. My uncle is old and he needs my attention. The uncle I lived with in Louisville turned me out of doors because of you. If you should get well enough to be taken to a hospital, that would end all that you would ever see of me."

That night Dora watched. In the midnight Peirce said, "Dora, is anyone near enough to hear?"

Dora shook her head.

"Well, they put the coat I had on in that closet. Rip the back-lining and give me a paper—two papers from it."

"Dora reluctantly took scissors to the torn and bloody coat. She handed him the papers.

"I've used the rest up," he said, but there. I fixed that so anyone could get it. I had to. If I'd been nabbed someone could have used it to help me out. You can have it Dora. No one else has a right; you are my wife."

Dora shuddered.

"Ten thousand dollars. I'm glad you've got it. You deserve something, my girl. Take it."

"Do you think I'd touch it," said Dora. "Stolen money!"

"But you don't know where it came from, girl. Take it."

"No, I won't," said Dora vehemently, "I'd starve first."

"Great goodness! What a crank you are!" gasped Denham. "What will you do with it? Burn it up? Drop it on the floor so the servant can pick it up? It's sound cash, stupid! You could get good out of it, though it is too [illegible]

"I could work; I could even beg if I must," said Dora bitterly, "I could not live upon the [illegible]

"See here," said Denham, "I offered it all to you. It seemed as if I owed you something. If I get well, I'll go divvys with it if you change your mind; but I tell you every dime of it was got at the risk of my life, and it isn't to be thrown down like an old rag! I may get out of this, and not be man enough ever to crack a bank again. If you mean to throw it away, wait till you're sure I'm underground, will you?"

Dora picked up the paper and locked it in her valise. She turned down the light, straightened the bed-clothes, and going to the window, drew up the shade and stood looking into the wide, peaceful, moon-lit winter night. The snow lay over all the ground, and upon it were sharply traced the shadows of the trees, the fine net-work of ash and maple, or elm, the black cones of the evergreens. Oh, stillness! Oh, peace! Was her life ever again to know calm rest? Might this man live, a helpless wreck, a demon mind in a distorted, helpless body! What then should she do with him? What course would be duty? She cried out to God, "Make not my burden heavier than I can bear."

Sometimes death is the best solution of difficult questions.

"Here is a curious case," said the doctor the next day. "All good surgery would say that he ought to die, that he had no right to live an hour after such injuries. What is he made of? He is stronger this morning, and for all I can see may live a week or ten days. A better man would have died before now. Miss Lacy, this case may linger longer than we reckoned on, and you cannot keep up many more days as you have been doing. We must have a nurse. There are no trained nurses near here, but we can get some one who will relieve you. You are looking pale and worn. Don't throw away a useful life on a bad life. I'll see if I can hear of a nurse."

"I think I should have the best that can be had," said Dora. "Cannot we find a skilled nurse in the city?"

"No doubt. But do you know the expense?"

"That is all right," said Dora. "There is money. I brought plenty and I can send for more."

"I will telegraph for a nurse to come on the evening train."

"Have a lady come, not a man nurse; as I must be there all the time. A lady will be more comfort to me."

Dora and the doctor had talked in the hall. As Dora re-entered the room, Denham said snappishly, "What has the doctor been saying to you? That I'll get well? And you're mad about it? I'll get well to spite you."

Long sharp pain had worn away Denham's past careless defiance, and now he was in a state of furious irritation which only his helpless condition prevented being dangerous to his attendants.

"He said he should telegraph to Boston for a trained nurse."

"Oh, doing their best to keep the burglar alive, so they can send him to the penitentiary! They won't see me in a cell."

"The cell that waits for you," said Dora, "is dark and narrow and silent. It will hold you until the 'judgment of the great day.' What will you answer to your Judge. These unexpected hours of reprieve are to give you one last opportunity to make your peace with God. Think of it. Do you not hate the sin that has brought you where you are!"

"No, you fool, I love it," said Denham with an oath.

Fever was rising, and all day long Denham rolled his tortured head on his pillow, moaning and crying out with pain. Dora scarcely sat down a moment, constantly on the alert to do something for the miserable creature's relief.

"I don't know absolutely who she is, or what claim he has on her," said Mrs. Pemberton. "But one thing is certain, she could not do more if he were her nearest and dearest, and that I know he is not. Hers is no sorrow or pity born of love. There is no tenderness in her eyes, she never calls him by any name, there is in her face toward him no sweetness, relic of some past when he was good and dear. There is no emotion in her calm, gentle voice. She has come here to do what she feels to be a duty. She does it nobly. I hope the nurse will come. She has had a terrible day."

"Toward evening, Dora said to her groaning patient, "Perhaps it might help and quiet you, if I sing to you. I can sing."

"Bosh. You'd sing hymns," growled Denham.

But Dora was herself worn out and nearly overcome with nervous distress; some relief she must have or she would break down. She must sing to herself, if not to him. She darkened the room and leaning back in her rocking-chair, she sang:

The King of Love my Shepherd is
His will be mine me to-day,
Since He is mine and I am His,
I can go and I travel
The King of Love my Shepherd is

As her rich, well modulated voice rose and the notes came fuller and fuller, the sharp contention of cries and moans on the bed ceased; the music floated through the partly opened door and Mrs. Pemberton came to listen in the hall. The maid busy in the dining-room held her breath, ceased laying the table and hearkened with all her soul. As singing seemed to command the quiet that she sought, when the first lyric ceased, Dora presently began again.

Oh, ye tears, Oh, ye tears, that have long refused to flow,
Ye are welcome to my heart, thawing, thawing, like the snow;
The ice-bound clod has yielded, and the early snow-drops spring,
And the healing fountains gush, and the wilderness shall sing.

So she sang on, and as she closed:

There is light upon my path, there is sunshine in my heart,
And the leaf and fruit of life shall not utterly depart.
Ye restore to me the freshness and the bloom of long ago,
Oh ye tears, blessed tears, I am thankful that ye flow.

The last lingering note was undertoned by a sob. Not of the singer, not of the man on the bed, moaning under his breath—the sob came from one in the hall—the doctor stood there with the new nurse who had just arrived, and stayed their steps, not to disturb this flood of harmony. The nurse sobbed—the voice seemed to arise out of her past.

"The nurse, Miss Lacy," said the doctor, "Mrs. Wing."

Dora moved the lamp-screen and turned up the light, as she held out her hand. But the light flashed over a face so pale, that she exclaimed, "Why, you look terribly ill yourself! What is the matter?"

The doctor caught the nurse's wrist. "Your heart is not behaving itself. Is this common?"

"Not at all. I am quite well and strong. We have walked quickly in the frosty air. It is cold to-night. But the car was very close. She spoke in firm, even tones.

"A cup of tea will right you. Come out to tea. Miss Lacy can go afterwards. I'll take my tea here, too, Cousin Clara," to Mrs. Pemberton. "Here is the nurse, Mrs. Wing." The nurse was calmly removing her cloak and hat. From the bed Denham spoke, as if unconscious of any presence but that of the singer.

"I say, I did not know you had such a voice, Dora! Thunder, if you'd had grit to follow my lead! Couldn't you have sung the whole town into a trance, while I cracked the safes? Your songs would have covered the multitude of my sins!"

Miserable, wrecked, dying as he lay there, a sudden fury rose against him in Dora's soul. How these words humiliated her before these people! She could not lift her head to look one of them in the face. A bitter sigh broke from her. Surely now they must know her secret, that she had stooped to the hideous defilement of marriage with this man.

Yes, there was no further hope of concealment. Both the doctor and Mrs. Pemberton had suspected the relations of the two. Dora's coming at all forbade the idea that the realtionship was a distant one. The tie must be a near one; a woman so refined and gentle as Dora would not have brought herself to acknowledge her connection with the rough, coarse burglar, if she had been outside his immediate family. Was she his sister or his wife? It must be one of the two, and Dora's manner was not sisterly. So, both the observers came to the conclusion that she must be the burglar's wife, and pretty accurately guessed at the actual circumstances. They had been careful not to allow Dora to perceive that they suspected her secret, but now Denham's brutal remark rendered their assumption of ignorance unnecessary.

"Child," said the doctor to Dora, "the more innocent and unworldly a girl is, the more readily is she deceived."

Mrs. Pemberton took her hand. "It is written, 'Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.'"

"Come to tea," said the doctor to the nurse. "You tremble like a leaf. If this goes on, you must go to bed, and I shall watch here myself, Miss Lacy is about worn out."

"I shall be all right immediately, said the nurse as she left the room with him.

When Dora had gone out to tea the nurse began to set things in order for the night. As she adjusted the little screen on the table to shield the patient's face from the lamplight, she saw a sealed letter which Dora had written while the family were at tea. Its address was, "Miss Eloise Maple, Plymouth, Mass."

What was there in a little white envelope to shake this woman as a reed is shaken in a mighty wind? She had learned to stand by, calm, strong, helpful, during terrible surgical operations, she could bind wounds, she had gone down with many to the gates of death, her strong courage sustaining trembling souls. But now her feet could not uphold her; she sank to her knees and prayed, "My God, give me grace."

"Dora," said the voice from the bed, the utterance thick with fever, "you shan't go off and leave me now. You left me once. As soon as I showed you what I was you slipped from me, as a bird slips out of the hand! You can't go now! You shan't leave me to that tall black-gowned thing! I know her dress smells of ether and carbolic acid. She means death! You mean life. Dora, you are my wife. You'll stand by me!"

The nurse, who had been introduced as Mrs. Wing, rose from her knees, firm, though her heart was torn with agony. "And was this your fate, my poor deserted child? Did you marry him? O God, thou has chastised me, and I was chastised. I have now received of the Lord's hand double for all my sins. My baby, my little girl left to this. And yet, how fair you are, how pure, how sweet, how they all prize you! Has God kept you spotless in the mire? My darling, let me be very firm now; you have bitter cause to bow with shame for your husband, you shall not be put to further shame by your mother."

Thus the nurse combated the weakness of nature, as she moved here and there in the room. The doctor returned. "I have sent Miss Lacy up stairs to bed. If you are feeling ill, I'll sit up myself."

"I am quite well and strong," said the nurse calmly.

"Fever's rising now, as I wonder it has not done before. Don't spare the opiates."

"The case is hopeless. All that can be done is to quiet pain."

"Aud let other people have a chance to rest," said the doctor. "Here, I'll post that letter," and away he hurried.

With fever, delirium, and intervals of stupor and quiet the night passed away. Dora had an early breakfast and sent the nurse to take a sleep in the room above stairs. After the doctor's visit, Denham woke from an hour's slumber; he was calmer, and in his right mind. The nurse drew up the shade of the window behind the bed, and in the full light it afforded, arranged the bandages on the mutilated face and side. Denham kept perfectly quiet.

When all was done, he said to the nurse: "Stand still there. Dora! come here. Stand beside this woman. Nurse, take off that thing from your head."

She hesitated: he screamed, "Take it off, I say! or I'll break out. If I'm quiet, keep me quiet!"

The nurse removed her cap. Denham looked from one to the other. "You know it, and she don't, eh? Dora, you told me your mother was dead. This woman is your mother, if ever you had one. It don't need a person to be as sharp as a thief to see how you two are related. I never saw such a likeness. Go look at yourselves in the glass."

Dora turned to the nurse, took both her hands and looked earnestly in her face. The nurse lowered her eyes, and big tears began to roll over her cheeks.

A Beautiful Life!

Sister Nettie Van Name, "the Rapturous Evangelist"—Her Consecrated Work and Her Triumphant Death.

IN a chaste little volume, just issued by the National Holiness Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Rev. George Hughes and Mrs. Lidie H. Kenney furnish a most interesting history of the life-work of Nettie Van Name, whose portrait appears on this page. Her spirituality was remarkable and her ministry marvelously effectual. Touching her peculiar gifts, C. I. D. Pepper writes in a brief introduction to the book:

"Her 'rapture,' her millennium, her coming of Christ, antedated the one that is anticipated so fondly by so many. Her faith was astonishingly triumphant. Her life was unusually victorious. Her hope was glorious. The joy of God's salvation ever thrilled and filled her buoyant soul. Tears were transformed into spiritual meat and drink. Afflictions were a stimulus to her holy fortitude and courage. Difficulties were an inspiration. Disappointments were to her God's appointments. Trials and troubles winged more rapidly her heavenward flight. Prejudices and persecutions made her more eager to win those who knew her not, as they knew Him not who had sent her.

"She never rose to speak, or to sing, in any meeting, without her face fairly beaming with 'sunshine in the sweetness of her Lord.' Her smile was contagious with her own overflowing happiness. She was the life of holy company. The tones of her voice were musical with the 'melody unto the Lord,' which harmonized so perfectly in her heart. Every motion thrilled with spiritual enthusiasm. Her whole thought and soul were responsive to all that was sweetest and brightest and best in 'the glorious gospel of the blessed God.'"

Nettie Van Name was the daughter of Christian parents of the old Methodist type. Her father, John Van Name, was "a man mighty in prayer." All her early surroundings were those of a bright and happy Christian home. She experienced conversion at a camp-meeting at Sing Sing, N. Y., to the great joy of her parents and sisters, and from that time onward her life was wholly devoted to bringing others into the fold. Her musical education had been a thorough one and her beautiful voice was now employed in "singing for Jesus" instead of giving expression to the songs of the world.

At an early period in her Christian life, she joined the Salvation Army and after a brief experience in its ranks, began the life of an evangelist, at first in connection with a church in Philadelphia. Soon however, her beautiful voice and the fervent eloquence of her appeals, challenged the widest attention and she became known all over the Union, singing and preaching in many churches and at Young People's meetings, etc. Her efforts were blessed by abundant conversions wherever she went to work for the Master.

In relating her experiences at different times she would often sing this hymn:

THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE.

Talk not to me of wealth and store,
Of glittering gems or golden ore:
A pearl I've found of richer price,
Like that which grows in Paradise.
It is what Paul apprized so high,
It is what one sold all to buy:
It is God's love within the heart,
It doth substantial joy impart.
Long time I sought, but sought in vain.
Some pure enjoyment to obtain;
I ranged the fields of pleasure o'er,
But never found such peace before.
To me the sting of death is gone,
The grave's divested of its gloom;
I view it as a calm retreat,
Where I may rest in balmy sleep.

With her co-laborer, Mrs. Kenney, she was instrumental in reaching thousands of hearts and bringing many souls to the Saviour. A year ago her health began to give way, under the pressure of her severe labors in the evangelistic field. In spite of pain and weariness, she continued to proclaim Jesus and to testify to her love and devotion to his service, even while her life sands were visibly running out. Her death-bed was a splendid Christian triumph—a scene never to be forgotten by those who stood beside her. She passed away at Ocean Grove, N. J., where she had spent many happy days in working for Christ during her brief lifetime.

Nettie Van Name will long be remembered by the Christian people among whom she passed the greater part of her life. In her work, the power of holy song was exemplified in a way that often found an entrance to the heart when all other means failed. One of her favorites, which she sang many, many times, was a hymn called "Ishi," to the familiar tune of Bartimeus. It is as follows:

O my heart is full of laughter,
I am very, very glad;
For I have a precious treasure,
Such as princes never had.

CHO.—Wilt thou have this precious Ishi,
Bridegroom of thy soul to be?
He, the fairest of ten thousand,
Waits in love to welcome thee.

Ishi, Ishi, is the jewel,
Mine he is while ages roll,
Angels taste not of such glory,
Holy Ishi of the soul.

Many beauteous names thou bearest,
Brother, Shepherd, Friend and King,
But they none unto my spirit
Such divine support can bring.

In Thy own fair realms of glory,
In the holiest above,
Choirs of angels chant the story
Of the wondrous matchless love.

All my longings are contented,
All my wanderings tend to Thee,
Pole-star of my restless spirit:
Ishi, all the world to me.

MISS DE BROEN'S MISSION.

THE Christian work being done in Belleville, Paris, by Miss de Broen, which was fully described in this journal recently, is still being carried on with success. A lady who has recently returned from a visit of several months to Paris, says: "The weekly and Sunday Gospel meetings continue. In the large iron room, 130 women to whom the Gospel is made known meet for work twice week, receiving each half a franc's worth of bread. The English classes, soup kitchen, and temperance meeting, are sustained. There are other efforts connected with the young, but hitherto Miss de Broen has been unable to reopen the medical mission and the dispensary from the insufficiency of the funds at her disposal. I can speak from personal knowledge of the incalculable blessings which have accompanied this branch of the work, and can understand the cravings of the poor people for its resumption."

Three Signs of Consumption.

An attack of Pulmonary Consumption is always preceded by three danger signals: The rattle-snake seldom strikes its fatal blow until after its note of warning has been given; so with Consumption; the attack of this dread and insidious foe is preceded by, First, Emaciation—loss of flesh without sufficient sick symptoms to account for it. Second, a Cough; slight, perhaps; "a mere habit," the patient says, which he "can and must prevent;" doubly ominous if continuing through warm weather. Third, Unequal Depression beneath the collar bones. Tubercles almost always invade one lung, and at its apex. This one soon contracts and the flesh above it shows a greater depression than over the other.

These are the signals. Where is the remedy? Will any drug supply it? Observation (and too often experience) makes you answer no. More than twenty years ago we said that our Compound Oxygen would help in a manner and to an extent far exceeding any other agent known to man. We say so still; but it is not our word only now. Scientists admits it; physicians prescribe and take it; and better still, thousands of people everywhere, stepping aside from the crowded path of hoary failure, have tried it themselves, and are living to-day, glad to tell of its great power to rebuild the system, the gradnal consumption of which it is that we call Consumption.

If a person has seen one or all of these signals; if he desires health rather than sympathy; restoration rather than amelioration; if he is so constituted that he can believe the evidence of others, we invite him to write us a plain statement of his case. We will send him, without any expense, an honest medical opinion, at the same time enclosing an account of the discovery of Compound Oxygen and of its mode of cure.

To be well informed on this subject has been life itself to many physically needy people. Address Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia. or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

The Spiritual Body.*

THE spiritual body shall be like the natural. The body of our Lord's Resurrection resembled his earthly form, for through the cloud of glory and mystery that surrounded it, the apostles soon recognized the dear, familiar marks. And so with us: the longing heart will not search long in Paradise for the loved, familiar form; through the cloud of beauty and immortality that encircles it, the friend on earth will soon find its mate; glorified and purified as the bodies of the saints shall be, they are not changed beyond the easy power of recognition. For we must remember that the spirit to a large extent fashions, forms, and marks the bodies of men; the soul is the architect of the shrine; and thus, the spirit and personality remaining the same in its essential life, only purified and perfected, the spiritual body shall be its perfect expression and must resemble the dear, loved form of earth. But, on the other side, the spiritual body shall be unlike the natural—unlike it in all the elements of its weakness, pain and disease. We complain that we can form no clear conception of a spiritual body, that it leaves no image on the retina of the mind.

Try to grasp an image by this process, a sure and certain process, by denying to the spiritual body, all that limits, defaces, and deforms our earthly bodies. No pain with burning feet shall dance along the unstrung nerves; no hidden sorrow pale the color from sunken cheek; no grief force unbidden tears from weeping eyes. This body, oh! how often with its appetites and passions, has it been the minister of all intemperance. How often has it received back in aching brow and quivering nerves, in disease slowly entering and paralyzing its various organs, the penalty of deeds done in the flesh. How often has it been upon the bed of pain and sickness, how many times has fever flushed, gunpowder consumed, and fracture mutilated it. And even when untouched by disease, how frequently has it stood as a veil between loved and loving spirits; how the outer man, flashing from eye, smiling from lip, wrinkling on brow, and grasping with hand, has been a false indicator of the soul within. Yes, so runs the indictment against this "body of our humiliation," with its thick walls and heavy guards at every outlet, it has often kept apart the dearest spirits from sweet communion of heart with heart: it has made false entries on the dial-plate without, and loving spirits have read them wrongly. But in that other life, the perfect knowledge of each other, and therefore, the deeper sympathy of love, will not be left to any "chance look or tone." For the body that we shall wear, whatever else it may be, shall be at least the perfect expression of the spirit. We may not know much of that glorified condition, but what a world of comfort is contained in the thought that, through a perfect medium of communication, we shall know each other's deeper life;—a knowledge, compared with which the knowledge we have now of each other's spirits is "looking through a glass darkly." Conceive of such blessedness if you will; then conceive of a body, out of which have passed all the surging waves of appetite, all the domination of fierce and cruel passions; then conceive of a body, from which no tear shall ever fall, on which no care shall ever leave its mark, in which no pain and suffering shall ever have a hold; and you will have, so far as negatives can supply, a faint conception of the spiritual body, which now is fashioning, and which, then, when perfected, shall wear the glorified image of the heavenly Christ.

A FETICH RELINQUISHED.

FROM Western Africa Mr. Lee writes to the Missionary Herald: "It gives me sincere pleasure to be able to tell you that there are very marked signs of a deep and strong work by the Holy Spirit having begun in the hearts of some of the people here. I will cite an instance or two. Ngulu, our oldest Christian boy, came to me the other day, saying, 'Nana, I have some good words to tell you. Makimba, the priest of Chrisamba, was sent for yesterday to go off to some distant villages with Kandundu (Kandundu is the chief fetich), but he sent back word that he was not going to carry Kandundu any more, as it made him ashamed since he had heard the words of Suku' (God.) If this man is really determined to abandon Kandundu, it is no small thing, because it will entail a loss of his priestly fees. We are earnestly praying that he may not only stick to his resolve, but will advance until fully accepting the truth as it is in Christ. Another most pleasing thing occurred last Saturday. In the morning I was riding past Sahosi, a group of villages about two miles from our station, and, as usual, stopped and invited the chief and his people to come to the next day's service. They promised to come, but late on Saturday evening a messenger arrived to say that the chief had forgotten that on the morrow there would be an ovimbu (a trial) held at his village, and he wanted to know if a trial could be held on Sunday. I explained the nature of the Lord's Day and our duties concerning it, and to our joy, the old chief and his young men were present at the Sunday service, and that ovimbu was not held! The chief, Sahosi, was a regular attendant on our services, and his sending to ask whether it would be wrong to hold an ovimbu on Sunday shows that the old man is at least considering what he has heard here."

THE WIDOWS OF INDIA.

IN a letter to the American Board from Bombay, Miss Millard, who is laboring among the women of that city, writes: "I have of late seen and learned more of the widows and their sufferings, and my heart goes out in gratitude that there are some who will never be subjected to such sorrows and indignities. In one day's work of last week, I counted ten widows in the houses that I visited, some old, some younger, and one of perhaps fifteen, fair and beautiful, but subjected like the others to the indignities of widowhood, with her shaven head, and the thin, unbleached cotton cloth around her body her only garment. I asked some of them why they continued to endure such things, and it had never occurred to any of them that there was any other way or that they might ever expect anything else. They said, 'These are our customs, and if we did differently we would be laughed at.' This ridicule seemed to them the worst thing that could befall them. I long to devote my whole time to that work, but it cannot be now; we can only hold our own while we are in such straits. And may the dear Lord soon send us workers, not only two or three, but a dozen, that we may enlarge our borders and gather in the fruit that is already ripe to the harvest."

FILL ME WITH THY LIFE.

UNTO thy feet, Oh Saviour divine!
I come with my troubled life;
I am so weak, so weary with all
The constant tumult and strife.

Teach me to smile when the way is rough,
And sing when the day grows sad;
Into my heart thy sunshine put
And make thy tried one glad.

Fill me so full of thy own pure life,
That each day may be lived for thee;
Then neither the strife nor the woes of life
Can darken the days for me."

If you want a horse to make time

Self Torture!

That's what it amounts to, when you attempt to do washing and cleaning, now-a-days, without Pearline. And the strange part of it is, that you should be willing to suffer, when it's only for your loss and not for your gain. That needless back-breaking rub, rub, rub isn't saving you anything. It's costing you money. It is simply wearing out the things that you're washing. Why would you rather do it? That is what the women who are saving their strength and their clothes with Pearline can't understand.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 360 JAMES PYLE, New York.

A CENTRE OF EVANGELISM.

 Northfield and its Great Chain of Christian Training Schools, Established by Mr. Moody—From Small Beginnings it has Become a Mecca for American Bible Students. ***

WHEN that sturdy son of Puritans, Dwight Lyman Moody, left his childhood home at Northfield, Mass., thirty-eight years ago, to begin a business life in Boston, nothing was farther from his thought than the marvelous career for which Providence had marked him. After he had fairly entered the service of Christ, he was always found ready to do the thing nearest him, and nothing was too lowly or too hard for his glowing love and burning zeal. He was faithful in little things, and God promoted him to the highest stewardship known to men on earth. All the world knows the story of his unexampled evangelistic career, its hard and humble beginnings, and its magnificent development. In him the world has been permitted to see "what the Lord can do with a man wholly consecrated to Christ." His evangelistic work is become an essential part of the religious history of this century, and the mighty impulses generated by this man of God will live and move with increasing power to the end of the age. But perhaps the most remarkable part of the life-work of Mr. Moody is that represented by his educational institutions, one of which—the Evangelical Institute at Chicago, Ill.,—was recently described in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is more than probable that these institutions will prove to be in some respects, the most far-reaching and fruitful part of his earthly labors. The history of the origin and growth of these institutions furnishes an inspiring example of Divine and human co-operation. "God is a good worker" says an old proverb, "but he loves to be helped," and Mr. Moody is never so happy as when permitted to "help God" in carrying out some gracious purpose. On the wall of one of the Seminary buildings is inscribed the motto chosen by its founder, from Isaiah 27: 3: "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day." It is under the shelter of this immutable Divine promise and pledge that Mr. Moody has carried forward all his educational enterprises, and his faith has never been put to shame.

MISS EVELYN S. HALL.
(Principal, Northfield Ladies' Seminary.)

PROF. HENRY F. CUTLER.
(Principal, Mount Hermon School.)

Northfield, the birth-place and present home of Mr. Moody, and the centre of his educational enterprises, is an old town on the eastern banks of the Connecticut River near the point of junction of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont. Dr. George F. Pentecost once remarked that evidently the place had been prepared and reserved for the schools and conventions that have come into being there. And it has often been remarked that if Mr. Moody had searched the whole land for a locality adapted to the various enterprises now being developed there, he could have found none better fitted for his purpose. The educational and religious advantages of these "schools of prophets," combined with the natural charms of the place, have drawn many good people into it, and the homes of Mr. Moody, Dr. Pentecost, Dr. Pierson, Ira D. Sankey, Prof. D. B. Towner, Prof. A. J. Philips, and others, are only forerunners of many more like them who will in time to come build their nests on those beautiful hills.

It was a day of small things when Mr. Moody began his educational work. Coming in 1875 from Chicago, to make his home in Northfield, he was deeply touched as he "saw how many girls were growing up in the country with only a meagre district schooling, and no proper training in the Bible. He thought if they could be gathered into a school where, with the usual studies and better teachers, the Bible might have its proper place, they would greatly add to their character, resources, usefulness, and happiness as Christian women." He was moved to do what he could toward this end. He began by opening his own house for a school, then he built a small addition to it, with rooms for eight girls, into which twenty soon crowded their way, with others seeking to enter. He could not stop there and turn away the eager applicants. He built a small dormitory and class-room near his house. This also soon overflowed. Thus step by step, as God led the way, Mr. Moody followed promptly and resolutely, not dreaming whereunto this thing would grow. Now, after thirteen years, he beholds four large, prosperous, rapidly growing schools, two located at Northfield, one at Mt. Hermon, and one in Chicago, with over 1,000 students and sixty regular instructors, besides many eminent lecturers for occasional service from this and other lands. Between 3,000 and 4,000 students, representing not less than twenty-five different nations and races, between twenty and thirty religious denominations, and upwards of fifty occupations, have availed themselves of the privileges of the schools since they began. The school property embraces 1,000 acres of land, with over thirty buildings, the whole valued at about $700,000, and a combined endowment fund partly available, of $340,000. All this, and more, has sprung from a mustard seed of loving purpose planted in faith and in earnest prayer. The schools specially referred to in this article are: The Northfield Seminary for ladies, opened in 1879, of which

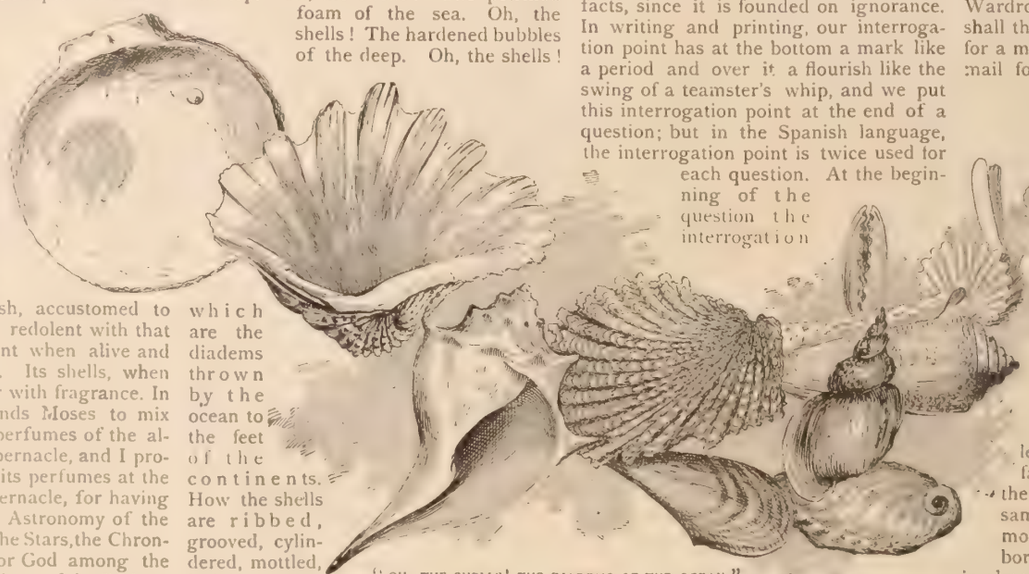
GOD AMONG THE SHELLS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Exodus 30: 34, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha."

YOU may not have noticed the shells of the Bible, although in this early part of the sacred Book, God calls you to consider and employ them, as he called Moses to consider and employ them. The onycha of my text is a shell found on the banks of the Red Sea, and Moses and his army must have crushed many of them under foot, as they crossed the bisected waters, onycha on the beach and onycha in the unfolded bed of the deep. I shall speak of this shell as a beautiful and practical revelation of God, and as true as the first chapter of Genesis and the last chapter of Revelation or everything between. Not only is this shell, the onycha, found in the Red Sea, but in the waters of India. It not only delectates the eye with it convolutions of beauty, white and lustrous and seriated, but blesses the nostril with [illegible] aroma. This shell-fish, accustomed to feed on spikenard, is redolent with that odorous plant, redolent when alive and redolent when dead. Its shells, when burnt, bewitch the air with fragrance. In my text, God commands Moses to mix this onycha with the perfumes of the altar in the ancient Tabernacle, and I propose to mix some of its perfumes at the altar of Brooklyn Tabernacle, for having spoken to you on the Astronomy of the Bible or God among the Stars, the Chronology of the Bible or God among the Centuries, the Ornithology of the Bible or God among the Birds, the Mineralogy of the Bible or God among the Amethysts, the Ichthyology of the Bible or God among the Fishes, I now come to speak of the Conchology of the Bible or God among the Shells.

It is a secret that you may keep for me, for I have never before told it to anyone, that in all the realms of the natural world, there is nothing to me so fascinating, so completely absorbing, so full of suggestiveness, as a shell. What? More entertaining than a bird, which can sing, when a shell cannot sing? Well, there you have made a great mistake. Pick up the onycha from the banks of the Red Sea or pick up a bivalve from the beach of the Atlantic Ocean, and listen, and you hear a whole choir of marine voices—bass, alto, soprano — in an unknown tongue, but seeming to chant, as I put them to my ear, "The sea is his and he made it;" others singing, "Thy way, Oh God, is in the sea;" others hymning, "He ruleth the raging of the sea." "What," says someone else, "does the shell impress you more than the star?" In some respects, yes, because I can handle the shell and closely study the shell, while I cannot handle the star, and if I study it, must study it at a distance of millions and millions of miles. "What," says someone else, "are you more impressed by the shell than the flower?" Yes, for it has far greater varieties and far greater richness of color, as I could show you in thousands of specimens, and because the shell does not fade, as does the rose leaf, but maintains its beauty century after century, so that the onycha which the hoof of Pharaoh's horse knocked aside in the chase of the Israelites across the Red Sea may have kept its lustre to this hour. Yes, they are so parti-colored and many colored that you might pile them up until you would have a wall with all the colors of the wall of heaven, from the jasper at the bottom to the amethyst at the top. Oh, the shells! The petrified foam of the sea. Oh, the shells! The hardened bubbles of the deep. Oh, the shells!



"OH, THE SHELLS! THE DIADEMS OF THE OCEAN"

which are the diadems thrown by the ocean to the feet of the continents. How the shells are ribbed, grooved, cylindered, mottled, iridescent. They were used as coin by some nations, fastened in belts by others, made in handles of wooden implements by still others. Mollusks not only of the sea but mollusks of the land. Do you know how much they have had to do with the world's history? They saved the Church of God from extinguishment. The Israelites marched out of Egypt two million strong, besides flocks and herds. The Bible says "the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading troughs being bound up in the clothes on their shoulders . . . . They were thrust forth out of Egypt and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themselves any victuals." Just think of it! Forty years in the wilderness. Infidelity triumphantly asks, how could they live forty years in the wilderness without food? You say manna fell. Oh, that was after a long while. They would have starved long before the manna fell. The fact is they were chiefly kept alive by the mollusks of the land or shelled creatures. Mr. Fronton and Mr. Sicard took the same route from Egypt toward Canaan that the Israelites took, and they give this as their testimony:

"Although the children of Israel must have consisted of about two million of souls, with baggage and innumerable flocks and herds, they were not likely to experience any inconvenience in their march. Several thousand persons might walk abreast with the greatest ease in the very narrowest part of the valley in which they first began to file off. It soon afterwards expands to above three leagues in width. With respect to forage, they would be at no loss. The ground is covered with tamarisk, broom, clover and Saint Foin, of which latter especially camels are passionately fond, besides almost every variety of odoriferous plant and herb proper for pasturage. The whole sides of the valley through which the children of Israel marched are still tufted with brushwood, which doubtless afforded food for their beasts, together with many drier sorts for lighting fire, on which the Israelites could with the greatest ease bake the dough they brought with them on small iron plates, which form a constant appendage to the baggage of an oriental traveller. Lastly, the herbage underneath these trees and shrubs is completely covered with snails of a prodigious size and of the best sort, and however uninviting such a repast might appear to us, they are here esteemed a great delicacy. They are so plentiful in this valley that it may be literally said that it is difficult to take one step without treading on them."

So the shelled creatures saved the host of Israelites on the march to the Promised Land, and the attack of infidelity at this point is defeated by the facts, as infidelity is always defeated by facts, since it is founded on ignorance. In writing and printing, our interrogation point has at the bottom a mark like a period and over it a flourish like the swing of a teamster's whip, and we put this interrogation point at the end of a question; but in the Spanish language, the interrogation point is twice used for each question. At the beginning of the question the interrogation point is presented upside down and at the close of the question, right side up. When infidelity puts a question about the Scriptures, as it always indicates ignorance, the question ought to be printed with two interrogation points, one at the beginning and one at the close, but both upside down.

Thank God for the wealth of mollusks all up and down the earth, whether feeding the Israelites on their way to the land flowing with milk and honey, or, as we are better acquainted with the mollusks, when flung to the beach of lake or sea. There are three great families of them. If I should ask you to name three of the great Royal families of the earth, perhaps you would respond, the House of Stuart, the House of Hapsburg, the House of Bourbon, but the three Royal families of mollusks are the Univalve, or shell in one part, the Bivalve, or shell of two parts, and the Multivalve, or shell in many parts, and I see God in their every hinge, in their every tooth, in their every cartilage, in their every ligament, in their every spiral ridge, and in their every color, prism on prism, and their adaptation of thin shell for still ponds and thick coatings for boisterous seas. They all dash upon me the thought of the providential care of God. What is the use of all this architecture of the shell, and why is it pictured from the outside lip clear down into its labyrinths of construction? Why the infinity of skill and radiance in a shell? What is the use of the color and exquisite curve of a thing so insignificant as a shell-fish? Why, when the conchologist, by dredge or rake, fetches the crustaceous specimens to the shore, does he find at his feet whole Alhambras and Colosseums and Parthenons and Crystal Palaces of beauty in miniature, and these bring to light only an infinitesimal part of the opulence in the great subaqueous world. Linnæus counted twenty-five hundred species of shells, but conchology had then only begun its achievements. While exploring the bed of the Atlantic Ocean in preparation for laying the cable, shelled animals were brought up from depths of nineteen hundred fathoms. When lifting the telegraph wire from the Mediterranean and Red Seas, shelled creatures were brought up from depths of two thousand fathoms. The English Admiralty, exploring in behalf of science, found mollusks at a depth of twenty-four hundred and thirty-five fathoms, or fourteen thousand two hundred and ten feet deep. What a realm awful for vastness!

As the shell is only the house and the wardrobe of insignificant animals of the deep, why all that wonder and beauty of construction? God's care for them is the only reason. And if God provide so munificently for them, will he not see that you have wardrobe and shelter? Wardrobe and shelter for a periwinkle; shall there not be wardrobe and shelter for a man? Would God give a coat of mail for the defence of a Nautilus and leave you no defence against the storm? Does he build a stone house for a creature that lasts a season and leave without home a soul that takes hold on centuries and aeons? Hugh Miller found "The Footprints of the Creator in the Old Red Sandstone," and I hear the harmonies of God in the tinkle of the sea shells when the tides come in. The same Christ who drew a lesson of providential care from the fact that God clothes the grass of the field instructs me to draw the same lesson from the shells. In almost every man's life, however well born and prosperous for years, and in almost every woman's life, there comes a very dark time, at least, once. A conjunction of circumstances will threaten bankruptcy and homelessness and starvation. It may be that these words will meet the ear or will meet the eye of those who are in such state of foreboding. Come, then, and see how God gives an ivory palace to a water animal that you could cover with a ten-cent piece, and clothes in armor against all attack, a coral no bigger than a snowflake. I do not think that God will take better care of a bivalve than of one of his own children. I rake to your feet with the Gospel rake the most thorough evidences of God's care for his creatures, I pile around you great mounds of shells, that they may teach you a most comforting theology. Oh, ye of little faith, walk among these arbors of coraline, and look at these bouquets of shell fit to be handed a queen on her coronation day, and see these fallen rainbows of color, and examine these lilies in stone, these primroses in stone, these heliotropes in stone, these cowslips in stone, these geraniums in stone, these japonicas in stone. Oh, ye, who have your telescopes ready, looking out on clear nights, trying to see what is transpiring in Mars, Jupiter, and Mercury, know that within a few hours' walk or ride of where your now are, there are whole worlds that you might explore, but of which you are unconscious, and among the most beautiful and suggestive of these worlds is the conchological world. Take this lesson of a providential care. How does that old hymn go?

> We may, like ships, by tempest be tossed
> On perilous deeps, but cannot be lost.
> Though Satan enrages the wind and the tide,
> The Promise assures us, the Lord will provide.

But while you get this pointed lesson of providential care from the shelled creatures of the deep, notice in their construction that God helps them to help themselves. This house of stone in which they live is not dropped on them and is not built around them. The material for it exudes from their own bodies and is adorned with a colored fluid from the pores of their own neck. It is a most interesting thing to see these crustacean animals fashion their own homes out of carbonate of lime and membrane. And all of this is a mighty lesson to those who are waiting for others to build their fortunes, when they ought to go to work and, like the mollusks, build their own fortunes out of their own brain, out of their own sweat, out of their own industries. Not a mollusk on all the beaches of all the seas would have a house of shell, if it had not itself built one. Do not wait for others to shelter you or prosper you. All the crustaceous creatures of the earth, from every flake of their covering and from every ridge of their tiny castles on Atlantic and Pacific and Mediterranean coasts, say: "Help yourself, while God helps you to help yourself." Those people who are waiting for their father or rich old uncle to die and leave them a fortune are as silly as a mollusk would be to wait for some other mollusk to drop on it a shell equipment. It would kill the mollusk, as, in most cases, it destroys a man. Not one person out of a hundred ever was strong enough to stand a large estate by inheritance dropped on him in a chunk. Have great expectations from only two persons—God and yourself. Let the onycha of my text become your preceptor.

But the more I examine the shells, the more I am impressed that God is a God of emotion. Many scoff at emotion, and seem to think that God is a God of cold geometry and iron laws and eternal apathy and enthroned stoicism. No! No! The shells with overpowering emphasis, deny it. While law and order reign in the universe, you have but to see the lavishness of color on the crustacea, all shades of crimson from faintest blush to blood of battle-field, all shades of blue, all shades of green, all shades of all colors from deepest black to whitest light, just called out on the shells with no more order than a mother premeditates or calculates how many kisses and hugs she shall give her babe waking up in the morning sunlight. Yes. My God is an emotional God, and he says: "We must have colors and let the sun paint all of them on the scroll of that shell, and we must have music, and here is a carol for the robin, and a psalm for man, and a doxology for the seraphim and a resurrection call for the archangel." Aye, he showed himself a God of sublime emotion when he flung himself on this world in the personality of Christ to save it, without regard to the tears it would take, or the blood it would exhaust, or the agonies it would crush out. When I see the Louvres and the Luxembourgs and the Vaticans of Divine painting strewn along the eight thousand miles of coast, and I hear, in a forest, on a summer morning, musical academies and Handel's societies of full orchestras, I say God is a God of emotion, and if he observes mathematics, it is mathematics set to music, and his figures are written, not in white chalk on blackboards, but written by a finger of sunlight on walls of jasmin and trumpet-creeper.

In my study of the conchology of the Bible, this onycha of the text also impresses me with the fact that religion is perfume. What else could God have meant when he said to Moses: "Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte and onycha?" Moses took that shell of the onycha, put it over the fire, and as it crumbled into ashes, it exhaled an odor that hung in every curtain and filled the ancient Tabernacle, and its sweet smoke escaped from the sacred precincts and saturated the outside air. Perfume! That is what religion is. But, instead of that, some make it a mal-odor. They serve God in a rough and acerb way. They box their child's ears because he does not properly keep Sunday, instead of making Sunday so attractive the child could not help but keep it. They make him learn by heart a difficult chapter in the Book of Exodus, with all the hard names, because he has been naughty. How many disagreeable good people there are. No one doubts their piety, and they will reach heaven, but they will have to get fixed up before they go there, or they will make trouble by calling out to us, "Keep off that grass!" "What do you mean by plucking that flower?" "Show your tickets!" Oh! how many Christian people need to obey my text, and take into their worship and their behavior and their consociations and presbyteries and general assemblies and conferences more onycha. I have sometimes gone in a very gale of spirit into the presence of some disagreeable Christians and in five minutes felt wretched, and at some other time I have gone depressed into the company of suave and genial souls, and in a few moments I felt exhilerant. What was the difference? It was the difference in what they burnt on their censers. The one burnt onycha; the other burnt asafœtida.

In this conchological study of the Bible, I also notice that the mollusks or shelled animals furnish the purple that you see richly darkening so many scripture chapters. The purple stuff in the ancient Tabernacle, the purple girdle of the priests, the purple mantle of Roman emperors, the apparel of Dives in purple and fine linen, aye, the purple robe which, in mockery, was thrown upon Christ, were colored by the purple of the shells on the shores of the Mediterranean. It was discovered by a shepherd's dog having stained his mouth by breaking one of the shells, and the purple aroused admiration. Costly purple! Six pounds of the purple liquor extracted from the shell-fishes was used to prepare one pound of wool. Purple was also used on the pages of books. Bibles and prayer books appeared in purple vellum, which may still be found in some of the National Libraries of Europe. Plutarch speaks of some purple which kept its beauty for one hundred and ninety years. But, after a while, the purple became easier to get, and that which had been a sign of Imperial authority when worn in robes, was adopted by many people, and so an Emperor, jealous of this appropriation of the purple, made a law that anyone except royalty wearing purple should be put to death. Then, as if to punish the world for that outrage of exclusiveness, God obliterated the color from the earth, as much as to say: "If all cannot have it, none shall have it." But, though God has deprived the race of that shell-fish which afforded the purple, there are shells enough left to make us glad and worshipful. Oh, the entrancement of hue and shape still left all up and down the beaches of all the continents! These creatures of the sea have what roofs of enamelled porcelain! They dwell under what pavilions, blue as the sky and fiery as a sunset and mysterious as an aurora! And am I not right in leading you, for a few moments, through this mighty realm of God so neglected by human eye and human footstep? It is said that the harp and lute were invented from the fact that in Egypt, the Nile overflowed its banks, and when the waters retreated, tortoises were left by the million on all the lands, and these tortoises died, and soon nothing was left but the cartilages and gristle of these creatures, which tightened under the heat into musical strings that, when touched by the wind or the foot of man, vibrated, making sweet sounds, and so the world took the hint and fashioned the harp; and am I not right in trying to make music out of the shells, and lifting them as a harp, from which to thrum the jubilant praises of the Lord and the pathetic strains of human condolence?

THE PEARL FISHERS OF CEYLON.

But I find the climax of this conchology of the Bible in the Pearl, which has this distinction above all other gems that it requires no human hand to bring out its beauties. Job speaks of it, and its sheen is in Christ's sermon, and the Bible, which opens with the onycha of my text, closes with the pearl. Of such value is this crustaceous product, I do not wonder that, for the exclusive right of fishing for it on the shores of Ceylon, a man paid to the English government six hundred thousand dollars for one season. So exquisite is the pearl, I do not wonder that Pliny thought it was made out of a drop of dew, the creature rising to the surface to take it, and the chemistry of nature turning the liquid into a solid. You will see why the Bible makes so much of the pearl in its similitudes if you know how much it costs to get it. Boats with divers sail out from the island of Ceylon, ten divers to each boat. Thirteen men guide and manage the boat. Down into the dangerous depths, amid sharks that swirl around them, plunge the divers, while sixty thousand people anxiously gaze on. After three or four minutes' absence from the air, the diver ascends, nine-tenths strangulated and blood rushing from ears and nostrils, and flinging his pearly treasure on the sand, falls into unconsciousness. Oh, it is an awful exposure and strain and peril to fish for pearls, and yet they do so, and is it not a wonder that to get that which the Bible calls the Pearl of Great Price, worth more than all other pearls put together, there should be so little anxiety, so little struggle, so little enthusiasm. Would God that we were all as wise as the merchantman Christ commended, "who, when he had found one Pearl of Great Price, went and sold all that he had and bought it."

But what thrills me with suggestiveness is the material out of which all pearls are made. They are fashioned from the wound of the shell-fish. The exudation from that wound is fixed and hardened and enlarged into a pearl. The ruptured vessels of the water animal fashioned the gem that now adorns finger or ear-ring or sword hilt or king's crown. So, out of the wounds of earth will come the pearls of heaven. Out of the wound of conviction the pearl of pardon. Out of the wound of bereavement the pearl of solace. Out of the wound of loss the pearl of gain. Out of the deep wound of the grave the pearl of resurrection joy. Out of the wounds of a Saviour's life and a Saviour's death, the rich, the radiant, the everlasting pearl of heavenly gladness. "And the twelve gates were twelve pearls." Take the consolation, all ye who have been hurt, whether hurt in body, or hurt in mind, or hurt in soul. Get your troubles sanctified. If you suffer with Christ on earth, you will reign with him in glory. The tears of earth are the crystals of heaven. "Every several gate was of one pearl."

A CURIOUS BARGAIN.

AT one of the meetings held by Miss Guinness a year or two ago, a man was converted who had led a dissipated, lawless life. The change in himself, in his home and his family was a surprise even to the man himself. The strangest part of it all was that it had not cost him any struggle to break with his old habits, and he was happy, though before the change he thought that he would be miserable without the liquor and an occasional fight. One day, about six weeks ago, he met an old friend, who had just finished a six months' term in the county jail. The friend begged for a little help to start him again. "Tell you what I'll do," said the Christian man, "if you'll do as I've done, quit the drink and come with me to the mission, I'll undertake to find you home and food as long as you need it. You won't need it long if you keep straight. You'll soon earn them for yourself." The bargain was struck, and at last reports the man was doing well.

THE BIBLE IN MOROCCO.

A RECENT letter from an agent of the Bible Society in Tangier, gives some interesting though painful glimpses of the state of affairs among the poorer classes in Morocco. "The year has been a distressing one for the poor people—struggles against oppression and cattle disease in spring, actual war throughout the summer, and a great deal of fever and smallpox during the past few weeks. It is saddening to hear the people's sorrowful tales, often ended by the words—'And this is what our brethren the Moslems have done to us.' In spite, however, of numerous hindrances, many visits were paid to the villages and occasionally to the soldiers. Among the latter, some really seem thoughtful and tender-hearted, while brutality characterizes the mass. The villagers seem somewhat softened by what has occurred during the last three or four months, and in a few instances in South Morocco and elsewhere there have been encouraging openings among the Moslems and Jews, and a good number of Scriptures have been put into the hands of the people."

KEEPING THE SABBATH.

S. S. Lesson for March 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter Neh. 13: 15-22. Golden Text, Ex. 20: 8.

THE keeping of the Sabbath was God's first command, and in the first place it was a gift before it became a command: "God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it" (Gen. 2: 3); "The Lord hath given you the Sabbath," God "rested from his works" on the Sabbath day, and it is the desire of his heart that his people shall learn to "enter into his rest," and to understand him. Human nature is ever on the strain to do something or to be something. Through unbelief, God's ancient people failed to enter into his rest, which he had provided for them. "We which have believed do enter into rest." Faith is not doing anything ourselves but being satisfied with, and leaning our whole weight upon what Another has done. God rested on the Sabbath day from all which he had done, because it was "very good." We can never rest in anything we do because it is very good, we shall always come short, there is no Sabbath rest in our works. Rest and faith, which are intrinsically the same, come from fully appreciating God. "He that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works as God did from his;" he has learned to do those good works which God hath prepared (margin) that we should walk in them;" he has learned to rest from his own activity and to let Jesus live in him. Our Lord said of himself: "The words which I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." This is work in rest; such is the true Sabbath of the people of God.

The outward Sabbath, the cessation from manual and intellectual labor, one day in seven, is both a picture of the true, inward Sabbath, and also a means which prepares us for such an inward stillness, and satisfaction in our God. God's ancient people had not only the primitive gift and command to observe the Sabbath day. They must also cease from cultivation of the land one year in seven: "In the seventh year shall be a Sabbath of rest unto the land,

A Sabbath for the Lord."

What? must they then neither sow nor reap for a whole year? Must they pass the time in idleness? Would it not be dangerous to have their growing sons hanging about with nothing to do? To human reason such a command seems unreasonable and unwise. But God's ways are higher than our ways, and his thoughts than our thoughts. He makes no mistakes. The miraculous deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt, and their wonderful life in the wilderness, under the immediate conduct of a present God, made such an impression on the heathen around them that "their habits melted with fear."

If the children of Israel had had the faith to trust God to feed them in the land by miracle in the desert, and if, before the eyes of the surrounding nations, it were a manifest fact that in Palestine, and there alone, every sixth year brought forth the fruit for three years (Lev. 25: 20-22), such an impression would have been made upon the nations that bordered upon Canaan that there would have been plenty for the ablebodied young men to do in the seventh year, in telling the heathen round about what a God the God of Israel was. But his people failed him; they could not trust him; and he was obliged to let them go into captivity, "until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate to fulfil three score and ten years." (II. Chron. 36: 21.) This was but the fulfilment of God's Word, that if his people would not keep his [illegible] would scatter them "among the heathen. . . Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths . . . as long as it lieth desolate it shall rest, because it did not rest in your Sabbaths when ye dwelt upon it." (Lev. 26: 34, 35.)

She Kept Sabbath,

Great activity on the part of God's children may impress the unconverted and the heathen with their zeal, but it is faith, and rest in the Lord which is needed to impress the unsaved with the mighty power of God.

There must have been a reason why our Lord so often Healed on the Sabbath Day.

The man with the withered hand was healed on the Sabbath day (Matt. 12 : 13, probably the same day "great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all" (ver. 15). It was on the Sabbath day that he healed a man with an unclean spirit (Mark 1 : 21 : 26). It was on the Sabbath day that the impotent man was healed at the pool of Bethesda. (John 5: 1, 16.) The woman who had a spirit of infirmity, and the man who had the dropsy (Luke 13 : 10, 16; 14 : 1–5,) were both healed on the Sabbath day, and, in relation to the former, the question of Sabbath-day healing was brought to the point, when the ruler of the synagogue, with what he thought to be a holy indignation, gave this order to the people: "There are six days in which men ought to work; in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the Sabbath day." To work? Yes, truly; but there was no work in the healings of the Lord Jesus, no making of bandages, no hot poultices, no mixing of drugs, a word, a touch, and it was done! "Thou hypocrite," was the Master's answer, "doth not every one of you on the Sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath day?" Here is the point: Work on the Sabbath is forbidden; deliverance on the Sabbath is God's order. Nehemiah was he believed in the righteousness and the wisdom of all God's appointments. He and Ezra had been used to bring back the written Word of God into use and prominence; he had reestablished the order of the Levites, revived the order of the offerings for their maintenance, and the maintenance of the worship of God; he had dealt with those who had made alliance with the Ammonite and the Moabite; and now the question of the Sabbath arose. Things could not long go on in Judah without their coming to the ears or being perceived by Nehemiah; and to his deep grief and humiliation this man of God saw, with his own eyes some of the Jews, the people called to be God's witnesses among the heathen, treading winepresses on the Sabbath and bringing in sheaves, and also dealing in the more perishable kinds of food, fish, fruit, etc. "We must have new bread on Sunday," said a Swiss Christian to me, we never eat stale bread." What! Your Master, for your sake, ate no bread at all for forty days and forty nights, and you cannot so far deny yourself as to eat bread which is not quite to your taste one day in seven? Is this denying yourself and taking up your Cross and following Jesus? Which is the most important; that your God should have the witness borne to him that his people honor his command, and prize his gift of the Sabbath, and that your baker should rest as well as you, and have the chance to honor God with you—or is it more important that you should gratify your taste in having fresh crisp bread at the cost of God's honor and your baker's soul? It was the nobles of Judah who dealt in the fish and fruits which were brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, and the man of God went straight to them and said: "What evil thing is that ye do, and profane the Sabbath day? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city?"

A Man of Order;

Nehemiah went the right way to work; he first attacked the trade, the demand for Sunday trade, and then dealt with the tradesmen, and sent his servants to keep the gates, so that the dealers in these goods should not enter the city; and he went so far as to set the Levites to themselves keep the gates.

Sabbath Desecration

is always increasing in our land, and it is surely ripening it for coming judgment. There are always shops open on Sunday; more of the shops which have their doors shut, leave nevertheless their windows without blind or shutters in order to exhibit on Sunday what they hope to sell during the week. There are always more people traveling on Sunday; there are always more Sunday papers. With the decline in the public recognition of God, has come idolatry of money, and national selfishness. A land which lets go her Bible and her Sabbath day, and whose very spiritual leaders advocate amusements on the Sabbath, must of necessity soon lose all the backbone of self-denial which makes a nation great and powerful.

It behoves those who have the honor of God at heart, to witness strictly against the Sabbath desecration around us; neither buying, traveling, nor working on God's holy day; but bearing witness that we appreciate his gift to us. At the same time let us learn the lesson of inward Sabbath rest, of that real faith in our God, which leaves us undisturbed by all and everything which he in his love and wisdom permits. A rest which gives God room to work brings power, into our lives.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE struggle to keep the returned Jews in Jerusalem true to their vows was an effort. Continual oversight was necessary, or they relapsed into ungodliness, as their fathers did when Moses was withdrawn from them in the wilderness. About fifteen years after the reading of the law described in last week's lesson, Nehemiah had occasion to return to the Persian court. He was probably away from Jerusalem more than a year. Ezra, it may be supposed was dead, and the people were left to the care of their nobles and their priests. When Nehemiah obtained permission to resume his office in Jerusalem, he found that there had been great laxity in his absence and the people were fast drifting back to heathenism. As he journeyed toward the city, he saw the agricultural work going on on the Sabbath as on other days, and when he entered the gate, he found business men pursuing their callings on the Sabbath; an enemy of God was actually living in the temple under the favor of the high priest, marriages with the heathen had been celebrated, and the whole of his work of reform had been undone. His disappointment must have been grievous, but he did not give up in despair, as many would have done. The intruder was promptly expelled from the Temple, the nobles were severely reprimanded and stringent measures were taken to enforce Sabbath observance. The process of national reform is the subject of the lesson.

Treading winepresses on the Sabbath. A man who earned a livelihood by rowing people across a certain river came to his post one Monday morning and found there an irate gentleman whom he had ferried over several times during the preceding week. "How was it you were not here yesterday?" he asked of the ferryman. "I wanted to go over and you did not show up." The ferryman answered, "I do not work on Sunday." "Why not?" "Because it is the Lord's day. If I used it for my business, I should be taking what does not belong to me."

The Jews surrounded the subject of Sabbath observance with many ridiculous restrictions, regulating the distance a man might and might not walk and what he might and might not carry. The Saviour told them they made the law of no effect through their traditions and that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. After his resurrection, his disciples marked the new era into which his teaching introduced them, by keeping the day of his resurrection sacred instead of the Jewish Sabbath which commemorated only the day of rest at creation and they called it the Lord's Day to mark the higher rest into which redemption brought them. Their observance of the weekly rest-day was, as all Christians' observance should be, no longer a slavish obedience to law but a joyful tribute of willing consecration. Not outward formalism, but service of the heart. One day in seven was still sacred to God and all the more sacred for its being voluntarily observed. There would be more shame in the Christian desecrating the Lord's Day than there would in the Jew desecrating his Sabbath, because of the consciousness there should be in every heart of indebtedness to God's love in Christ. To use the day in pleasure or business is a robbery of God and all the more shameful because of all that has been done for us. The story is told of Lord Shaftesbury, who was the friend of the poor and fallen, that he was once robbed of his watch. He advertised it and offered a reward. At his door a bag was found containing the thief with the watch suspended around his neck. Even the thieves of London regarded it as such an outrage to rob so generous a friend of the outcasts as Shaftesbury that they "bagged" their own fellow-scoundrel and handed him and his plunder over to their benefactor.

An employer in a factory was in the habit of having the machinery cleaned and repaired on Sunday. His new foreman objected but yielded under pressure as the first week the necessity for repairs was urged upon him. But when the second week, he saw that a matter of repair was allowed to stand over for Sunday, he refused to work on that day. "Does not the Bible allow for such cases?" he was asked. "It says that you may pull an ass out of a pit on the Sabbath." "Yes," was the reply; "but if the ass has a habit of falling into the pit on that day, the man ought either to fill up the pit or get rid of the ass."

The law of the Sabbath is law written in human nature. The body needs one day's rest in seven. It is a well established fact that the man who rests on one day in the week retains his energy and vigor longer than he who works every day in the week. At a meeting of the New Haven Medical Association, a series of questions on Sabbath observance was submitted, which the assembled physicians were asked to answer according to the results of their observance. They answered unanimously that the men who rested on the Sabbath from their business lived longer, other things being equal, were more healthy and did more work and in a better manner than those who worked every day in the week. It is so with animals. Two men set out each with a drove of sheep for a distant market. One of them rested on Sundays and the other marched every day. The former arrived first with his flock in better condition than the latter. Every Monday he had travelled seventeen miles, on Tuesdays sixteen, tapering off to ten miles on Saturday. The other toward the end of the journey had not been able to get the weary animals to travel more than six miles in a day.

Men of Tyre. They were noted for their business capacity and enterprise. They were living in the city to do business. There was no harm in that and Nehemiah did not object to their being there. But they pushed business enterprise too far. They sold to the people on the Sabbath. They had no scruples that stood in the way of making money. It is so with many of the business men of our day. They will not miss the chance of making a bargain if the chance comes to them on the Lord's day. When a man sets his heart on money as the highest good he has to be on his guard lest he lose his reverence for all else and sacrifice greater and better things to get it. Agassiz was asked why a man of so great ability as he, was content with so small an income. He replied, "I have sufficient for my need. I do not want more. I suppose I could make more money but I have not time. Life is too short for a man to get rich and do his duty to his fellow too."

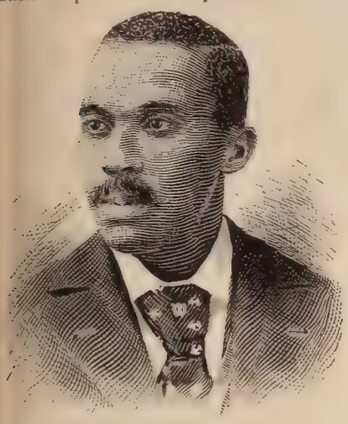
In the course of a debate on industrial questions in the French Chamber of Deputies, Louis Blanc strongly advocated Sunday observance, claiming that the productions of the nation would not be diminished by closing all the works and factories on one day of the week. He stated as a fact that the average weekly production of each workingman was greater in England than in France, though the French mechanic worked seventy-two hours and the English fifty-six. He attributed the anomaly to the fact that the natural forces of the English mechanic were better husbanded through having a weekly rest.

Sanctify the Sabbath. Spurgeon used to relate that a man who was about to rent a house in Newcastle, England, was taken by the owner to an upper window that he might see the beautiful prospect therefrom. The owner of the house said: "You can see Durham cathedral from this window on a Sunday." The man asked why it could be seen only on a Sunday. "Because," was the reply, "on that day there is no smoke from the tall chimneys." When in any family or nation there is no smoke and dust of business life on a Sunday the people have a better opportunity of seeing with the eyes of faith the towers of the heavenly city.

A SELF-HELPING INSTITUTION.

ow the Edward Waters College at Jacksonville, Florida, is Educating and Training the Colored Children and Young People to be Useful Citizens.

AN interesting effort is being made in Florida for the advancement of the colored race. Every one who has given any attention to the problem of their condition has arrived at two conclusions. One is that the ope of the future lies with the children, and ne other that it must come through an edu- ation adapted to their peculiar condition.



PRESIDENT JOHN R. SCOTT.

lere secular learning, such as is acquired in a chool in the North, is not sufficient. They eed to be taught a handicraft by which they an earn an honest livelihood; and, above all, ound moral and religious principles should be .stilled in their hearts. Probably in no State the Union is there need so urgent in this phere as there is in Florida. It is gratifying, herefore, to notice that an effort in this direc- ion is being made there. The Edward Waters College, a portrait of whose president, Rev. ohn R. Scott, and a picture of a group of its upils, are given on this page, is the outgrowth f a small school organized some years ago. It vas an effort by the colored people to help hemselves, and its present successful develop- nent is mainly due to the knowledge they had f their own deficiencies and the best way of emedying them. There are now nearly four undred students in the college, seven-five of vhom are boarders. Many more have applied or admission, but there is no room in the uilding for them. The origin and growth of he institution are very suggestive.

In 1883 the Rev. W. W. Sampson estab- ished a small school for young colored people t Jacksonville, Fla. Such an institution was orely needed there at that time. Nine years efore, Brown University supplied the need of igher education, but fire and financial distress ad caused the extinction of the enterprise, and since that time no provision existed for the benefit of the colored youths, beyond the ru- dimentary education of the lower schools. Mr. Sampson's school prospered, and it was placed under the control of the East Florida Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church for further development. Zion Church raised funds to erect a new building, which it rented to the school at fifty dollars a month, and Rev. John R. Scott became its principal. The number of students rapidly increased, and the efficiency of the school became widely known. One teacher after another was added, until there were six women and five men en- gaged in giving tuition. Much of the support coming from the church, special attention was given to the study of theology. The Confer- ence noted the tendency and authorized a change in the name to that of Divinity High School. The managers arranged for a thor- ough course of instruction, from the lowest to the highest grades. The course included three years in the primary department, devot- ed to preparatory study, three years in the normal grade, three years in the classics and mathematics and three years in theology. The rates were fixed at the lowest possible limit. Only two dollars a year was charged for tui- tion, and for seventy-six dollars the student was boarded in the college for an eight months' term. With the view of making the school a practical help to the colored race, sev- eral industrial branches have now been added, such as carpentry, shoe-making, etc. It has recently been chartered as the Edward Waters College, and is one of the most thriving in- stitutions of its kind in the South.

The object kept steadily in view by the faculty and the various boards interested in the college is to turn out men and women capable of doing their duty to God, to society and to themselves in the sphere of life they may feel called to enter. To this end, not only is it sought to cultivate the mind and to store it with useful information which will enable the student to perform his duties in business or in manufactures, but to inculcate the highest morality based on religious principle. The main difficulty, as in all such enterprises, is one of money. The college has been obliged to hire buildings for teaching and for boarding the students. This has involved loss, as when the low rates were fixed, it was expected that the building erected by the Zion Church would serve all purposes. But it was soon found that the colored race was anxious for just such an education as was given in the institution, and the number of applicants now on file shows that there is practically no limit to the extent of its opportunities of usefulness. To turn them to practical account it will be necessary to have a suitable building for the college, and an effort to raise money for this purpose is now being made. It is cordially recommended by the Hon. Francis P. Fleming, Governor of Florida, by the Bishop of the A. M. E. Church in Florida, and by other eminent and influential citizens, and will doubt- less receive a prompt and liberal response. The desire for a thorough education deserves en- couragement and the fact that colored people themselves are organizing to realize that de- sire, must be hailed as a most hopeful sign of the times. It has in it the promise of a better future for the next generation than has been enjoyed by any of the generations that have gone before it, a hope of independence, prosperity and usefulness. We sincerely hope that the managers of the institution will suc- ceed in their endeavor, and that the College will be the means of advancement to them that its past history and its present condition promise for it. Should any of our readers de- sire to assist them in their effort, they may send contributions to Rev. John R. Scott, President of Edward Waters College, Jackson- ville, Fla.

CLASS OF STUDENTS AT EDWARD WATERS' COLLEGE.

A CENTRE OF EVANGELISM.

Miss Evelyn S. Hall, B. A., is the prin- cipal, and the Mt. Hermon School, for men, located about four miles from the Sem- inary, on the eastern side of the Connecticut River, began in 1881. Prof. Henry F. Cutler is the present principal. The Northfield Training School, for Ladies, opened in 1890, is the youngest of the schools. It is housed in "The Northfield," a large summer hotel. Mr. Moody is the president, and Miss Lillie L. Sherman principal. The schools are filled to their utmost capacity of dormitory accommo- dations, and enlargement is next in order.

THE LADIES' TRAINING INSTITUTE AT NORTHFIELD.

All the schools (including that in Chicago) have essentially the same basis, and aim chiefly at the same end, while they fit into one another, and supplement each other's work. The first two are academic in kind, and furnish the general education which makes the best foundation for any advanced pursuit. The last is of a semi-professional order, and prepares the student for immediate activity in the line of the study and practice received at school. But in all the Bible has the place of honor. Those who have the entire course of the Seminary or Mt. Hermon, must spend more time upon the Bible than upon any other text- book, while at the Institute and the Training School Bible study takes up fully half the time.

At each of the two older schools are three graduating courses of four years' length, and a preparatory department for those not ready to enter one of these. One of these at Mt. Hermon, called the Biblical course, is adapted to those students who wish to go from Mt. Hermon directly into some form of evangelis- tic work. It offers four years of general academic training, together with extended daily instruction in the Bible. The other courses at Mt. Hermon and the Seminary correspond to those offered by other schools of similar grade, with three special features which are not common to most other schools, viz., the Biblical feature mentioned, the large attention given to vocal music as a required study, and an industrial feature. In both schools all of the domestic work is done by the students, and at Mt. Hermon most of the farm and office work. This requirement is meant equally to develop the practical re- sources of the students, and to promote the growth of character. As an economic meas- ure, it reduces the cost of each student to the schools, and makes it possible for many de- serving young men and women to receive this education, who otherwise must go without. But in order to reach especially this class of students, the entire charge for a year's board and tuition made by the Seminary and Mt. Hermon is only $100. As this charge hardly covers more than half the actual cost of each student to the school, the difference has to be annually raised, excepting as it is covered by the interest accruing from the small beginning of an endowment fund.

The Northfield Training School is of kin- dred spirit to the Bible Institute in Chicago. It offers facilities for the training of Christian women to become ready, skilful, efficient work- ers in all forms of Christian service, by the earnest, persistent study and practice of the Word of God, first and foremost. In addition to this is the study of music, the theory and practice of dressmaking and cooking, and vari- ous details of household life and service. All this aims at the most direct and practical re- sults in labors among all classes of people, especially in the homes of the poor, among the ignorant, the sick, the sorrowing, the out- cast. Here, too, the results justify the aim and the method. The blessing of God has rested upon the work from the beginning. "A great door and an effectual is opened."

The fact that all these schools are permitted to enjoy the personal presence and influence and teaching of Mr. Moody himself, whenever he is not engaged in evangelistic campaigns elsewhere, is of great moment. To come into such contact with this wise, experienced, spirit- filled disciple of Christ in his schools is a rare privilege.

Mr. Moody's educational work is not limit- ed to his four organized schools already nam- ed. In 1880 he began a "new departure," when he called the first of that remarkable series of Northfield Christian Conferences, or Summer Bible Schools, whose seed has been wafted far and wide over the earth. This was a Confer- ence never to be duplicated and never to be forgotten. Six years later a second Summer School sprang up alongside of this, now known as the World's Student Conference, and both Conferences have been held on the same con- secrated ground every year since then. All parts of the world and almost all Christian de- nominations, and forms of Christian activity and enterprise, have been represented in these wonderful gatherings. The teachers brought together by the leader, Mr. Moody, have been of the ablest and best in this land, and some of the choicest spirits of the Old World. As in the schools, so in these Summer gatherings, the Bible has been and is the supreme book, and Jesus Christ the supreme person. The aim of Mr. Moody has been to make Northfield one great Christian school in which continuous courses of Bible instruction, in a variety of forms, shall extend throughout the whole year.

REV. H. B. HARTZLER.
(Bible Teacher at Mt. Hermon and Northfield.)

Mr. Henry W. Rankin, who is perhaps more intimately acquainted with these Northfield movements than any other besides Mr. Moody himself, concludes a survey thereof by saying: "Let these things go on a few years longer, and the little town of Northfield will become a centre of evangelical education, and a source of evangelistic movements, for all the world, perhaps also a new fountain-head of Christian literature." Northfield is now several years nearer the realization that when these words were written and is justifying them. It would require an Omniscient eye and an angel's pen to make the record complete.

PROPHETIC BABYLON.

The Projected Railroad Through the Holy Land a Sign of the Approaching Fulfillment of the Prophecy relating to Babylon.

BY W. GREENE, C.E. *

THE student of prophecy cannot fail to note with deep interest the announcements of the press respecting the sudden movement of the Turkish Government in railroad building. This movement gives a clue to the solution of one of the most puzzling problems of untulfilled prophecy. The description we have in prophecy of the destruction of Babylon (Jer. 50) does not correspond with the historical fact. It has therefore long been the opinion of students of prophecy that the destruction foretold would be of another city, to be called Babylon, which would probably be built on the same site as ancient Babylon. But why and how should such a city be built in such a place at this time, and suddenly destroyed? It now appears that the network of railroads, projected and partly constructed, will have as the chief terminus the identical spot on the Persian Gulf where ancient Babylon stood. Here, then, unexpectedly is the reason for the erection of a great city at that point.

The articles on the roadways, published in the daily Journals, say: "The railway policy of the Ottoman Government has resulted, so far, in the construction of three trunk lines, through the northern and central portions of the Sultan's Asiatic dominions. These lines embrace a railway from Haidar-Pasha, a suburb of Constantinople, running right through the heart of Asia Minor and thence down the Tigris Valley, Bagdad, and to the Persian Gulf, the object being to link the latter gulf with the waters of the Golden Horn. The second, a line from Samsoun on the Black Sea southward to Ayas on the Mediterranean, and to link together the Black and the Mediterranean Seas; the third to connect the Mediterranean Sea through Damascus and the Euphrates Valley with the Persian Gulf."

Now there are over 8,000 people in the town of Hillah which stands on the site of Babylon, so that a future Babylon must appear and be destroyed suddenly by Divine wrath to fulfil the words of Scripture. Prophecy also speaks of Babylon as the glory of the Chaldees' excellency, showing the site to be the Euphratean Babylon, and not London, Paris, or Rome, as some would endeavor to prove, and the time of its downfall, to synchronize with the restoration of Israel, and as the restoration of Israel and Judah is a thing of the future, ergo, the destruction of Babylon, the glory of the Chaldees' excellency, is also a thing of the future.

In the prophecy of Zechariah we have a summary of the events concerning Jerusalem and the restoration of Israel, the doings of the foolish shepherd, the Antichrist; the coming of Christ, the Deliverer; and also in chapter 5 details concerning the great commercial system of the Ephah, of which the prophet says, "This is wickedness," or lawlessness, as the Hebrew word, if properly translated, should be rendered, and lawlessness in connection with the lawless one as king of Babylon, thus he is termed in Isaiah 14: 4.

As the great railway projects are to have, according to the plans, one of their termini at the site of ancient Babylon, it is important to find out whether any indications are given us in Scripture of the character of the city that will spring up there. Turn to Zech. 5: 6-11 and there is a vivid description in the strange symbol of the Ephah in which sits wickedness incarnate. "And behold there was lifted up a talent of lead: and this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the Ephah. Then lifted I up mine eyes and looked, and behold there came out two women, and the wind was in their wings, for they had wings like the wings of a stork, and they lifted up the Ephah between the earth and the heaven. Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the Ephah? And he said unto me, to build it a house in the land of Shinar, and it shall be established and set there upon her own base." An Ephah is a Jewish measure. The woman who sat therein is the personification of wickedness. This is wickedness, it is said of her, and she embodies the evil of the whole earth. This figure is carried to the land of Shinar, the very site of Babylon (Gen. 10: 10; 11: 2), there she has an habitation built for her upon a seat. Established the same base." The city then is to be reconstructed already belong to her.

THE LORD'S DAY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing March 5. Nehemiah 13: 22; Matt. 12: 8-13.

HOW shall we keep it? The name we give it gives the solution of the problem. If it is the Lord's Day, as we call it, then it must be devoted to him. We know what this means in our families. The arrival or departure of some dearly loved member of the circle, a birthday, the first day of reunion after long and dangerous illness, or some other special occasion consecrates a day to one member of the family, and we do all we can to honor that one. We put aside occupations that would interfere with the festival, and we try by all means to make the day gratifying to the person honored. There is no law about it, no one feels it a denial to keep away from business, or ordinary duties, no one goes about with a gloomy countenance, or wants to know if he may not do this or that, but every one is eager to do little services and make the loved one happy. It should not be difficult to decide what to do or not to do on the Lord's Day, if we are the Lord's people and love him. We are giving the day with delight to his service, to doing that which will please him best. The Jew might be thankful for his Sabbath of rest, and his conscience might find a use for the petty technicalities regulating its observance; but the Christain is beyond all that. It is a glad, joyous privilege that he has in this one day rescued from worldly concerns, and consecrated to his Lord in celebration of Christ's triumph over death and the grave. The world claims all too much of our attention as it is; it insists on six days of undivided absorption in exacting duties. But this one day we have to give to our Master. We would not give it grudgingly or sadly or half-heartedly but remembering our obligations to him give it all to him with delight. The privilege of this day gives to every follower of his the opportunity of service and of giving practical proof of gratitude and love. No law is needed by the Christian to regulate the observance of the Lord's day.

THE PHILADELPHIA W. C. A.

WORK has so far progressed on the Women's Christian Association in Philadelphia as to give an idea of the noble proportions and the excellent plan of the edifice. Some surprise has been expressed at its size and wonder as to what the ladies can do with so many rooms. This shows how little is known of the extent of the work as it now exists and of what it will develop into with the improved facilities afforded by its new quarters. According to present plans the third to seventh floor, inclusive, will be almost wholly set apart for sleeping rooms to accommodate 250 boarders and for transient lodgers. Other rooms are to be used for the training department and gymnastic exercises. A spacious library will be on the first floor, with reading-room; and a gallery opening to the floor above. The Employment Bureau is to be provided with two connecting rooms. Class-rooms will communicate with the Assembly Hall and its gallery on both first and second floors; this will afford an opportunity to seat an audience of one thousand. Restaurant, dining-room and kitchen, will occupy the eighth floor. The laundry and cooking school are in the basement. There will of course be parlors, committee-rooms and general office. This arrangement indicates an intention of developing the work of the Association on practical lines, by training the members in domestic duties and in advancing physical culture.

THE C. E. FRIEND OF SAILORS.

AN original and deeply interesting department of Christian Endeavor effort is that of the Floating Society, which is under the charge of the lady whose portrait appears on this page. A Christian interest in the welfare of the sailor is no new emotion in the heart of Miss Antoinette P. Jones; she has simply availed herself of the instrumentality of the Christian Endeavor Society to promote the work in which she has long been engaged. She sometimes humorously explains her regard for the toilers of the deep by the statement that among her early ancestors there were two genuine Vikings, but, however it may have come, there is no question of the interest itself, nor of its practical manifestation. Among the many sailors who, through her efforts have been won for Christ, are representatives of no less than thirteen nationalities. She was first brought into "the work afloat" by her office of secretary of the Falmouth branch of the W. C. T. U. Her success, and the knowledge of its results in the moral reformation of the men, fostered her love of labor among seamen. When the Christian Endeavor movement enlisted her among its workers, Miss Jones applied it to her own sphere. She is now Superintendent of the Floating C. E. Societies, all of whose members are connected with the sea.

MISS ANTOINETTE P. JONES, PRES. OF THE C. E. FLOATING SOCIETIES.

It should be said, that with her this is a labor of love. Her life has been a difficult one. Her father died thirteen years ago, and since that time Miss Jones has not only supported herself but has made a home for her widowed mother.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE register of the League is growing rapidly. The number of Chapters is now 9,300 and of Junior Leagues 1,200. Among the foreign entries is one of a League at Singapore, China, which has just celebrated its third anniversary.—A California Chapter has done a significant thing in placing a large lamp in front of their church. Perhaps it may be the means of enabling some people to find their way into the building on dark nights and then the League can go on with its good work in a metaphorical sense, and light the way for them into membership in the church.—The duty of keeping the pulpit supplied with flowers is gradually coming to be recognized as part of the business of the League. At Lopeer, Mich., this is done, and on the Monday morning one of the members removes the fragrant offering and takes it to the room of some sick person to continue its cheering and beautifying duty. The Mercy and Help Department has been very active at Lopeer during the winter and many families are thanking God for the Epworth League.—An original department of work has been adopted by a League at Germantown, Pa. Noticing that the barbers provide reading matter for their customers to divert them while waiting their turn for the chair, and that their taste in literature was not of the most elevated kind, the League has subscribed for bright religious journals which it places in the shops. The barbers may save money by discontinuing the purchase of the pernicious literature heretofore provided; but, if they do not, it will at least not have its course without competition.

A society to be known as "The Christian Education League of Wisconsin," is to be organized throughout the State in the colleges to promote Christian education and especially to provide these facilities. The association already has a lot adjoining the new gymnasium and armory on the west, and have raised part of the funds necessary for the building. The members hope before another college year to have begun work on the building.

THE BETTER PART.

Written for The Christian Herald.

DEAR children, the world is before you—
The world, and when to choose;
And the wonderful prize of heaven
Is yours to win or to lose.

We all of us long to be famous,
To win man's honor and praise;
To give up, with grand deeds and mighty
The measure of our days;

But the longed-for place in Fame's temple
Is so very hard to win,
That tho' many knock at the portal,
There are few that enter in.

Tho' you may not enter the temple,
To sit with the favored few,
There are love and praise to win elsewhere,
There is work for you all to do.

There are many wrongs to be righted,
And many griefs to assuage;
And many battles for right and truth,
For strong young arms to wage.

You may gather blossoms of pleasure—
They will wither in your hand;
May dive to the ocean's depths for pearls,
And grasp but a handful of sand.

The duty which lies the nearest,
If you do it with all your heart,
Tho' it may seem but a little thing
Still you will have done your part.

A NATIVE AFRICAN WEDDING.

Interesting Scenes at a Mission Station—A Pleasant Celebration

IN those parts of Africa where heathenism and idolatry have given way to Christianity and a certain degree of civilization, the old love of noise and outward display still lingers, and comes to the surface on every possible occasion; generally in a pleasant fashion. Next to a great revival, one of the chief events at a mission station is a native wedding. Among the Kaffirs—who have enjoyed the benefit of the Gospel and civilized customs much longer than most African tribes—a marriage is an event which arouses the activities of the entire community. The illustration on this page represents a marriage procession among native Christians in Kaffir-land. Both sexes have adopted the European dress, modified to suit the requirements of the African climate, the women in spotless white, and the men in all the finery of a gala occasion. Bride and groom in the lead, the procession moves proudly through the leading thoroughfare at the mission station to the little chapel where the service is performed. The procession re-forms and the remainder of the day is devoted to innocent merry-making and an exchange of cordialities.

Wedding customs at the average mission station in the interior do not differ very materially from those that prevail at the coast, where civilization has made much greater progress. Christianity has done much for women in Africa in this relation; it has raised her from the position of a mere burden-bearer to one approaching more nearly to the civilized idea of the wifely station. But this only applies to the families of converts at the missions, for everywhere else, except there and at the coast towns, the old practices prevail.

To marry a woman involves no further ceremony among the Hottentots, than that of buying any article. Polygamy is allowed, but it is only slightly indulged in. Married women in Abyssinia have more freedom than in most African countries, and they may often be seen horseback riding. The Abyssinians believe in early engagements, but after betrothal the engaged parties are not permitted to see each other until the wedding-day, even though this should be postponed for a long time. The bride-elect, in order to prevent an accident, is not allowed to leave the house, and they believe that any violation of this custom would result in the offender's destruction by a serpent. The wedding-feast precedes the marriage and is spread in a public building, and all who will partake are invited. One of the guests goes in search of the bride, and carries her to the place of assembly and seats her upon a chair. Presently a procession, consisting of the groom and his friends with music appears. When all are assembled, some friend delivers an address full of advice, and the ceremony is complete for the time being. All the guests are expected to give presents. By these the young people are given a fair start in housekeeping.

Among the Niam-Niam tribe, wives are not bought as among other tribes, but are given by the chief, and conjugal devotion is so remarkable, that, as we are told by travelers, no one can reproach the Niam-Niams with harsh or indifferent treatment of their wives. The latter are notably modest and retiring and never speak to any man whom they may accidentally meet.

Among the Fans, the husband has to buy his wife, and his prospective father-in-law drives as hard a bargain as he can, paying for his wife in only such goods as traders from

A NATIVE WEDDING AT AN AFRICAN MISSION STATION.

Europe bring to the country. When the terms of the marriage contract are finally agreed upon, the bride's relatives begin to collect stores of elephant meat and quantities of palm-wine. The whole village gathers to witness the father transfer the daughter to her future lord and master. They then dance and sing, eat and drink until the meat and wine are exhausted. It is an exceptional thing for a Fan to marry a member of any other tribe, although, occasionally such an intermarriage does take place, for the purpose of increasing the friendship between the two peoples.

Polygamy is the custom of Bongo, each man being allowed to have three wives if he can afford to purchase so many. Marriages among the Monbuttos is cumulative, for one inherits and must provide for the wives of his father and brothers, so that, it is said, the king of Loango had at one time seven thousand spouses. Each wife is provided with a separate house and attendants, so that a village is sometimes formed by a single family. In the case of the king of Monbuttoe—who believes in state and ceremony—the addition of guards, high officials, courtiers, musicians, dwarfs and jesters, forms quite an extensive household.

Lung Gymnastics.

AT a recent meeting of a woman's club, one of the members gave the benefit of an exercise experiment of her own. She said it was her habit, when walking, to take as few inhalations as possible. "I draw a deep breath, walking very rapidly when I have filled my lungs, and I do not take another until I have reached a certain point in the block. By practice I am able to get on with perhaps three inhalations through a long block. The result is exactly as if I had been running hard. My blood tingles all over me, and I seem to have brought every nerve and muscle into active play. In this way a short walk, if only to the elevated station or to catch a car a block away, gives me a great deal of condensed exercise." Another member of the club referred to the fact that her physician had instructed her to hold her breath when crossing a street. She had become so addicted to the habit now that she did it instinctively, filling her lungs involuntarily as she stepped on a cross-walk. Months of this practice had noticeably strengthened her and made her equal to the daily work before her.

A Word about Daughters.

MOTHERS, are your girls, your daughters, all in the Ark? writes Mr. Moody, the evangelist. If not, what are you living for? Is that the uppermost thought in your hearts at all hours—how you can get them into the Ark? Are you in the Ark yourselves? If not, why not come in to-day, and then try to bring them in? It seems to me that parents are asleep! While we are asleep our children are wandering down to eternal death! We hear of children dying every day; of their being snatched away unexpectedly; dying outside of the Ark, while we sleep on, with our children exposed to the judgment. Say to yourselves, "This day I must go into the Ark. This day I will call my children in. I will not stay out and let them perish."

A Child's Possibilities.

YOU never know what child, in rags and pitiful squalor, that meets you in the street, may have in him the germ of gifts that might add new treasures to the storehouse of beautiful things and noble acts, writes John Morley. In that great storm of terror that swept over France in 1793, a certain man who was every hour expecting to be led off to the guillotine uttered this memorable sentiment: "Even at this incomprehensible moment," he said, "when mortality, enlightenment, love of country—all of them only make death at the prison-door or on the scaffold more certain—yes, on the fatal tumbril itself, with nothing free but my voice, I could still cry, 'Take care,' to a child that should come too near the wheel; perhaps I may save his life, perhaps he may one day save his country." This is a generous and inspiring thought—one to which the roughest-handed man and woman in the world may respond as honestly and heartily as the philosopher who wrote it. It ought to shame the listlessness with which so many of us see the great phantasmagona of life pass before us.

The Virtue of Forgiveness.

LEARN how to forgive, writes Rev. R. V. Lawrence. Do not carry an unforgiving spirit with you through all your life: it will hurt you more than anything else. It will destroy the happiness of many around you; yet its chief feeding-ground will be found in your own heart. You hate your neighbor. Yonder is his dwelling, one hundred and fifty yards away. Suppose you pass by a wood fire, and, as you pass, you pluck a half-consumed brand from it, flaming and gleaming, and thru ting it under your garment to hide it, you start for your neighbor's dwelling to burn it. Who gets the worst of it? You find your garments on fire and your own flesh burned before you can harm your neighbor. So is he who carries an unforgiving spirit in his bosom. It stings his own soul like an adder shut up there. I know of some who call themselves Christians, who are miserable through their own revengefulness.

CHILD COMPANIONSHIPS.

IT is a parent's duty to know who are his child's companions, and to know the character, and course of conduct, and influence upon his child, of every one of those companions separately. Here is where a parent's chief work is called for in the matter of guiding and controlling his child's companionships. A parent must have his child's sympathy, in order to gain this knowledge; and a parent must give his sympathy to his child, in order to be able to use this knowledge wisely. It may be necessary to keep an open house for these companions, and an open heart and hand to them personsonally, as it surely is necessary to keep an open ear to the child's confidences concerning their sayings and doings, if the parent would know all about them that he needs to know.

Knowing his child's companionships, a parent ought to encourage such of them as are worthiest, and discourage such as he cannot approve. He ought to help his child to regulate his social intimacies according to the standards thus set before him. It will not do for a parent to allow matters in this line to take their own course, and to accept all companionships for his child just as they may come to him. He must feel responsible for his child's wise selection, from among the number of proffered companions, of those who are to be retained while others are dropped or avoided. And it devolves upon a parent to see to it that his child's companionships are of growing value to his companions as well as to himself; that his child's influence over his very playfellows is for their good, while his good is promoted by their association with him.

Reckless Frankness.

THERE is a class of people who pride themselves on their honesty and frankness because, as they tell us, they "say just what they think," throwing out their opinions right and left, just as they happen to feel, no matter where they may strike or whom they may wound. This boasted frankness, however, is not honesty, but is rather miserable impertinence and reckless cruelty. We have no right to say what we think unless we think kindly and lovingly, no right to unload our jealousies, envies, bad humors, and miserable spites upon the hearts of our neighbors. If we must be bad-tempered, we should at least keep our ugliness locked up in our own breasts, and not let it out to wound the feelings and mar the happiness of others. If we must speak out our dislikes and prejudices and wretched feelings let us go into our own room and lock the door and close the windows, so that no ear but our own shall hear the hateful words. If any man seemeth to be religious, or even morally decent, and bridleth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain and his character is base.

"The Voices of the Feet."

THE house-mother lies on her bed of pain, writes Maria Pendleton Kennedy. To and fro, to and fro, go the quiet footsteps of her girls, who have taken up the burdens laid down with sorrow and repining; and as she hears these whispering footfalls, somehow she is soothed and lulled into a quiet which, more than doctors and their devices, help to build up the worn-out body. She "knows the voices" of these feet, and could pick them out were there dozens beside them. She hears the gentle tread of her anxious husband as he comes to the door to listen a moment, and is comforted by his tender love and care. Then the girls trip softly by, hushing each other, and her "big boy" stops his whistling and moves painfully along as though he had two very new and very stiff wooden legs, and she laughs a little as he passes the door, stopping one second to listen to his "mamma's" breathing, and says softly, "God bless him!" Then there sounds a little patter of tiny feet from some baby outside on the street, and instantly come back to her the long-vanished years when such little footsteps followed after hers and all her brood were babies. Two of them will always be babies; they never grow up where they have gone to live, and the sweetest sound her mother ears will hear when she wins home at last, will be, she thinks, those little pattering footsteps, never forgotten? And so these footsteps are so part and parcel of our beloved ones, that even in death we know and love and cling to them; and sometimes it has happened that the footfall we thought never to hear again on earth comes into our home once more, and who can measure the perfect joy of that hour!

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

RIGHT LIVING.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, Feb. 19, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. "We should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." Titus 2: 12.

IF you read the chapter from which this text is taken you will agree with me in saying that it abounds in practical suggestion and important instruction. In the early part of this verse we have a statement of the things which the grace of God teaches us to deny. But religion is not made up of negatives only; there must be the doing of good as well as the denying of evil. In harmonizing these two characteristics of true religion the sincerity of our profession is proved, and the blessedness of true religion is illustrated. We have here a suggestive and instructive epitome of what the grace of God teaches us to be and to do. This summary of obligations covers a very wide range; indeed, we may say that it covers the entire range of duty. That this is so will appear when we consider the relation in which the statements of this text stand to one another. It is important to observe that the word "soberly" refers to our duty to ourselves; it implies a suitable and reasonable control over all our desires and activities.

Circles of Obligation.

The word "righteously" widens the range; it refers to our duties to our fellow men. It shows that true religion teaches us to perform those duties with fidelity in all our relations in life. This word includes all our promises and contracts to our friends and neighbors of every class. The word "godly" still further widens, and finally completes the range of duty. It sets forth our obligations to God; it shows that in the performance of our duties to ourselves and to our fellow men we should have reference to the will of God; it indicates what a truly pious man will regard as the dominating purpose, as the controling motive of his life—the will of God. The man who can fill rightly this ever-widening circle of obligation will meet all the responsibilities of this present world, and will be prepared for the enjoyment of the world to come. Let us look more closely at these widening circles of obligation.

We are here exhorted, in the first place, to live soberly. Attention has already been called to the fact that this word refers to our duty to ourselves. It is important to discover, if we may, its exact meaning; and it is not difficult to learn what that meaning is, as we have several examples of the use of the word in the New Testament. A comparison of its uses shows that it means the having of every appetite and desire under The Control of Reason.

It suggests that men should act in all the varied circumstances of life wisely, moderately and discreetly. If we analyze this thought more fully, we see that we are here taught to exercise self-control, to begin at the lowest point, over all the baser passions of our nature. Nowhere does the Bible teach that the soul is to be purified by the torture of the body. Religion holds the body in higher honor, and for that very reason religion teaches that our bodily life should be pure and holy. The lower place is the rightful place for the lower nature. Only as that nature usurps the higher place does it become dangerous. But we must advance a step; this self-control includes also a proper restraint, even upon the more refined and æsthetic elements of our nature. These rightly have a sphere of operation; and within that sphere they are to be properly indulged.

Christ loved the beautiful in creation. God is a God of beauty in all its forms of manifestation. He has given the mountain its grandeur, and the valley its quiet beauty. To cloud and mountain, to flowers and to forest, God has given beauty not necessary merely for purposes of utility. Beautiful homes adorned with statuary and paintings, the results of wealth and genius, adorned with books and all else that may minister to cultured minds and æsthetic tastes, have their place within discreet limitations, and when used for proper ends; but the old fashioned virtues of economy, simplicity and honesty need to be earnestly emphasized in our day. We are constantly in danger of being carried away by the delights to which wealth ministers. Extravagance is one of the crying evils of the hour. The fountains of benevolence are often dried up because of the desire to minister to mere self-indulgence.

The Spirit of Self-sacrifice for the glory of God and the good of men needs to be earnestly cultivated in many churches and homes. When churchmen and women forget that their highest aim in life is to advance the kingdom of God in the world they rob themselves of their chief joy, and degrade themselves to the level of men and women who live for this world alone. The children of God are more capable than the children of the world of the enjoyment of all that is good and beautiful. They alone are able rightly to use all that God has made to minister to the beauty of character, to the purity of Christianity, and to the glory of earthly existence. But when they change the use of these gifts into their abuse, they take the crown from their own brows and consent to be the children of time rather than of eternity, of the world rather than of God. We must never for a moment admit that the children of this world are as capable as the children of God of getting the highest enjoyment out of the things of time and sense; but we must ever affirm that the children of God receive their highest enjoyment when they live above this life and make this life minister to the life that is to come.

Proper Ambition.

If we live soberly we shall also find that we shall exercise a wise control over even our lawful professional ambitions. These ambitions have their legitimate place. I am not an advocate of a monkish seclusion from the duties and enjoyments of this life. I uniformly urge young Christians to be in the world, even though in the highest sense they are not of the world. I say to you, dear young people, strike out boldly, grandly, wisely for the highest place which your trade or profession can bestow. Master all its details; secure all its honors; never take second place, if you can help it, to any man or woman in any walk of life. But remember at the same time that this world is not all. The man who lives for this life alone does not attain this life in the fulness, richness and blessedness of its possibilities. Only he who lives for the eternal life as well as the life that now is becomes master of both worlds. The man who lives for this life alone loses both worlds; the man who lives for the other world wins both worlds. Let me urge you now to look at things calmly, deliberately, wisely. Lift the veil that surrounds your earthly course and duty. Gaze upon eternal verities, as well as upon life's fleeting possibilities. Every truly thoughtful man must see that eternal verities utterly dwarf earthly verities. Every wise man must know that the sunlight of the eternal world throws into dark shadow the brighest light of our earthly life. I urge you to run the race of life, bravely and boldly; but at the same time to run it lightly and safely. Do not unduly magnify the Prizes of Earthly Achievements;

they fade under careful examination; they disappear when most we need their ministry. It is said that Queen Elizabeth, in her last speech to her last Parliament, said of her great crown, "It seems grander to those who look at it than to those who wear it." A similar remark might be made of all the attainments of life which men most earnestly prize. With their possession comes inevitable disappointment. Only he is truly master of the world who has crucified the world. The man who makes the pleasures and honors of this world the chief aim of his life, the man who makes anything short of the great God the object of his desire, affection and reverence, has missed life's chief duty and earth's highest glory. The man who lives for himself is out of tune with the great and glorious beings in both worlds, who bow in adoring reverence in the presence of the eternal God. The man who forgets God and lives only for himself is an instrument untuned, and so making discord in the midst of a glorious, harmonious, angelic and divine orchestra. As the heliotrope, as its name so beautifully implies, turns to follow the sun, so a man of the noblest type follows Jesus Christ as the ideal man and the Son of Righteousness; Jesus Christ who lived to do the will of God and to save lost men. Only as we catch his spirit and imitate his example can we possess his character and share in his glory.

Moral Rectitude.

We are exhorted, in the second place, to live righteously. The word justly would more correctly translate the original word here employed than the word righteously. We know that the word righteous is often used in the New Testament in what theologians call an objective and forensic sense. That, however, is not the idea of the inspired writer in this instance, and to use the word with that thought produces confusion in the apostle's use of terms. Here, as the best interpreters affirm, the word has no reference to Christ's righteousness; it refers rather to moral rectitude, to our duty to our fellow-men in all the relations of life in which we stand. It includes our duty to our neighbor, and thus widens the sphere to which the word soberly introduced us. Under the guidance of the word now under consideration we enter upon a wider sphere, one having to do with the proper performance of our duty to our fellow-men. It teaches us that we are not needlessly to injure any man in property, in reputation or in character. It shows us that we are to have a due regard to the welfare of his body, to the development of his mind, and to the salvation of his soul. We may, at times be obliged, because of our regard for our brother man, to speak to him harshly because truthfully regarding his courses of conduct; but even the utmost plainness of speech may be softened by the spirit of love which prompts the utterance. Never did preacher speak so plainly as our blessed and loving Lord; never did such terrible "woes" come from human lips, as were those he uttered; but he baptized his most terrible denunciations in tears of tenderest affection. We have no right to set a bad example before any man, woman or child; we have no right to live only

A Negatively Good Life.

Our entire influence ought to be on the side of open obedience, and of positive and continuous devotion to truth and God. This thought necessitates a step in advance, in harmony with the teaching of the word we have translated justly. We are to render to every man his due; we should be just in our dealings, charitable in our judgments; ever slow to take offense and, every ready for reconciliation. We should be without blame in our conduct, without reproach in our speech, and without suggestion of evil in our thoughts. We are divinely exhorted to provide things honest in the sight of all men. I am here setting up a very high standard of moral living; but it is not any higher than that uniformly taught in the Word of God and illustrated in the life of Jesus Christ. We are God's representatives among the children of men. The world has a right to expect more of us than of its own disciples. We should not forgive ourselves if we did not live above the world, above its maxims, and above its moral standards. We are the children of God, heirs of God and the joint-heirs of Jesus Christ. Our home is in the skies; our inspiration is divine; our strength is superhuman; and we should be more like God than any other beings in this broad universe. Men should take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus; and have learned of him and are like him.

The Human Loadstone.

Living righteously, implies, furthermore, that we are to be active in securing the spiritual good of all men. As I have before implied, ours is not to be simply a negative life. We know that God wills not the death of any man, but would have all come to him for light and life; so must we strive for the highest good of those under our influence. It has been well said that the Christian is to be a loadstone to draw men to Jesus Christ. We know that if Christ be lifted up he will draw all men to himself. He is the mightiest magnet this world has ever known to draw men from self and sin to holiness and heaven. If we keep near to Christ even we shall possess something of his drawing power; something of his heavenly light and life; something of his matchless beauty and spotless glory. By the marvelous alchemy of divine grace we shall be loadstones to draw men to Christ if we be diamonds to reflect his light and life. In a single world, a right life is a Christ-like life; a righteous life is a life of faith upon the Son of God; and a Christly life before men is the practical fruit of divine faith.

We are here taught, finally, that we are to live not only soberly and righteously, but also godly in this present world. We are to live in the faithful performance of all our duties to God. This sphere includes the two previous spheres in which we have walked. Duty to God includes all other duties. We began with our duty to ourselves; we moved forward in the widening sphere to our duty to our fellow men, and now our sphere has still widened until it has reached beyond both these to its utmost limit in Duty to God.

This thought runs through all other duties here mentioned. The apostle has elsewhere told us that whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, all is to be done to the glory of God. Personal and relative duties are to be performed with reference to God's command and with an eye single to his glory; but there are direct duties which we owe to God, and which ought to be here emphasized. What are some of these duties which appear before us as sinful men and women in our direct relations to God?

Perhaps the very first duty is repentance toward God and faith in Jesus Christ. After our Lord had performed the miracle of feeding the thousands with the five barley loaves and the two small fishes, the people came to him, asking: "What shall we do that we may work the works of God?" The answer of Jesus was: "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." This is a remarkable statement by our blessed Lord. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to find in the writings of the apostles a statement which shows more clearly that our true spiritual life finds its source in faith in Christ. Such faith is the fountain whence to God and blessings to men must continually flow. The duty of repentance was the great burden of the preaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus—the Christ. Any one who has not given special attention to this matter will be surprised when he first examines it, to discover the harmony existing between the preaching of Christ and his forerunner, regarding the universal and imperative duty of repentance. Each insists, with the utmost emphasis, on the duty of repentance, in connection with the coming of the new kingdom. Only as that duty is performed are men prepared for the admission of the principles of that kingdom into their hearts. The insistance upon repentance is by no means an arbitrary command. It is in harmony with the ripest principles of human philosophy, as well as with the unvarying demands of divine instruction. Until the heart is emptied of the love of sin, it cannot be filled with the love of God; but more strictly, it must be opened to receive the love of God before it can be emptied of the love of sin. We cannot follow the footsteps of Jesus Christ, except as we turn away from the paths of evil. Christ knew what was required for entrance into his kingdom, and he constantly emphasized the duty of repentance, as did his forerunner, and as did his apostles.

Streams of Obedience

An Essential Duty.

There must also be faith in Jesus Christ, as another duty which God invariably demands. No man can please God except he give him his unquestioning trust. Without faith it is absolutely and eternally impossible to please God; without faith in our fellow men it is impossible to please them. Shall we give our fellow men our trust and refuse it to God? How dare a man deny God his utmost confidence? I would here and now urge you, with the earnestness born of deep conviction, that you exercise faith in Jesus Christ, the faith which works by love, the faith which manifests itself in instant obedience and in doing good works, as its natural fruit.

If we are to live godly, we shall find that obedience is one of the duties which we constantly owe to God. Obedience to God is one of the most striking characteristics of the Christian life. God has himself taught us that, "to obey is better than sacrifice." He has in many ways shown his pleasure with practical obedience, and his just displeasure with those who refuse that obedience. He has himself asked, "Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart." God must be served with the whole heart. Half-hearted obedience is disobedience. Involuntary obedience is not obedience. Finally, did Matthew Henry say: "We must, in a course of obedience to God's will, and service to his honor, follow him universally, without dividing; uprightly, without dissembling; cheerfully, without disputing; and constantly, without declining; and this is following him fully."

FAITHFUL NAMAKEI.

The Grand Old Chief of Aniwa, once a Cannibal but who Died a Christian.

IN his posthumous work, just issued by Fleming H. Revell & Co., the late John G. Paton, Missionary to the New Hebrides, tells the following affecting story of his first convert on the island of Aniwa:

"God raised up around us and wonderfully endowed men to carry forward his own blessed work. Among these must be specially commemorated Namakei, the old Chief of Aniwa. Slowly, but very steadily, the light of the Gospel broke in upon his soul, and he was ever very eager to communicate to his people all that he learned. In heathen days he was a cannibal and a great warrior; but from the first, he took a warm interest in us and our work, —a little selfish, no doubt, at the beginning, but soon becoming purified as his eyes and heart were opened to the Gospel of Jesus.

"The death of Namakei had in it many streaks of Christian romance. He had heard about the Missionaries annually meeting on one or other of the Islands and consulting about the work of Jehovah. What ideas he had formed of a Mission Synod one cannot easily imagine; but in his old age, and when very frail, he formed an impassioned desire to attend our next meeting on Aneityum, and see and hear all the missionaries of Jesus gathered together from the New Hebrides. Terrified that he would die away from home, and that that might bring great reverses to the good work on Aniwa, where he was truly beloved, I opposed his going with all my might. But he and his relations and his people were all set upon it, and I had at length to give way. His few little books were then gathered together, his meagre wardrobe was made up, and a small native basket carried all his belongings. He assembled his people and took an affectionate farewell, pleading with them to be "strong in Jesus," whether they ever saw him again or not, and to be loyal, and kind to Missi. The people wailed out, and many wept bitterly. Those on board the Dayspring were amazed to see how his people loved him. The old Chief stood the voyage well. He went in and out to our meeting of Synod, and was vastly pleased with the respect paid to him on Aneityum. When he heard of the prosperity of the Lord's work, and how Island after Island was learning to sing the praises of Jesus, his heart glowed, and he said,—

"Missi, I am lifting up my head like a tree. I am growing tall with joy!"

On the fourth or fifth day, however, he sent for me out of the Synod; and when I came to him, he said, eagerly,—

"Missi, I am near to die! I have asked you to come and say farewell. Tell my daughter, my brother, and my people to go on pleasing Jesus, and I will meet them again in the fair world."

I tried to encourage him, saying that God might raise him up again and restore him to his people; but he faintly whispered,—

"O Missi, death is already touching me! I feel my feet going away from under me. Help me to lie down under the shade of that banyan tree."

So saying, he seized my arm, we staggered near to the tree, and he lay down under its cool shade. He whispered again,—

"I am going? O Missi, let me hear your words rising up in prayer, and then my soul will be strong to go."

Amidst many choking sobs, I tried to pray. At last he took my hand, pressed it to his heart, and said in a stronger and clearer tone,—

"O my Missi, my dear Missi, I go before you, but I will meet you again in the Home of Jesus. Farewell!"

That was the last effort of dissolving strength; he immediately became unconscious, and fell asleep. My heart felt like to break over him.

Namakei was my first Aniwan Convert, —the first who ever on that Island of love and tears opened his heart to Jesus; and as he lay there on the leaves and grass, my soul soared upward after his, and all the harps of God seemed to thrill with song as Jesus presented to the Father this trophy of redeeming love. He had been our true and devoted friend and fellow-helper in the Gospel, and next morning all the members of our Synod followed his remains to the grave. There we stood, the white Missionaries of the Cross from far distant lands, mingling our tears with Christian natives of Aneityum, and letting them fall over one who only a few years before was a blood-stained cannibal, and whom now we mourned as a brother, a saint, an Apostle amongst his people.

Ye ask an explanation? The Christ entered into his heart, and Namakei became a new creature. "Behold, I make all things new."

MORE THAN ANGELS.

MORE than angels are the dear ones
Who from out our lives have flown,
Leaving us with hearts so saddened,
And our homes so still and lone.
For awhile we thought to keep them,
Filled their wants with loving care;
Soothed, caressed and entertained them,
More than angels—unaware.

More than angels are the dear ones
Who now sing redeeming love;
Babes of earth through Christ's atonement
Welcomed to the fold above.
Our lone hearts anon are yearning,
Clouded still with grief and pain,
And our empty arms uplifted—
Eager arms that reach in vain.

Yet we find earth's joys all fleeting,
Each sad heart knows well its woe,
And what we are now enduring
They will never, never know.
Little lips we pressed with kisses,
Ere we saw the rose-tint fade,
Little hands we clasped so fondly,
On the cold breast softly laid.

Yes, we'll trust Him when He chideth,
Though our hearts with sorrow bleech,
For we know that whom He loveth
Those He chasteneth, indeed;
And we'll deem it still a blessing
That He lent them to our care;
Honored us with entertaining
More than angels—unaware.—S. J. RHODES.

PHILLIPS BROOKS

A MASSIVE man, a knightly soul,
Has passed from sight of earth away;
For him sound no funereal toll—
He walks with Christ in endless day.
On earth he preached a larger faith
Than narrow-visioned bigots see,
Yet humbly found in "Jesus saith"
Life's final, best philosophy.

He stood for broadly-reaching love
And piety without pretense,
Resolved men's thoughts to lift above
The grosser things of time and sense:
Such men we count God's own elect
And own their higher, heav'nly birth—
The glory of no single sect
But moral masters of the earth!

OUR OWN MISSIONARY.

Rev. George W. Sharp Writes of Visits to the Scenes of his Early Labors.

THE following letter received from Rev. George W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary of the American Sunday School Union, shows how permanent and valuable is the work that has been accomplished by such pioneer efforts as he is still making in other districts. Encouragement comes to the Christian laborer from an occasional visit to a thriving cause which he was the means of planting and such visits have apostolic precedent, as Paul said to Barnabas (Acts 15: 36): "Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the Word of the Lord and see how they do." This is Mr. Sharp's letter:

HIGBEE, MO.

EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

This town is a place of precious memory to to me. Years ago I preached the first sermon that ever was preached here. It was then a very small village and I preached in a small upper room, there being neither church nor school house in the village. There are now three church houses in the town, and a fourth is to be built this year, the town now having a considerable population. There is a Sunday school in each church. All denominations treat me very kindly.

About four miles west of this is a country school house where I held a meeting not far from the time I first preached here. That meeting was blessed to the conversion of souls. I met with their Sunday School at different times, encouraging it in various ways. Five miles southwest of here, in another country school house, I also labored in a meeting which was signally blessed in the salvation of sinners. I have frequently visited them since, addressing their Sunday School, and preaching to the people. On the meeting referred to a very diffident young lady became greatly concerned about her soul. Seeing she was in deep distress I tried to get an understanding of her difficulty in coming to the Saviour. She was reluctant to talk and excused herself by saying, "Brother Sharp, I am a bashful girl." I asked her no more questions, but instructed her how to be saved. This was after the morning service. In the meeting that night the Lord rolled away the burden from her heart. She was filled with joy, and the "bashful girl" praised God aloud; and in the liberty of the Spirit told her associates of the joy of the Lord. She has since become a married woman and mother, and is bringing up her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and labors with her husband in the Sunday School, he being its Superintendent. There is now a flourishing Union Sunday School in a Union Church which has since been erected. It is a very commodious country church, and they have conversions nearly every year, and some years a considerable number. The first man I met when I came here to-day referred to the meeting above described as the most precious, probably, in the history of that neighborhood. He lived there at the time and remembered it well.

Still another place of hallowed association in this neighborhood is one about four miles north of this place. Three years ago there was no Sunday School here, though there is a large population. The weather was very warm when I arrived but I published my appointment extensively from house to house, and otherwise as I could. The school house was well filled with parents and children, the people became interested and the success of the school was well assured when we met. I had very little trouble in effecting a good organization. Later in that season I went into a populous neighborhood east and a little north of here, which had no Sunday School. There had been unfortunate dissensions in the community; but prayer and perseverance were blessed, and I organized a good school. So you see I not only labored in this town when it was a little village; but I may say I have pretty well fenced it in with Sunday Schools, addresses, sermons, Bibles and Testaments, Sunday School papers, and family visitations, "Yet not I but the grace of God which was in me." A faithful evangelist has recently closed a series of meetings here in which there were seventy-five conversions. Yours sincerely,

GEO. W. SHARP.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

The next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will contain the opening chapters of a new and very interesting serial story, entitled:

"BRAVE BARBARA,"

by the late Rev. J. Jackson Wray. This story, written shortly before Mr. Wray's death last year, is probably the best narrative of Christian life and experience that has ever come from his brilliant pen.

NOBLE IDEALS.

A NOBLE ideal and confident expectation of approximating to it, is an infallible defence. The artist completes in his mind the great thought that he wishes to transfer to the canvas or the marble before he takes up the crayon or the chisel. The architect plans out the entire structure before he orders the workmen to begin; and though there may for a long while seem to be nothing but blundering and rudeness, he has in his mind every Corinthian wreath and Gothic arch and Byzantine capital. The poet arranges the entire plot before he begins to chime the first canto of tingling rhythms. And yet, strange to say, there are men who attempt to build their character without knowing whether in the end it shall be a rude Tartar's tent or a St. Mark's of Venice—men who begin to write the intricate poem of their lives without knowing whether it shall be a Homer's Odyssey or a rhymester's botch.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand are living without any great life-plot. Booted and spurred and plumed, they urge their swift coursers in the hottest haste. I ask: "Halloo, man, whither away?" His response is, "Nowhere." Rush into the busy shop or store of many a one, and taking the plane out of the man's hand and laying down the yard-stick, say: "What, man, is all this about—so much stir and sweat?" The reply will stumble and break down between teeth and lips. Every day's duty ought only to be the filling up of the main plan of existence.

Let men be consistent. If they prefer misdeeds to correct courses of action, then let them draw out the design of knavery and cruelty and plunder. Let every day's falsehood and wrong-doing be added as coloring to the picture. Let bloody deeds red-stripe the picture, and the clouds of a wrathful God hang down heavily over the canvas, ready to break out in clamorous tempest. Let the waters be chafed, and froth-tangled, and green with immeasurable depths. Then take a torch of burning pitch and scorch into the frame the right name for it. If one entering upon sinful directions would only in his mind or on paper draw out in awful reality this dreadful future, he would recoil from it and say: "Am I a Dante, that in my own life I should write another Inferno?"

I beg every young man to-day to draw out a sketch of what, by the grace of God, he means to be. Think no excellence so high that you cannot reach it.

AN INCREASING EVIL.

EVER since apples and grapes and wheat grew, the world has been tempted to unhealthful stimulants. But the intoxicants of the olden time were an innocent beverage, a harmless orangeade, a quiet syrup, a peaceful soda water, as compared with the liquids of modern inebriation, into which a madness, and a fury, and a gloom, and a fire, and a suicide, and a retribution have mixed and mingled. Fermentation was always known, but it was not until a thousand years after Christ that distillation was invented.

While we must confess that some of the ancient arts have been lost, the Christian era is superior to all others in the bad eminence of whisky and rum and gin. The modern drunk is a hundred-fold worse than the ancient drunk. Noah in his intoxication became imbecile, but the victims of modern alcoholism have to struggle with whole menageries of wild beasts and jungles of hissing serpents and perditions of blaspheming demons. An arch-fiend arrived in our world, and he built an invisible cauldron of temptation. He built that cauldron strong and stout for all ages and all nations. First, he squeezed into the cauldron the juices of the forbidden fruit of Paradise. Then he gathered for it a distillation from the harvest fields and the orchards of the hemispheres. Then he poured into this cauldron capsicum, and copperas, and logwood, and deadly nightshade, and assault and battery, and vitriol, and opium, and rum, and murder, and surphuric acid, and theft, and potash, and cochineal, and red carrots, and poverty, and death, and hops.

But it was a dry compound, and it must be moistened, and it must be liquefied, and so the arch-fiend poured into that cauldron the tears of centuries of orphanage and widowhood, and he poured in the blood of twenty thousand assassinations. And then the arch fiend took a shovel that he had brought up from the furnaces beneath, and he put that shovel into this great cauldron and began to stir, and the cauldron began to heave, and rock, and boil, and sputter, and hiss, and smoke, and the nations gathered around it with cups, and tankards, and demijohns, and kegs, and there was enough for all.

Drunkenness is the greatest evil of this nation, and it takes no logical process to prove that a drunken nation cannot long be a free nation. I call your attention to the fact that drunkenness is not subsiding, certainly that it is not at a standstill, but that it is on an onward march, and it is a double-quick. There is more rum swallowed in this country, and of a worse kind, than was ever swallowed since the first distillery began its work of death. Where there was one drunken home there are ten drunken homes. Where there was one drunkard's grave there are twenty drunkards' graves. It is on the increase. Talk about crooked whisky—by which men mean the whisky that does not pay the tax to government—I tell you all strong drink is crooked. Crooked otard, crooked cognac, crooked schnapps, crooked beer, crooked wine, crooked whisky, because it makes a man's path crooked, and his life crooked, and his death crooked, and his eternity crooked.

If I could gather all the armies of the dead drunkards and have them come to resurrection, and then add to that host all the armies of living drunkards, five and ten abreast, and then if I could have you mount a horse and ride along that line for review, you would ride that horse until he dropped from exhaustion, and you would mount another horse and ride until he fell from exhaustion and you would take another and another, and you would ride along hour after hour, and day after day. Great hosts, in regiments, in brigades. Great armies of them. And then if you had voice enough stentorian to make them all hear, and you could give the command, "Forward, march!" their first tramp would make the earth tremble. I do not care which way you look in the community to-day, the evil is increasing.

THE STREET WAIFS.

THE Spartans who threw their sickly children to the wild beasts were merciful compared with that stolid indifference which, in this age, would give up the destitute youth of our country to be eaten up of their own depravity. These so-called ragamuffins are coming up to be the men and women. That spark of iniquity which you might put out with one drop of the water of life, will flame up into a conflagration of every green thing that God planted in the soul, and that which was intended to be the temple of the Holy Ghost will be a scarred and blasted ruin, every light quenched, and every altar in the dust.

There are many about us in boyhood and girlhood in comfortable circles that are going to be something very good or very bad—very bright or very ignorant; and they will yet make their parents glad with an infinite gladness or pain them with an infinite sorrow. They go bounding through the hall; they shout in the yard; they sing in the school. This activity that now strikes the ball, and runs the race, and rolls the hoop, and flies the kite, will soon be ready for the higher game of life, where fortunes are to be made, and reputation achieved, and temptations combatted, and immortal souls jeopardized, and kingdoms of glory won.

Call up that child; push back his hair. Shall this face be ever brightening up with benevolence, or scarred and pinched and blasted with low excesses? Shall those eyes become more and more intelligent, or shall they acquire the dishonest glance and the servile downcast? Put your hand on that child's heart. Shall it always beat with noble impulses, or will it be a thief's heart, a coward's heart, a traitor's heart?

My soul stands back abashed and overwhelmed in the presence of these young princes of God, these sons and daughters of immortality, these voyagers eternity-bound.

I have so much faith in the advancement of our race under the Gospel that I suppose the rising generation are to have in their number more noble men than their predecessors. I suppose that every day we are walking unconsciously among Enochs, and Augustines, and Wilberforces, and Clarksons, and Moffits, and Robert Halls. There they are! on the back seat of the mission school. There they are! playing marbles in the low alley, their knees out, their elbows out, their toes out, their hats rimless, and their souls Christless; and in double columns there is printed on their countenance a tragedy of unutterable pain. But they shall be gathered in. Sabbath Schools will do their work. Tract and Bible Societies will do their work. A Christian printing-press will do its work. And they who are now scoffed at as ragamuffins, with their knees out, and their elbows out, and their toes out, will pass on to be the men of might and the men of God in future years.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GOOD WOMEN.

TO love their children." I'm telling no tales out of school when I write that many children are hated before they are born, and if their visit to the house could be indefinitely postponed, it would be.

"Teach them to be discreet." "Oh, what a lesson to give girls! Here is the beginning of the downward goings, which lead at last to the land of the lost. An indiscretion, and then another, till, like snow flakes,, they fall from heaven to hell. I think it a noble work to lift fallen women, to provide shelters and homes for these unfortunates. It's a glorious work to lift them up: but in the name of heaven, with its mercies, is it not better to keep them from going down?

"Teach them to be chaste." Let the aged women teach girlhood that, and you will do a work more fruitful than trees planted by the rivers of water.

"Keepers at home"—Young women out on the streets at night, alone. I have boiled over with indignation and righteous wrath, more than once, as I saw girls, girls far under twenty, out on public streets at nine and ten o'clock at night. They should have been home and in bed. It's no place for a young woman to be at night; and unless accompanied by some older person, they have no business going even to church, unless it be Sabbath evening. Gadding the streets is a sure forerunner of sin of some kind. My mother taught me, as a boy, to remain home at nights: and the lesson is doubly good to girls.

"Teach them to be good." You can teach a girl to be good; it's all in the upbringing. Let them grow up like weeds, and they will turn out shallow: but teach them to be good, and bachelor clubs will close for want of members. A man, a real M-A-N, when he marries, wants a good wife; and good wives are made out of good girls. There is no adjective quite so fitting for some women I know, as the little word "good."

Take my mother: and there was never a better woman born. I never saw a frown on her face, during the thirty-five years I knew her. She was a G-O-O-D woman.

She too was a "Mary," and not unlike, I think, one who long since became Joseph's wife. Be like her.

The next item in this second chapter of Titus some of you women won't like, but it's there, and I like it. "Teach them to be obedient to their own husbands." That is the rule laid down for a successful home; but more of that under another head.

And so I might go on telling you of Scripture belonging to women, like the "Woman's Psalm," the forty-fifth; but you must search for yourself. I have given you a key to open the storehouse: enter and possess.

Young Women.

Some things for this class, which the others don't get, though you must keep in mind there are young women of forty and fifty and sixty. They imagine they are young, and hope others will imagine so, too; but often its hard work. More about them, however, when I write to those who walk down life's pathway alone.

Now it's to young women I write, who are really so—say those between fourteen and thirty; for a girl gets to be—well, she gets to be a woman by thirty anyway. If she ever gets to be one at all, she will have arrived at that stage, by that number of years.

Three things I want to talk about, by my pen: 1. Her company. 2. Her dress. 3. Her private life.

Her company should be good; men of good morals; and if she be a Christian, better if her company be the same.

She has a perfect right to know how the men, to whom she grants her presence, spend their time. If in the saloon or gambling-hall, let her refuse, point-blank, to associate with such.

It was a fine rebuke a gentlewoman gave to a rum-soaked fellow, who happened to be passing out of a house, and going in the same direction, one evening: "Please take my arm." "No thank you, I don't put my arm through a jug handle," said she.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE PANAMA SENTENCES.

NO duty could have been more painful to a just and patriotic judge than that performed on February 9 by M. Perivier, President of the French Court of Appeals. He had to pass sentence on Ferdinand de Lesseps, and his son and three other distinguished French citizens, for defrauding the public, and misappropriating the funds intrusted to them for the purpose of cutting the Panama canal. The first two were sentenced to five years imprisonment and the others to two years, with fines in each case. Public opinion approves the sentences as not being too severe in view of the enormity of the offence. The defendants spent the money which should have been used in the purchase of machinery and the hire of labor for the canal, in bribing politicians and journalists who helped them to delude the people into investing their savings in the enterprise. The canal is an utter failure. The illustration on this page shows a section of the abandoned workings, where such machinery as was actually used is rotting away in the ooze. There is little doubt that money was extracted from the public after De Lesseps, his son, and the other directors knew that the construction of the canal was impossible. It is a significant fact that while they were urging the people to invest and were painting in gorgeous colors the rich harvest of profits sure to be reaped they did not invest their own money in the enterprise. Thousands of families invested their all; widows and the trustees of orphans put into the enterprise the only provision for their future and these men squandered it. The magic name of De Lesseps won the confidence of the people. He was on the rolls of the Institute and of the Legion of Honor and no one forgot how he had carried to triumphant success the Suez Canal enterprise which had been for centuries declared impossible. They believed in him, they were proud of him and they trusted him. Eiffel, too, the great engineer who built the famous tower, was helping in the work and national vanity refused to believe that two men so brilliant could fail. The shame of the exposure is as bitter to patriotic citizens as the financial loss. The sentence on De Lesseps will probably be commuted. He is eighty-eight years old and is dangerously ill. When the sentence was pronounced he was in a state of coma and knew nothing of his doom. But he and his associates in the gigantic fraud must have known from the beginning of the investigation that public disgrace was impending. Perhaps in time men will learn that the inspired king was right when he said that treasure gotten by lying lips is unsubstantial as a vapor and is as a snare of death. (Prov. 21: 6.)

Better than a Pension.

A LADY residing in Louisville, Ky., has recently had her application for a pension, which she filed as a soldier's widow, rejected by the Pension Department. She is not grieving over it as she has learned that she is not entitled to a pension. In the year 1866 she was married at Louisville to a discharged veteran. Misfortunes came upon the pair shortly after their marriage and they fell into poverty. The husband decided to try the West to see if he could do better there, promising to send for his wife as soon as he settled. The wife secured a situation in a wealthy family which moved away from the city. The husband had no good news to give, for some time, and did not write to her. Eventually he drifted to Fort Worth, Texas, where he obtained a position on the police force. There he made the acquaintance of a man who had recently come from Louisville, and who, probably misled by a similar name, told him that his wife had fallen ill and died. The husband was stricken down by the news. A severe wound in the head which he had received at the battle of Shiloh rendered him very susceptible to mental trouble and he was prostrated before he could verify the story of his wife's death. When he recovered, he took no steps to do so and mourned her as dead. The wife, meanwhile, not hearing from him, and not knowing where to write, concluded that he must be dead. She lost her situation and being in need of money she recently applied for a pension. Commissioner Raum in examining her application found that the man whom she described was living in Oklahoma Territory and he immediately communicated with both and a happy reunion of husband and wife followed. The wife was as much surprised by the result of her applicatioh for a pension as Saul was, when, going to the prophet for help to find some asses, he gained a kingdom. There are many who have been driven to God by temporal trouble hoping only to get deliverance from that, who in receiving salvation to their souls have proved that "God is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that they ask or think." (Eph. 3: 20.)

A Prayer in a Lighthouse.

THE keeper of Wolf Trap Lighthouse near Norfolk, Va., had a distressing experience during the recent severe weather. He saw the ice form around the lighthouse, which was in twelve feet of water and three miles from the shore. He was alone in the structure and had no means of communicating with the land. His signals of distress were unnoticed and he began to think he was doomed to destruction as he perceived that the ice grew thicker around the supporting piles at every tide. Its mighty power would, he felt sure, eventually crush the foundation, if the weather did not soon moderate, as it was overlapping and piling up against the sides of the lighthouse. He says that he prayed for help as he never prayed before. Not long afterward he saw the smoke of a steamer and to his joy, saw that it was coming toward him. It was halted abreast of the station half a mile away and he determined to try to reach it over the ice. It was a dangerous undertaking, for he knew the ice must be very thin in places. He made his way cautiously but fell through once or twice. Eventually he succeeded in attracting the attention of the crew of the steamer and he was taken on board. Soon afterward the calamity he anticipated, occurred. The lighthouse toppled over and drifted out to sea where it was found drifting, almost submerged, and was towed ashore. It is a pity that men who are in danger of spiritual wreck are not as prudent as this lighthouse keeper. It was not necessary for men to go to him and convince him of his peril and entreat him to accept the means of salvation. (II. Cor. 5: 20.)

SCENE ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA, SHOWING PRESENT CONDITION OF THE CANAL.

Undesirable Tenants.

ABOUT a month ago a widow in New York advertised in the daily papers for a tenant for the house she had occupied when her husband was living. He died there about the end of last year and the widow quitted the house after the funeral, locked it up and went to a boarding house to live. She decided to rent the house with the furniture in it as it stood, if she could secure a respectable tenant. No answer came to her advertisements; but in passing the house one day recently, she noticed signs of its being occupied. She went to her new home for the keys of it, but on applying them she was unable to get in. She notified the police and an entrance was effected through one of the windows. It was found that thieves had been there and had apparently remained for several days. They had begun operations, after picking the locks, by barricading the doors, that they might be secure from interruption. They had systematically searched the house from roof to cellar and removed every article of value they could find. There were signs of their having had meals there and of sleeping on the beds, and they had kindled fires to add to their comfort. The work appeared to have been done in a leisurely but most exhaustive manner, and nothing was left that could be carried away and sold. There is little doubt that they were guided to the field of operations by the widow's advertisement for a tenant. Many a soul has been spoiled in the same way. The only men who are safe from the intrusion of Satan with his ruinous occupation are those who have given their hearts to Christ and in whom the Holy Spirit lives and reigns. "When a strong man armed keepeth his house his goods are in peace." (Luke 11: 21, 22.)

His Fortune Beyond his Reach.

AN application of a singular character was made to a New York Court last week. Its object was to compel a safe deposit company in the city to give up a box containing seventeen thousand dollars in money. It is claimed by an aged man, who is in extreme poverty. He says that a few years ago he turned into cash all the savings of his life, put it into a box and left it with the safe deposit company ready for the time when he might not be able to work. The time came sooner than he expected. He was assaulted by footpads one night in the winter of 1891–2 and was robbed of his pocketbook containing the certificate of deposit and the key of his box. The thieves struck him with a sandbag which rendered him unconscious for some time, and afterward he was in a dazed condition and so continues. Much of his past life is a blank, of which his memory gives him only fleeting glimpses and those of an uncertain kind. He has no relatives who can refresh his memory. At times he is not sure about his own name. The safe deposit company are perfectly willing to surrender the box to its proper owner, but they naturally decline to give it to a man who cannot establish his identity. The man has, therefore, been for about a year in the anomalous position of owning a fortune, which he sorely needs, but which he cannot touch. There are some Christians who are in a similar condition. The spiritual treasures which God has placed at the disposal of his children they never enjoy. But the cause in their case is the reverse of that of the depositor; they are not debarred because they cannot establish their identity to God and the Church as his children, but because they are not sure of it themselves. (II Tim. 2: 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Fourth Presbyterian Church of New York raised $2,500 for Home and Foreign Missions during the past year, beside $2,000 spent in the work outside its own district.

Rev. O. P. Gifford, of Immanuel Baptist Church, Chicago, has inaugurated a crusade against gambling, and is preaching a series of sermons which have awakened a strong feeling in the community.

Some idea of the extent of the poverty in London may be gained from the fact that a conservative estimate of the amount distributed last year by the public charities alone places the figure at thirty million dollars.

Evangelists Veazie and Geach have been holding services at Ellis, Kan., in the Opera House, and much good has been done. The revival was one of the greatest in the history of the town. All denominations co-operated.

Dr. John Hall's son, the Rev. Thomas C. Hall, who graduated at Union Theological Seminary, after a course at Princeton, has received a call to succeed Dr. W. Stryker as pastor of the Forty-first Street Presbyterian Church in Chicago.

Dr. Joseph Angus, whose works on Bible study are widely circulated in this country, has announced his intention to retire on June next from the position he has held for forty-five years as President of Regent's Park Baptist College, London.

Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, who is at present occupying the late Pastor Spurgeon's pulpit at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, has been appointed by the trustees of Dr. Duff's estate as the next lecturer in the course established by the famous Scottish missionary to India. The lectures are delivered every four years, and must be on a subject intimately related to foreign missions.

Mr. D. L. Moody has increased the accommodation of the Women's Department of the Bible Institute of Chicago, by the addition of three adjoining houses, which are now ready for occupation. A large number of applications for admission have been received from the South. They are chiefly from Christian ladies, who wish to devote their three months' vacation to study in the Institute.

At the recent meeting of the Managers of the American Bible Society, a gratifying report was received of the work done in Costa Rica, by Mr. Penzotti, who was, as our readers will remember, imprisoned in Peru for circulating the Bible. A letter was also received from Rev. John Carington, who has been evangelizing on the Siamese canals. He reports that during a journey of twenty-six days he sold volumes of Scripture to the number of 2,036. Mr. Prince, who is at St. Petersburg, wrote that the demand for Bibles in Russia was increasing.

Rev. George C. Needham has been assisting his brother Rev. Wm. E. Needham in holding services at Camden, N. J. The large Opera House of the town has been crowded and many non-church-goers have been reached. For some months past Mr. George C. Needham has been invalided and has done little work outside Philadelphia, where he now resides. The fact, however, that on Feb. 5, he was able to conduct five services, shows that the veteran evangelist is regaining his normal energy and will soon be able to accept the invitations of churches which have been long hoping for a visit from him.

In describing the Gospel Push-cart in our issue of February 8th, we stated that it was purchased with funds "contributed entirely by the brethren at Wesley Chapel." Mr. W. R. Woodward of Wesley Chapel asks us to add to this statement that it is also owned and managed by them. As Mr. McMichael who designed the cart and others who assist in operating it are connected with both the Central Union Mission and Wesley Chapel confusion might arise, if this explanation were not given, as to which institution they represented, when they are out with the car.

A STORY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HOME

Written expressly for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XVII.

EXPIATION.

"YOU are my mother," said Dora with a joyful cry, and she put both her arms about the bowed neck, and laid her head on Marion Maple's bosom. "Oh mother, mother! love me, comfort me!"

Marion's arms held her daughter fast. "Dora, if you knew," she murmured in her ear.

"I know. God has given you back."

"What did you disappear for, and play dead?" asked Denham.

"That I might receive her forever," said Dora.

"A nice world this," mumbled Denham, "and you despised me. I had heard about your mother before ever I met you, and I traded on your inheritance from her in believing I could make a good decoy of you."

"My child, did I wrong you so much?" said Marion.

A little later Denham was in a heavy stupor. Marion and Dora sat side by side talking in softest tones. Dora was telling her mother the sad story of her life.

"O if I could thank those friends of yours on my knees—and your sister, Eloise?"

"Her story will grieve you too, and make you glad, for Eloise has learned how to rise by stepping stones of her dead self to higher things." So the story of Eloise was told.

"Eloise must come to you," said Dora, "she will think every hour a year until she sees you."

"I am afraid not," said Marion; "I have wronged her too cruelly. How can she forgive me? That you can forgive, is a miracle."

"O mother, no! And Eloise is much better than I am, she has a larger heart, she is more forgiving. Eloise will never want to be separated from you again!"

"She has the right to know that you have found me, and to see me, here, or at her own home, if she will. If God grants me the kiss of love and forgiveness from both, my daughters, I shall feel that it is an earnest of his own forgiving love. But when we have met and spoken out our hearts, my child, we must part. Years ago I took the path of expiation. Whoso puts his hand to the plough and turns back, is not fit for the kingdom of God. I know I cannot make atonement for my sins: that is Christ's work, finished I believe, for me; but long ago, when, after bitter repentance, I received forgiveness, I vowed solemnly to God, that I would spend all the rest of my life in works of charity. I took my training as a nurse, and much of my nursing is free to the poor, but I receive a considerable sum from the rich patients, which is used chiefly in work for the poor. I shall never allow myself the solace of home, I forfeited my home, long ago; I shall not comfort myself with the ministrations of my children's love, even if you are ready to grant me love. I do not deserve such happiness as other women find in their children. I forsook my children. To know that you have forgiven me; that you can think of me with kindness, will fill me with a joy I never expected to find in this world."

"And how long since you began this life?" asked Dora sadly.

"Twenty years."

"Oh, why did you not come back?"

"I had no right to come back. My presence would have desecrated my home. You two girls would have lived under the shadow of my ill doing."

"Rather, we might have been taught by a wisdom you had gained by bitter experience."

"It seemed to me not. There are some sins which are fatal and final. I thought that you would always believe me to be dead, and that even if you heard my story you would forbear to hate and despise one no longer living; and then, I hoped that when heaven had received us all, one of God's angels might take me by the hand, and lead me to you, and say, 'here is your mother, who sinned greatly and was greatly forgiven,' and you would love me for the sake of the Christ, 'who bore my sins in his own body on the tree.' God has been better to me then my highest hopes."

Again and again, in quiet hours when their patient was lying unconscious, Marion Maple talked with her child.

"It is most dangerous to marry without love. Your father married me for my little fortune, I married him for his social position. There was no love between us to smooth away the little frictions constantly arising between those living so closely together as man and wife, possessing each an individuality which directs toward different opinions and different courses of conduct. There was no tender affection between us to proffer excuses for faults, and draw a veil over defects. Our children were not bonds of love, but causes of disagreement; irritation was not disarmed but intensified, to us by seeing in the little ones, each one, traits of the other parent. I think people should not marry expecting to learn to love each other afterwards; in so close a relation displeasure increases, not decreases. Probably cold natures, that need little affection or its demonstration, or intensely occupied natures, who find full outlet for all hopes and energies in work, might find the years roll by in an indifference that was not particularly irksome. Your father was a busy man: if I had administered his home well, and reared his children wisely, I think, with occasional quarrels and some hard feelings, we should have been able to live all our lives in apparent domestic peace, if I had not failed and forsaken him."

Dora sighed: What might it have been to her and to Eloise to have had a mother's care and love?

"I was an idle woman, a society woman, a vain woman," said Marion, "I had also a loving, dependent nature. I was heart-hungry, heart-lonely. If I had not been deluded by my gay life, I might have found heart-satisfaction in my children. To me the voice of flattery seemed the voice of love. You have perhaps heard how I left you."

"After I went away—with him," glancing at the couch where Denham lay, "and fled from him, Uncle David told me in anger, and Uncle Barlow told Eloise. Until then we did not know."

"They were merciful to my memory. When did your father die? I know from your story that he is dead."

"Long ago. So long ago that I do not remember him, and Eloise remembers only a dark man, in anger and in tears, kissing and leaving us both. He died in Mexico, soon after."

A life ruined by me—and that other life was ruined by me. Remorse pursued us both. Misery seemed to dog us. He went abroad, and he began to try and find refuge in gambling, and at last, two years from the time he forsook honor for me, he died by his own hand. Why among so many sinners was I, the most sinful of all spared to repent! How dare I give myself even this hour of mother comfort in looking into your eyes, and hearing your voice!"

"God's ways are beyond our finding out," said Dora softly. "He is better to us than our fears, and in the midst of wrath remembers mercy."

Dora wrote to Eloise about their mother. "Do not come here," she said. "In a few days more or less, our duty here will be done, and then I want to bring our mother to your home, if you feel as I do, that she is our dear mother still."

The last night of the year darkened—the last hour of the year had come. Denham had been unconscious for twenty hours, and was rapidly sinking. Marion and her daughter watched the flickering out of life.

"Oh," said Dora, "if some word could be sent into that heavy ear, a word that should be seed of hope."

"It is too late," said Marion, "mortal voice shall never strike his ear again. The next sound that he hears, will be a trumpet, and the call to judgment. Lord what am I that mercy was shown to me?"

One, two, three, the strokes rung out until twelve—and as the year passed, the soul passed from the shattered body of Pierce Denham.

The next day the grave covered the destroyer of Dora Maple's peace. Only one trace remained of him, the paper he had given Dora.

"Where it belongs, who can tell," said Dora, "it is idle to burn it. It shall go to some place where destitute boys are made into better men than he was." And before she and Marion left H——, she sent to the place she had selected the last item that could connect her life with that of Pierce Denham.

One short month Marion Maple allowed herself with her children, to taste the sweetness of a tie she had once held so cheaply. How dear were those daughters now. What bitter pangs were hers, that she had madly forsaken them; and robbed herself of their baby sweetness, their childhood's purity, their gracious youth! She had left them playing babies, watching from a window a shower of snow. She found them again, when sorrows colder than the snows had fallen upon their young hearts, and made them women, heart old, while life was in its early prime.

"Never again, beloved," said Marion, "must we meet on earth. I cannot take into my life of penalty, your sweetness and your gentle smiles. We will write to each other, and those letters shall be my comfort. When I am dead, come and give me in my coffin a kiss, the seal of your forgiving love. If the hour comes when your empty hearts are filled with a woman's dearest love, and little children are on your breast, my heart will cry out after them as the dearest things that earth and time can hold for me; but I must never see their faces. That is part of my penalty. I want you never to speak to husband or child of me. There is nothing to be said, but is better left unsaid. Perhaps in heaven, where all tears are wiped from our eyes, I shall see the faces I cannot look into here. To all who knew me long ago I am dead, let me still remain as one dead."

The snowy gusts of February were flying in the raw, chilly air, when the three women parted. Marion Maple returned to her self-appointed tasks; her solace now to sooth the pain and sorrow she found along the path in life.

Eloise remained to sit beside the hearth where she had gathered for herself a family of daughters and sons, "for more are the children of the desolate than of her that is a married wife, saith the Lord."

Dora went back to her place. And there, when two years more had passed away, she gave her hand to Tom McGregor with her heart.

"The heart of her husband shall safely trust in her, Philippa," said the Chief to his daughter. "She has proved faithful and strong, she has endured and conquered. The folly of her youth was the result of careless training, of neglect of guardianship. Her maturer judgment has disallowed her past. If anywhere in this wide world the mother who forsook her duty, still lives to love and long for her abandoned child, I wish the good Lord could send her the comfort of knowing what her daughter is, and has this day."

"Mr. Cardiff!" interposed his wife. "Why do you persist in talking of disgraceful scandals to the child? Her ears ought not to be polluted by such stories."

"Be sure, Philippa," the Chief went on, paying no heed to the remonstrance, "that in all these years the cries of her forsaken children have rung in that unhappy woman's ears, and she has felt their little hands tugging at her heart-strings. That has been her heaviest penalty."

"Mr. Cardiff! Philippa! Consider Philippa!"

"I do consider Philippa. She is human. Humanity is open to errors. I have always set before her examples of good and examples that are warnings against evil. Philippa, if ever you fail in your duty to God or to humanity, you will fail wilfully, having come to a knowledge of the truth. I have warned you well. I expect you to exhibit the ideal wife and mother—in other words—the ideal woman."

"O, Mr. Cardiff! Philippa!"

Yes, Philippa. What shall we say for John Cardiff's daughter?

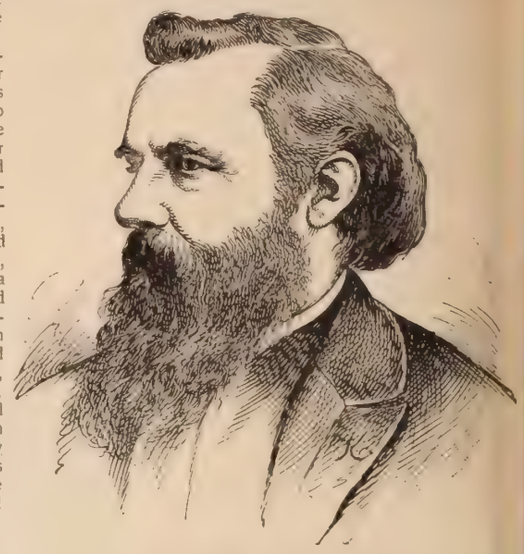
The woods shall wear their robes of green,
The south winds softly sigh,
An I sweet calm days, in golden haze
Melt down the amber sky

THE END

OUR NEW SERIAL STORY.

The Late Rev. J. Jackson Wray's Great Tale, "Brave Barbara," to begin next week.

FEW writers for the religious press, in the present day, attained so wide a popularity as the late Rev. J. Jackson Wray, whose delightful serials have from time to time appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Many of our readers will recall with pleasure his stories "Old Crusty's Niece" and "The Friends of Aspendale," which were published in these columns several years ago and met with high appreciation.



THE LATE REV. J. JACKSON WRAY.

The last complete work from Mr. Wray's gifted pen—"Brave Barbara, the Story of an Old Bible"—is one of surpassing interest, and deals with Christian life and experience on two Continents. It will begin in the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we do not doubt that our readers will find it to be all we have claimed for it. It reflects much of the pure lofty spirit and bright, cheerful Christianity of the author, whose wide experience of human character, in all its varied phases, is apparent in every chapter and line. Mr. Wray wrote for the home and the heart, and the characteristic simplicity and naturalness of his stories are among their chief charms. He has been a prolific writer on home and social topics, and as he sometime ago stated in an autobiographical sketch: "Most of my leading characters are living portraits and the principal events and 'situations' described have their basis in actual fact. They are, every one of them, 'stories with a purpose.' In 'Brave Barbara,' I have the same high object in view, and I would fain believe that herein, more than ever before, I have succeeded in bearing effective witness to 'the truth as it is in Jesus' in teaching that the Bible is the beacon-sent and infinitely precious guide to faith and conduct. 'Brave Barbara' is a historic characrer, and her story is that of a once living heroine, one of the vast number of those who have been and are the glory of the Church through all the centuries."

We give on this page a portrait of the author of "Brave Barbara." His recent death was a distinct loss to English Methodism. He was the pastor of Whitefield's Tabernacle in London, where crowds of workingmen used to throng the famous building to listen to his earnest and dramatic sermons. During his sixty years of life, he had a very varied experience. His first calling was that of a village carpenter in Yorkshire, as assistant to his father. After a few years he managed to secure a term in college. He then became a school-teacher at Madeley, where he built up a famous school. While engaged in this work he was converted, and resigned his office to become a minister. He served in several circuits with success; but the Methodist Conference needed a capable superintendent for a school of native teachers at Sierra Leone, Africa, and urged Mr. Wray to undertake the duty, which he did. The deadly climate prostrated him, and after reorganizing and systematizing the school, he returned home, and was soon again active in the pulpit.

He was the organizer and conductor of a great philanthropic work in London. A tireless worker, he astonished all who knew him by his apparently unlimited capacity for preaching, lecturing and writing, and in all his message was the same: Christ was held up as the Way to happiness here and to the life eternal.

IN HEATHEN COREA.

Dr Hall Writes of His Experiences as Teacher and Healer—The Solitary Christian in a Heathen City—A Primitive Cuisine.

THE following interesting letter has just been received from Dr. W. J. Hall, who is well known to many of our readers through his Christian work in New York while studying medicine under Dr. Dowkontt, and whose early labors as a medical missionary in far-away Corea have been described in his former letters published in this journal:

DR. W. J. HALL.

SEOUL KOREA, DEC. 16, 1892.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

At our annual meeting in August I was appointed to the Pyong Yang Circuit, which includes the territory from Seoul to Pyong Yang, a distance of 180 miles. We loaded our little pack ponies with drugs and books, and started on our tiresome journey over rough roads, fording streams and climbing mountains. I have the privilege of being the first missionary appointed to exclusive work in the interior. I praise God for the privilege of carrying the Gospel to those who have never heard of it before. My work is entirely pioneer work. On the 30th of September I entered the city of Pyong Yang. As I passed through the streets, throngs of Coreans gathered to see the foreigner. After wending my way through several streets I came to an inn, and was given a room eight feet square, the front door of which opened into the street, the back door into the yard, where the horses, pigs, cattle and poultry are kept. There were no windows, and the only light that entered the room came through the paper which was pasted over the lattice-work of the door. This little room, with its mud walls and floor, was my consulting room, dining and bedroom. Here I saw all my patients, dispensed my medicines, and sold my books. Each day, long before the hour appointed for opening the dispensary, the street was thronged with patients. The street answered as a waiting-room, and one by one I saw the patients in my little room. How much we need a suitable building for carrying on our work! One which could be used for a hospital, dispensary, book room and chapel. But we are trusting God to open our way, and we know he will supply all our needs.

A NOBLE'S HOUSE IN COREA.

(By permission of Charles Scribner's Sons.)

The people have shown me great kindness, and only once have I received anything like rough treatment, and the same might occur by the rabble in any of our large cities in the home land. One evening, one of the fishermen took me out for a row on the beautiful river that flows along the outside of the city wall. We had just got out into the deep water, when showers of stones came from behind the wall and fell all around us. If one had struck us or the frail fishing skiff, serious results might have followed. But providence protected us, and we pulled as rapidly as possible over to the other side of the river.

Our medical work brings us into great favor with the natives, and gives us an opportunity for preaching the Gospel and selling our Christian books to many that we could not otherwise reach.

One day I was called to see a boy who was suffering from dysentery. He had been ill for several days, and was rapidly growing worse. I left him some medicine and came away. The following morning I was sent for in great haste, with the message that the boy was dying. I hastened to the house, and found him very low. The mother was the widow of a Corean doctor. She told me if I cured her son she would give him to me as my slave, as she was very poor and had nothing else to give. I told her I would do all I could for her boy without expecting anything for it. I then told her why I had come to Corea to give my life for her people. I told her of God, heaven and the glad story of salvation; that I was praying for her boy, that God had the power to bless the medicines and restore him to health. God answered our prayer, and the family are now diligent searchers after the truth. The Holy Spirit has gone before us and prepared the soil to receive the precious seed, and will cause it to spring up and yield an abundant harvest.

Ye cannot toil in vain.
Cold, heat, and moist, and dry,
Shall foster and mature the grain,
For garners in the sky.

I have been invited out to dinner several times by the natives and they do all in their power to show their friendship and make it pleasant for me. I live upon native food almost entirely. But a person gets tired of rice three times a day so to-day I thought I would like some pan-cakes but I could not obtain any flour. I bought two measures of buckwheat and took it to the hotel mill to be ground. The mill is the same as is referred to in Scripture and consists of two round stones about fifteen inches in diameter and two inches thick. A hole is drilled in the centre of each stone and a wooden pivot inserted which serves as an axle. Another hole is drilled near the outer edge of the upper stone for the wooden handle, and still another hole is drilled a short distance from the centre in which the grain is dropped. I got a couple of boys to turn the stone and after they had been grinding half a day and sifting the flour through a sieve made from horse hair woven together, I had ten pounds of flour. I had some baking powder with me and very soon I had the mixture ready to fry. I had a fire made from cornstalks and upon this I cooked my cakes. I enjoyed them most heartily and I will be able to have them often. I am the only foreigner in this dark heathen city, and yet amid all these uncongenial surroundings I am happy. "Jesus all the day long is my joy and my song, Oh that all his salvation might see." I look forward to that glad day when in this land "Jesus shall see the travail of his soul and be satisfied." I am proving his power to keep no matter what our surroundings are.

Last spring when I first visited Pyong Yang an edict was issued prohibiting under penalty the buying of superstitious books, after which we were unable to sell any of our books. This fall I have sold over six hundred copies of Christian books without the slightest opposition. The people appear to be anxious to buy and read our books. They are manifesting a deep interest in Christianity and we are looking for glorious results. God is wonderfully opening up our way, for which we praise him and ascribe to him all the glory.

We feel deeply grateful to the many friends in the home land who are bearing us up with their prayers and helping us in this glorious work of carrying the Gospel to the "regions beyond." Yours sincerely, W. J. HALL, M.D.

COULD VOUCH FOR HIS FATHER.

A SHIP was approaching a dangerous coast about sunset, and there was a haze on the water. The captain slackened speed, and was watching for the appearance of a certain light to make him quite sure of his position. Said one of the passengers, "Suppose the lighthouse keeper should forget to light his lamp?" "We can't suppose any such thing," said the captain. "I know John Briggs, the man who lives at that lighthouse, and he is sure to light his lamp." "Ay, that he will," echoed a voice at the captain's elbow—a boy's voice. All at once the light flashed clearly out across the water, and the captain exclaimed, "There! I told you," and the boy put in eagerly, "Please, sir, John Briggs is my father." Sometimes God's children are not so ready as this boy to declare their confidence in their heavenly Father when the question is raised about the certainty of his keeping his promises, though they have infinitely stronger ground for faith.

A Mother's Story

"When my boy was 2 1-2 years of age, a fall brought on hip disease, which gradually grew worse until, when he was 6, he could not walk, and we had him treated 9 months at the Children's Hospital in Boston. But when he came home he was worse, and the doctors said nothing could be done. I began giving him Hood's Sarsaparilla and he improved at once. The 14 abscesses on his hip healed up, his appetite improved and he could walk, at first with crutches, then without. He is now perfectly well, lively as any boy." MRS. EMMA V. Pagan Views of Death. *

IN Jesus Christ life is a new creation, and so is death. He has thrown the light of his example upon the grave because his sacred body was rested within its mysterious portals. To us, with Christian faith to enlighten us, it should never be what death was to the Pagan, with his dim apprehension of the world of shadows. Homer, in the eleventh book of the Odyssey, and Virgil, in the sixth book of the Eneid, conducted their heroes to the unseen world; but at best, it was a shadowy world, or, at worst, a gloomy world, with the dark Stygian lake, with Phlegethon, the river of fire, and Lethe, the river of forgetfulness.

But the Elysian fields and Tartarus—the "isles of the blest" and the place of torment—obtained only a slight and mythic hold upon the popular mind. Belief in the future life had shriveled into "a slight perhaps" in the days before the advent of Christ. The divine Plato "who almost touched the gates of Paradise," gives the fairest rays of hope in the Phaedo and the Gorgias, and Socrates quits the world with almost a Christian hope upon his lips. Tacitus did not venture beyond his "if, indeed, there is any place for the spirits of the pious, if, as the wise imagine, the souls of the great are not extinguished with their bodies."

Cicero expresses a hope, but stammeringly, like a modern agnostic: "If in this I am mistaken, because I believe the spirits of men to be immortal, sadly am I mistaken." Sallust writes that "Cæsar urged torture rather than death upon traitors, as death had lost its restraining force, men ceasing to look for anything after death." With these dim, intangible views of another life, it need not surprise us that men met death with horror and dread, or some few of the nobler sort, like Cato and Seneca, with the calm despair of stoicism. The former spent his last hours in thinking of the illustrious men of the past, and the latter, when Nero's messengers came to his old tutor, in composing some of the noblest passages of stoic philosophy. But to the great mass of men, death was an unparalleled catastrophe—"simply this and nothing more."

Does some of this terrified spirit of a hopeless Paganism linger among us, whose privilege it is to live in the climate of a better hope? It sometimes appears so, when we see the dread with which many Christians look upon the article of dying, and the loss of sustaining hope with which they regard the condition of their loved ones who have passed into the great mystery. We are recreant to our noblest heritage when we regard death in the light of merely natural and human feeling. By a miracle of love we are placed at a new point of view. If we believe the Scriptures—and this is written for those who do believe them heartily and earnestly—then both and death, both the solemn joy of living a the saddening thought of dying, are to be r garded in the light of Christian revelation.

THE MESSAGE OF THE PREACHER.†

This man has a message to deliver from and in the name of the Father of all—a paternal message for the unfortunate, for the miserable, for the weary, for the sin-laden and no less one for the favored, the gay, the revellers in the possession of this world's bounties, who need it less than those, or think so. His message is for everybody his words can reach, in form and in any language—a message simple, clear, unmistakable, and delivered with the consummate force of rhetoric absolutely natural to the messenger. Dr. Talmage in the pulpit is a voice intent only upon telling his message in the straightest and most effective way; but never preacher more variously interesting, nor more captivating, because of the striking originality of his powers. All that he knows, sees, and experiences utilized as material to support his purpose to teach the cardinal truths of the Christian religion in the [illegible] classic [illegible] by a [illegible] tion and reference, and his original strength as an orator "born, not made" is increased with the wealth of his growing knowledge and the deep impression wrought by his comprehensive interest in human nature and affairs. His materials are disposed with the strong hand of the master genius. The utterances of the man cannot be judged of properly by an artificial standard: they must be taken as they are—wondrously diversified and unequal, such as only their author can speak, and while never failing of his purpose to convey his meaning both exactly and with power, presenting to the admiration of the most exacting critic specimens not a few of the highest art in expression, the more appreciated because so obviously spontaneous and unconscious.

THE FIGHT FOR LIFE.*

ROLAND had always had strong republican sentiments and sympathies, and humanitarian instincts were still stronger in him than were local or traditional attachments and associations. He stuck to his post, till he had saved enough to supply his own simple needs for a year or two, and then set off on a rapid trip to those portions of the Old World which, from his childhood, he had most longed to see.

There, besides the old quaint cities and ruins, around which a thousand literary and historical associations clustered like the ivy which clothed them, and the glorious mountain scenery of which as a boy he had so often dreamed, he had found in his wanderings another subject of deep interest. This was the condition of those "forgotten millions," of which he had read so much of late. Here, as in other cases, he found all his conceptions fall far short of what he actually beheld—men, women and children, pent up in rank and wretched slums, fighting with gaunt famine for a miserable existence. He saw them, at early morning, searching heaps of rubbish for a few crusts, only too eagerly devoured. He saw young girls, forced to still more revolting means of procuring daily bread—means that dragged them rapidly down to worse than physical death. He saw young children, with haggard, unchildlike faces, and most unchildlike sharpness and callous greed, born of the premature "struggle for existence," that was written on their pinched young features.

He saw human beings who had not, literally, "where to lay their heads," glad to throw themselves down on the damp grass of city parks, yet driven from thence, and every other resting-place, by the relentless order to "move on!" He knew that, of these multitudes, fighting hand to hand with starvation, many could not, by any effort, secure remunerative work. For these, there seemed nothing but despair and death, on an earth which could no longer make good for them the promise—"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." For them, alas! there was neither work nor bread.

The sights he then saw buried themselves in his heart and brain forever. And, side by side with all this misery, he saw gorgeous displays of wealth and luxury, such as he had scarcely thought possible, outside of the "Arabian Nights;" evidences of idle abandon to voluptuous pleasure—of unblushing and reckless extravagance—until he wondered how it could be that a just and over-ruling Providence should not interfere, how it was that the earth did not open up to swallow these selfish cumberers of the ground. It was the old problem which perplexed the righteous soul of Job in the dawn of history—which had perplexed many a moralist and driven to despair many a bewildered enthusiast in all the ages. But if anything had been needed to intensify in him the "enthusiasm of humanity," the passion for reform; to grave on his heart the resolve to "open his mouth for the dumb, in the cause of all such that are left desolate," it was what he then saw of the hopeless, inarticulate hardship and misery, which rarely finds expression in speeches or pamphlets, but sometimes does find it, at last, in strikes and catastrophes! A little, too, he saw, of that underlying social dynamite, and felt to his heart's core the gravity of the situation. It was, therefore, with no room in his mind for trifling, and little for selfish aims, that Roland Graeme returned from abroad to take up the work of his life.

A TALENTED ANGLO AFRICAN.†

MRS. HARPER, since emancipation, has labored in every Southern State in the Union, save two, Arkansas and Texas; in the colleges, schools, churches, and the cabins not excepted, she has found a vast field and open doors to teach and speak on themes of education, temperance, and good home building, industry, morality, and the like, and never lacked for evidences of hearty appreciation and gratitude.

The previous books from her pen, which have been so very widely circulated and admired, North and South—"Forest Leaves," "Miscellaneous Poems," "Moses, a Story of the Nile," "Poems," and "Sketches of Southern Life" will be eclipsed by this last effort, which will, in all probability, be the crowning effort of her long and valuable services in the cause of humanity.

While, as indicated, Mrs. Harper has done a large amount of work in the South, she has at the same time done much active service in the temperance cause in the North, as thousands of this class can testify.

Before the war she was engaged as a speaker by anti-slavery associations; since then, by appointment of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, she has held the office of "Superintendent of Colored Work" for years. She has also held the office of one of the Directors of the Women's Congress of the United States.

Under the auspices of these influential, earnest, and intelligent associations, she has been seen often on their platforms with the leading lady orators of the nation.

Aunt Liefy's Confession.*

ALL my neighbors had posy gardens, and most of 'em had flowers in the house too; but I never thought of sech a thing. What was the use of it? I went to meetin' sometimes; because—well, I don't seem to rec'lect why I did go, bur I did. But it didn't int'rest me, and I didn't take no great notice of what went on. That it meant much of anything to me, myself, never come into my head in those days.

It was in the fall of the year, early in October, and as I could tell from what came afterwards, the trees all along the way was red and yeller and bright-lookin', and I was steppin' on leaves colored the same way; but I didn't seem to see 'em. The fust thing that stands out, as I look back now, was hearin' a man speakin'. He was in a buggy; but I hadn't noticed the sound of wheels, and he was close up to me comin' down the road facin' me, as if he was on the way to the station I'd come from, 'fore I see him. He drawed up right alongside of me. He was an oldish man, with a pleasant-lookin' kind of face, only a mite solemn and sorry like, and he says, "I'm so glad you've got here. They've waited, thinkin' you might be on this train. I'm goin' on tell the minister, or I'd give you a lift; but some one'll meet you."

And then, 'fore I'd had time to say anything, he says, in a low sort of voice, "I'm dreadful sorry for you; we all be." And then he started his horse and rode away. It seems odd now that I didn't wonder more about what he meant, or ask him somethin,' or call after him that I guessed he'd made a mistake. But, if you'll believe me, all I could think of in that fust minute was that somebody was waitin' for me and expectin' me; somebody was glad I'd come; and, 'bove and over all, somebody was dreadful sorry for me. Not one of them things, 's fur 's I know, had ever happened to me afore, and though I made sure 't was all a mistake, somehow jest for a minute I had the comfortablest feeling I'd ever had in my life.

"They've mistook me for somebody else," I says to myself; "but I can't help likin' it, and I won't tell 'em jest for a spell. It feels so good to be looked at that way, I'll wait a minute 'fore I tell 'em." Mebbe I didn't put it into jest them words, but I was thinkin' somethin' most like that, I know. * * * * Bimeby I see a little white house ahead and a good many men-folks standin' round it.

Two or three men came out to the carriage, plain, farmer-lookin' men, with kind of tanned, weather-beat faces, but all with the same sort of sorry look, and I see they was goin' to help me out. I'd jest been a goin' to tell 'em who I was and how 't was all a mistake; but for the life of me I could n't then.'

Well, the fun'ral begun and went on. I disremember whether or no I'd ever been to a fun'ral afore; but I'd seen 'em go by, of course, and thought I knew all about 'em. But this was n't a bit like what I'd conceited. And when it was over, they all come round me, jest me; the women, the men, the children, and ev'ry one had somethin' to say about her that was gone, and what she'd been to 'em all, what she was to me and me to her. They see I was givin' way, and one after 'nother begun to tell me things she'd said about me, word she'd sent to me. "She said she'd be watchin' for you till you come," says one, most in a whisper. And then the old minister, he kind o' drawed me to one side and he says,

"She asked me over and over, afore she died, to tell you this, that she forgive you everythin', if there was anythin' to forgive." * *

I can't hardly rec'lect how I got away from 'em all, and from that grave and the little buryin'-ground, and found my way back to the station. You asked me to tell you how 't was I changed about so, as folks told you I done,—from a lonesome, unfeelin', unreligious woman, not havin' a mite of int'rest in anybody, nor them havin' any in me, to somethin' diff'ent. And I've told you all I know about what fetched about the change. * * * *

I never knew anythin' more about that fun'ral, nor the one we buried that day, nor what I was to her nor her to me. I was afraid to find out, so I never asked any questions, nor went back to that station, nor looked in the papers to see who was dead there. Small credit to me that it fetched me some good, and made me alter my old, hateful ways. For it stands to reas'n that havin' a sorrer myself—and 't was one, though mebbe you can't see how—made me notice other folks's troubles and feel for 'em and try to help 'em, as I was helped.

MORAVIANS IN QUEENSLAND.

ZEAL for the conversion of the heathen has always been a characteristic of the the Moravian Church. No other denomination has made so great sacrifices in that cause or been so greatly blessed in proportion to its numbers. One instance appears in the current number of the Moravian Quarterly, which illustrates the supreme devotion of the missionaries. It relates to the station in North Queensland, and a truly graphic narrative it gives of the hardships of pioneer work in this land, where the heat is intense, and flies and mosquitoes are a constant plague. Recent letters tell of a fierce quarrel in the native camp, where Mr. Ward, one of the missionaries, stayed bloodshed and secured peace by fearlessly placing himself between the armed and infuriated combatants. That his good wife is anxious when he goes down to the camp on such an errand, can well be imagined. Mr. Hey, another missionary, has broken down in health, and he remained alone for a time awaiting the arrival of his mission comrades. On the bare ground, listening to the continuous howling of the treacherous savages, who had only two months before killed and eaten two white men at this very place, he yet remained at Cullen Point speaking to all who came near him, of Christ and his salvation. Mrs. Ward writes to an old fellow teacher in England: "I wish you could see the people as I saw them on the day of my arrival. There were about eighty women and girls sitting in a semicircle, utter savages, with no vestige of intelligence or modesty. Such a spectacle! Many of them full of sores, one old woman blind, one with cancer. My dear old friend, I cannot tell you how miserable I felt, and I was tempted to wish myself back at home again. But we stay on in faith. Christ has won greater victories than even this, that as yet seems too much to hope for."

A MIRACLE.

I SEE no miracle in Christ's advent,
It is not mythical in that 'tis old;
But I see grandeur in this sweet intent,
Of love that bears with sin so manifold:
I see the largess our Creator gives [lives.
To world's unnumbered and each thing that

I should have marvelled had there been no sign
Of his great purpose given unto man,
No explanation of his love divine [plan:
That runs, a golden thread, through all the 'Twould have been wondrous had there been no chord
Of revelation from the Lord.

But one thing must forever be to me
Most wonderful, beyond all things of time,
That there should be such light and man not see
In nature's mirror, burnished and sublime,
A Maker's image and a Father's care—
A refuge from the world and from despair.

O scientist, philosopher and sage!
This is the strangest paradox of all—
Beyond expression that from age to age,
Love should endure, yet few accept the call:
And God keeps loving on year after year;
Who seeks a miracle may find it here.

Questions Answered

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A CARD FROM DR. TALMAGE.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 9, 1893.

To whom it may concern:

I receive hundreds of letters making inquiries of me concerning the Tanquerey Portrait Society, the Brooklyn Art Union, and other portrait concerns, who in their advertisements and circulars use my name among their references. I have no knowledge whatever of any of these establishments, and therefore do not know how good or bad their business methods may be. I most emphatically decline any responsibility whatever in this matter, and any use of my name in this connection is altogether unauthorized.

T. DEWITT TALMAGE.

James Archer, Stanton, Miss., writes, asking us to acknowledge the papers sent to him by many unknown friends who, in response to his brief request in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 19, so bounteously supplied his wants. He writes: "I received papers from California, Florida, Pennsylvania, Maine, Michigan, Massachusetts, New Jersey and South Carolina." Mr. Archer was a graduate of Yale, Class of 1830, and in other days was a wealthy planter and slave-holder. Now, though poor and 82 years of age, he takes a fatherly interest in the welfare, both temporal and spiritual, of his former slaves and their posterity, of whom there are about one hundred. Do not let the supply of papers cease.

H. M. Betts, Fairmont, Minn. Is it my duty to forgive one who has slandered my good name and good character, when he does not ask for forgiveness and does not want it?

Yes; it is your duty to forgive him in any event. Our Lord's teaching's abounds in passages supporting this. (See Mark 11: 25–26; Luke 23: 34; II. Cor. 2: 5, 6, 7.)

Constant Reader, New York. Is there any passage in the New Testament in which the Saviour is styled "dear Lord," "Sweet Saviour," or any such familiar term?

Paul speaks of him as God's dear Son (Col. 1: 13). We do not know of any other passage in which the epithet is applied to him, and in that instance it refers to the relation between the Father and the Son, not to that between men and Christ. Nevertheless, the relation of Christ to his people is so near and so tender, that there can be no impropriety in their so addressing him.

C. Clarke, Brooklyn, N. Y. What is the meaning of there ference in 1. Peter, 3:19,20, to Christ preaching to the spirits in prison, who were disobedient in the days of Noah? Did Christ go to the lower world to preach to them during the time his body lay in the grave, between the crucifixion and the resurrection?

The latter theory has been held by many eminent men, but the most learned expositors, from Augustine, among the Fathers, to Meyer in our day, reject it. They believe that the passage means that Christ by his Spirit preached in the days of Noah to the men who are now spirits in the prison. As a minister might say, referring to a criminal in prison, "I have preached to that man in prison," meaning that the man had been one of his hearers in some past time.

Mrs. Geo. B. Kemp, Jersey City. What truth is there in the story that a prophet of the living God had come to Ireland [illegible] converted the Druids to the worship of God; that is supposed to have been the Prophet Jeremiah, and that in a tomb at Tara, said to be his, the Ark and other treasures from the Temple may be found?

Some such legend as that which relates to the conversion of the Druids to the worship of the Supreme Being is mentioned in ancient writings, but the basis for such statements is exceedingly doubtful. The Druids are believed to have been of Phœnician origin and to have worshiped a Supreme God as Creator and Ruler. (It is known that from the very earliest times, the Phœnicians traded with the British Isles for tin.) To this was added the belief in a future state and in rewards and punishments. In addition, they had a number of lesser divinities, corresponding to those of the Greeks. Various authors have connected the Druids with the Persians, the Hindoos and the Egyptians. There is no evidence that Jeremiah ever visited [illegible]

M. Barton, Schoharie, N. Y. What is the estimate [illegible] of the universe?

It is beyond computation. They estimate [illegible] that the [illegible] penetrate the stellar depths beyond. The naked eye can discern thousands of stars on a clear night, and the telescope can multiply these again by many thousands. Our system is one of many systems, all moving in perfect accord. The "Milky Way" is roughly computated to have 30,000,000 stars each with many planets encircling it; but there are still other equally vast "Milky Ways," which our strongest glasses only discover as indistinct haze. There are millions upon millions of suns, stars, planets and other heavenly bodies beyond the utmost reach of science.

W. E. Hoffrogge, Buffalo, N. Y. (1) To what denomination does Dr. Talmage belong? (2) What was the thorn in the flesh that Paul speaks of, II Corinthians, 12: 7?

1. Dr. Talmage is a Presbyterian. 2. As we are not told explicitly what affection Paul referred to as a thorn in the flesh, any explanation given must be mere conjecture. The most probable and the most common opinion is that it was a painful affection of the eyes, which was prevalent in Oriental lands. The guess is based on the fact of his saying that if it had been possible, the Galatians would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him (Gal. 4: 15), as if the need of better eyes were his most urgent want. Also, on the fact of his usually employing an amanuensis and his calling attention (Gal. 6: 11) to his having written with his own hand, as if his doing so were remarkable.

R. Lewis, Trenton, N. J. As Christ does not appear to have been more than forty hours in the tomb, how is Matt. 12: 40 to be explained? In that passage he says that he will be three days and three nights in the earth.

The passage has long perplexed Biblical students. The most probable explanation is that Christ adopted a mode of expression common among the Jews, and said that he should be in the grave three "evening-mornings," which the translators rendered three days and nights. The Jews also had a rule, of which there are several examples in other parts of the Bible, that any part of the onah, or period, counted as the whole. Thus the interval between the crucifixion and the burial on the Friday would be part of Friday, and would count as one "evening-morning;" from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday would count as the second; and from Saturday sunset to the resurrection on Sunday morning as the third. The disciples evidently regarded the Sunday as the third day, as you will see by the conversation on the way to Emmans, when Cleopas said: "This is the third day since these things were done (Luke, 24: 21).

J. C. Turner, Pineville, Ky. Noah's ark has not been found. There are no materials in the Bible or elsewhere for an opinion as to the lengths of the periods you mention.—Mrs. J. F. Langley, Drakesboro, Ky. The text is part of the exhortation to a king, and he is told that he should abstain, lest he do mischief to his people. Let him leave such stimulants for people who are ready to perish and want to forget their misery.—"A Subscriber." There is no sin in first cousins marrying. The objections to the marriage of persons so nearly related are based on physiological theories.—S. A. Smith, Milledgeville, Ill. The question is of no moment. Every man should follow the dictates of his own conscience. The essential question does not relate to forms and ceremonies and ordinances, but to regeneration. See Galatians, 5: 6.—Wm. Hatch, Forby, Iowa. No useful purpose would be served by printing your questions. Our answer, on Jan. 25, gives all the information accessible. This column is not intended for controversy. Dr. MacArthur is of Scottish descent.—Thomas Heim, Lutesville, Mo. We have had no special revelation, and therefore know no more than is stated in the Bible (Matt. 4: 6).—Rollo B. Wood, East Smithfield, Pa. Probably the Gentiles, although some have thought that the words convey an intimation of other worlds being inhabited.—J. S. Wolf, Wakeeney, Kans. There is no Biblical statement to that effect. It is an inference from the fossil remains which have been found.

SOMETHING FOR JESUS.

YOU ought to do something for Jesus—
You ought to do something to-day;
If you can give help to the needy,
Why should you one moment delay?

There are homes to be made for the homeless,
And comforts to bring to the lives
Of hungry and cold little children,
Neglected and heart-broken wives.

The "pestilence walketh in darkness,
Destruction is wasting at noon;"
And souls will be wrecked in life's tempest
Unless you can rescue them soon.

There are "sick and in prison" to visit,
Little feet to be guided to God; [cast,
Kind words and kind deeds scattered broad-
And sorrowful paths to be trod.

There are lives to be lived in sweet patience,
Great burdens in silence to bear,
And tiresome, monotonous duties
To be consecrated by prayer.

The Gospel must go to all nations;
There's sowing and reaping to do,
And fields that are white unto harvest
Have laborers feeble and few.

You ought to do something for Jesus—
And quickly, ere daylight grows dim;
Your Saviour has died to redeem you—
Oh, won't you do something for him?

—CARRIE ELLIS BRECK.

The Site of the Sepulchre.

Rev. A. Ben-Oliel Learnedly Discusses a Most Important Subject—Is the "Gordon Tomb" after all, a Mistaken Identification?

UT no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." So it is written. (Deut. 34: 6), of the tomb of Moses, the Lord's servant. God, who knows the tendencies and promptings of the human heart, in infinite wisdom ordered it so that the exact spot of his servant's burial should be hid and concealed, and thereby shielded and protected from superscriptions and idolatrous practices. And when we read (II. Kings 18: 4), what was done with the brazen serpent that was lifted up in the wilderness up to the days of Hezekiah, we can easily imagine what the Israelites would have most probably done with their Lawgiver's tomb, had the exact spot been known.

Arguing from perfectly legitimate analogy, one would naturally expect that, if God took special care that the sepulchre of his servant Moses should be unknown, he would also most assuredly likewise conceal the precise spot wherein the body of the Lord Jesus—"the Son over his own house" (Heb. 3: 5, 6)—rested, from the Friday afternoon till the Sunday morning—the resurrection morn—the morrow after the Sabbath, when the first-fruits were waved before the Lord in the temple—emblems of him who rose from the grave, "the first-fruits of them that slept." (I. Cor. 15: 20.) And such, I firmly believe, is precisely the fact, for the reason I shall adduce.

Where Was the Sepulchre?

The synoptic Gospels are silent as to the locality of the sepulchre. But St. John (chap. 41, 42), says: "Now, in the place"—not, surely, on Golgotha itself! but in the locality, the suburb, that part outside the walls—it were absurd to suppose that any garden covered the Place of Stoning and public execution, and more than absurd to imagine that it was a private garden; that, too, the property of such an influential and wealthy man as Joseph of Arimathea. "Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre." It is not stated on which side of Golgotha, whether North or South, East or West, nor at what distance, the garden was situated, but only that it was "nigh at hand," a very indefinite term.

To the southwest of Golgotha there is a plot of level land now belonging to a mercantile firm that speculates in lands, not a garden at all, for a great part of the surface—that nearest to Golgotha—is occupied by a large cistern, and it is only further off that there are a few trees. In this plot of land, and under the extreme declivity of Golgotha, a cave cut in the rock was discovered some thirty years ago, and found full of human bones. Inside it are three tombs, two of adult size, and one smaller. When I first visited this misnamed garden, knowing it was for sale, I felt a strong desire to purchase it, and set up a tent, or build a small hall, for occasional religious services of an afternoon, mainly on account of its proximity to Golgotha the Kranion-like mound; and I must confess, from a lingering hope that the rock-cut cave might possibly be the holy Sepulchre. One strong objection I felt, and that was, that it was not a single tomb, but three close together. At a subsequent visit, I realized that the opening to it is far too large for any one man, aye, for any twenty men, to roll a stone to close the entrance to it. Such a stone could not be found ready made at hand; and there is no indication whatever, that such a stone could be rolled in front of it.

Lately, my friend Mr. R. Scott Moncrieff, of Edinburgh, the great benefactor of the distressed Jewish exiles from Russia both at Jaffa and here in Jerusalem—printed and circulated a leaflet pleading for money—£6,000($30,000—) to purchase this plot of land with its cave and turn it into a real garden, on the supposition—a mere supposition, he candidly avows—that it may possibly be of Joseph in which "he had hewn out in the rock his own new tomb." (Matt. 27: 60.) I have since heard that a lady in England has already collected or received £1500 ($7,500), for this purpose. The project for the purchase of this plot of land and cave has appeared in the religious press, and good Dr. Talmage of New York City, has fully discussed the pros and cons in an illustrated article—a deeply interesting and learned article, now before me—in his CHRISTIAN HERALD of November last, with an evident leaning in favor of the purchase. This has naturally led me to visit the place once and again, and to carefully consider the probabilities of the case with a great desire to find evidences of identity with the holy sepulchre, wherein the Lord's body was laid by the loving hands of that devoted secret disciple, Joseph of Arimathea, assisted by that other secret disciple, Nicodemus.

Last Spring my Hebrew brother, Dr. F. Leon Cachet, Foreign Secretary of the Dutch Reformed Missionary Society, was here on his way back from visiting their mission stations in the far East. We visited together Golgotha and the garden and and I told him of the opinions held regarding that sepulchral cave, etc., when in solemn tones, he addressed me somewhat to this effect: "Brother, can you really think that Joseph of Arimathea, the rich man, member of the Sanhedrim, so powerfully influential that Pilate yielded so readily to his request, and gave him the body of the Lord Jesus for decent interment, would select a spot so close to a polluted, unholy and ignominious place as this of the stoning and execution and burial of criminals, real or assumed, in which to excavate a tomb for himself when he could easily secure the holiest site anywhere all around Jerusalem? Is it possible, imaginable, that such a man would prefer to be buried there?" The force, the overwhelmingly conclusive force of this objection silenced me completely, and the more I consider it from a Hebrew's point of view, the more convinced I feel of the utter incredibility that the holy sepulchre could be in touch of a place so defiled.

But, then, St. John says, "it was nigh at hand." Yes; and nigh at hand are the declivities of the Kedron, the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, and not much further off those of Olivet, and ten to twenty minutes walking distance would still be nigh at hand. But it is not necessary to go so far as that. The garden with its newly-hewn tomb may have been nearer, provided it was not in immediate contact with ignominious, unholy Golgotha. If the mound is Golgotha, and of this, I have

Not the Smallest Doubt,

Joseph's garden and tomb must not be sought in immediate proximity, much less in contact with Golgotha; and, therefore the so-called "Garden of Calvary" of Mr. Scott Moncrieff's leaflet connot possibly be the genuine garden and tomb.

It is with great reluctance, but under a deep sense of solemn duty, that I utter anything that would, or might, thwart the project of Mr. Scott Moncrieff, favored as it is by such an array of respectable names. I lay no claim to any special archæological or antiquarian talents; but common-sense, tells me that Dr. Cachet's shrewd objection is overwhelmingly conclusive. It completely dispelled my illusion regarding that particular tomb.

Here am I, pleading hard for means whereby to rear up "a house of prayer" for Presbyterians and Wesleyans, Congregationalists and Baptists, Friends and Brethren, these last twelve months, or longer and the responses up to this date do not much exceed £100—($500). At present none of those evangelical churches possess a single inch of land for the service of the Lord Jesus, in the city which witnessed his agony and death, his resurrection and ascension.

The chief Rabbi of Jerusalem lately departed this life, highly venerated, and was buried in presence of a large cortege.

The first juvenile magazine ever published in the Holy City, has just come out, of course in Hebrew, like the two weekly newspapers.

JERUSALEM, Jan. 2, 1893. A. B. OLIEL.

BURNED BY A TURKISH MOB.

Intelligence has been received of the burning by a Turkish mob of the Girls' Boarding School connected with Anatolia College, at Marsovan, in Armenia. Marsovan is the most important mission station in Western Turkey, and the work there is controlled by the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Girls' School had 105 pupils, including Armenians, Greeks, Germans and Turks. The entire college is under the charge of Rev. Dr. G. E. Herrick, who has for assistants John E. Smith, Edward Riggs and George E. White. The following are instructors: Mr. Sarah E. Smith, Mrs. Helen Mr Herrick, Mrs. Sarah H. Riggs, Mrs. Esther C. White, Mrs. Ann Eliza Fritcher, Miss Jane C. Smith, Miss Bertha Smith, Miss Susan D. Riggs. No details of the incendiary act have been received, but it is supposed that the Moslem fanatics have been urged on by jealous priests to the criminal act. There is no truth in the story that Dr. Herrick had posted inflammatory placards on the walls of the School.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN THE ARMY.

Chaplain Nave Writes Encouragingly of the Effort to Supply Good Literature for the Soldiers. Some Generous Responses.

EDITOR of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: Some generous patriot has caused to be sent me six copies of your superlatively excellent paper, which I place weekly in the barracks of this post. Kindly permit me through your columns to express to him or them my sincere thanks. I need three more, as we have eight barracks and a hospital. Numerous benevolent readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have sent me valuable packages of miscellaneous reading matter, which is distributed in barrack and hospital. Without systematic attention, soldiers do not get religious literature. Many companies have enterprising reading clubs, but the papers they subscribe for are secular. Occasionally, but rarely, a religious paper is subscribed for by individuals. The army opens a field for Christian beneficence in the supply of religious periodicals and library books. A year and a half ago I forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a short call of attention to this opportunity, and numerous responses came to me in many different and valuable forms. An excellent lady at Fort Wayne, Ind., forwarded a box of valuable books and well selected pamphlets that are doing excellent service in the post library and hospital. A New York gentleman became deeply interested in the army and has provided the libraries of a number of posts, this one among them, with a biblical dictionary, a standard commentary on the Scriptures and over fifty other volumes of great value to us. I believe not less than fifty people and societies have been put into correspondence with different chaplains and others with a view to providing current religious literature to the soldiery, as the result of the one communication.

I desire to rejoice with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its success in good works. The readiness with which its readers respond to righteous suggestions is a cause for rejoicing. Its shipload of provisions for the suffering Russians, its response for the army, and numerous liberalities show that it is read by philanthropists. Army libraries, generally speaking, are destitute of religious books, and totally so of religious books of reference, commentaries, etc. This class of books are not in frequent demand by young men, but they should be provided. There should be also a standard ecclesiastical history, a Josephus, and other works for consultation in the controversies constantly recurring among young men, whose appeal to authorities and other forms of research can and should be encouraged.

Soon after my article appeared in your paper in 1891, I received a letter from a Christian woman in Vermont, saying she could not live much longer, and before going home she wanted to arrange some matters, among others the disposition of the old home library, and she thought it might do good, after she was gone, at an army post. How thoughtful! It would not be surprising if there are a hundred among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who could make a good disposition of well preserved and desirable books in the same way. In contributing books, good judgment needs to be exercised so as not to send those having little or no value.

Wide interest is developing, of late, in the moral and religious welfare of the army. In 1890 this interest, as it manifested itself in the churches, resulted in the organization of the United Christian Commission. Those who organized it were commissioners appointed by the Northern General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the National Council of Congregational Churches, the General Synod of the Lutheran Church, and other lesser bodies, to act in co-operation in promoting the moral and religious welfare of the army and navy. This organization has [illegible] itself to the questions in hand. It is composed of men of recognized standing and influence in those denominations, who give assurance of wisdom and fidelity. The Commission is national and international. It needs money to carry on the grand mission on which it has entered. It should be endowed by generous gifts and by bequests from patriotic citizens. So long as there are an army and a navy, the Commission should exist and care systematically and intelligently for those who live in the peculiar conditions and circumstances of a nation's armament. It [illegible] the gifts of citizens. Colleges, hospitals, [illegible] and [illegible] of other institutions receive the benefactions of the liberal minded. How strongly this new movement appeals to the patriotic for their gifts! The treasurer of the Commission is Rev. William E. Parsons, D.D, Washington, D. C., a former and zealous worker in the Christian Commission of the late war.

WHERE IS THY FAITH?

Written for The Christian Herald.

O WHERE is your faith, my brother?
Above you the sky has grown dark,
Around you the storm has lowered,
And is fiercely tossing your bark.
Are you trusting in Jesus now?
O remember he sails with you,
And doubt not his love nor his power,
You will prove his promises true.

O where is your faith, my brother?
Now your night of sorrow has come.
The grave has closed o'er a loved one,
And has desolate left your home.
Of the cup you've been given to drink,
You may not on earth understand,
But wise love prepared it for you,
It was mixed by a Father's hand.

O where is your faith, my brother?
When the trials of life you meet,
And the road seems dreary and long
And is rough to your tired feet;
Press closer beside your Master,
He will smooth a pathway for you;
He'll never leave nor forsake you,
But will daily your strength renew.

O where is your faith, my brother?
Distrusting and doubting your Lord,
When with joy your heart might be filled,
If you truly believed his Word.
Doubt him no longer, my brother,
Though your path grow dark as the night,
Jesus in safety will guide you,
To his beautiful home in light.

MRS. W. J. KENNEDY.

A MOTHER'S QUEST.

WITH blanching cheeks, and tears that dim her sight,
A mother cries: "Where is my boy to-night!"
A gentle tap comes on the window-pane;
Perhaps it storms, and hail comes with the rain.
But no—soft shimmering through the latticed bars
She sees the gleaming of the shining stars.

And now, a luminous presence greets her sight;
Her guardian angel from the throne of light.
Tidings of peace and love his aspect wears;
A marvelous mirror in his hand he bears;
Lightly his glad winged feet the carpet press,
And softly fall the tones of high address:

"Watchful o'er thee, my charge, I bring to-night
This mirror, which unsullied still, and bright,
Reflects in perfect truth whatever scene
Thy fancy, wandering through the earth, may glean—
And if thy boy in similar scenes may be,
This mirror, without erring, shows to thee."

She scarcely dares to trust her boding sight
To gaze upon the mirror, glowing bright,
As its reflections trace each picture true
Which her imagination flitteth through,
Of folly, revelry, debauch, disgrace—
Not there? then lower still, she seeks his place.

Deeper her fancy dives, in sin's dark night
She finds him not—he still eludes her sight—
Till, all the depths explored, with drooping head,
She sobbing, cries: "My wandering boy is dead!"
"Nay, nay!" the angel moans, with accents sad,
"You've only sought your boy among the bad!"

Another scene is mirrored to her sight;
One look—another—murmurs of delight.
"Woman of little faith, what is 't ye see?"
"My boy, before his God, on bended knee!
'Tis in a meeting held for prayer and praise,
And holy men around him anthems raise."

"Fond mother, it is well, thy boy to-night,
Is not more prone to evil than to right,
And so it is, only because not all
The pearls of faith from out thy prayers could fall
Ere [illegible] speeding doubt, with wings more fleet—
Had laid them at the Intercessor's feet."

A SERMON IN AN ANCESTRAL HALL.

THE history of a recent preaching tour in China is sent to the Baptist Missionary Magazine, by Dr. J. W. Calren of Swatow, in the course of which he says: "As we were approaching a town, a messenger from the townsfolk met us and said that the people had assembled, and had sent him to invite us to come and preach to them. About one hundred had come together; others soon came up; the place could not accommodate all; we were invited to a larger place; it also in a short time could not contain the people; then we were invited into a large ancestral hall, which with difficulty afforded standing room for all the people. This was the only occasion I have seen women assemble with the men, and, unlike all other places, neither sex had curiosity to investigate the foreigner, but all seemed to feel as the many felt who had collected in the house of Cornelius when the combined sentiment was, 'Now, therefore, are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.' The town master said to me, 'We sent for you to teach us about God and the Lord Jesus.' It is rare indeed in China for a missionary to be invited to preach. Usually he is repulsed."

The Anti-Gambling Crusade.

EVANGELIST JOHN P. QUINN has lately been visiting Washington, D. C., with his anti-gambling car Roanoke. In that city, he has held a number of meetings under the auspices of different churches and associations of Christian workers, which have been largely attended.

The appearance of the car in the National Capital excited much curiosity, and it was visited by thousands. An interesting incident of his stay in Washington was an address delivered to the city police, by invitation. Mr. Quinn spoke in a police court, with a police justice as presiding officer on the platform. The evangelist (whose remarkable career before his conversion was recently described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), observed that although he had been many times in court, this was the first occasion when he had appeared "on the inside of the bar and with the judge on his side."

The Anti-Gambling car was conveyed across the Potomac to Jackson City on the Virginia side. It was halted in front of a noted gambling resort. A stalwart gambler came out and seemed disposed to fight when he read the inscription on the car; but Mr. Quinn and his associates, paying no attention to the fellow, began a Gospel service, which was followed by an eloquent address on gambling, illustrated in the usual manner with the gamblers' implements. Many of the men frequenting the various gambling resorts in Jackson City crowded around, listening intently, and at the close began asking questions and showed the deepest interest in the proceedings.

The Anti-Gambling Crusade has now been carried into ten of the Eastern States, and will be extended to Missouri. Its projectors have organized a stock company, placing the shares in the Roanoke at $1. each, which will enable all who are interested in this particular branch of evangelical work to help this unique crusade. Mr. Quinn, or Rev. Mr. Palmer, Secretary, can be addressed at 24 Park Place, N. Y.

A JAPANESE HERO.

A RECENT traveler in Japan noticed a peculiar inscription on one of the monuments and in reply to inquiries was told the following historical facts. The Sakura people were some years ago so oppressed by land agents that their condition appeared to them simply unbearable, but remonstrance of any sort was dangerous as their enemies were powerful and ruthless. Driven to desperation, some of them met together and prepared and sent a petition to the daimio, who was spending in dissipation at Yeddo the money wrung from them by taxation. But no notice was taken of it. Moved by the general suffering, Sogoro, a man of middle age, determined, as a last and desperate resort, to present the petition in person to his august majesty the Tycoon. Taking leave of his friends, he went to Yeddo, secreted himself under a bridge which the great man was to pass, and at the right moment pushed the petition at the end of a long bamboo directly into the royal hands. The act was without parallel in all the history of Japan. A mere peasant had disturbed the royal seclusion, and at the same moment broken the etiquette of the realm to pieces. The enormity of the act led to immediate inquiries into the circumstances of the case, and the justice of complaint was fully proved. The peasants' wrongs were at once redressed, but since decorum must be preserved in Japan, at any cost, the one man who thus served his people was delivered over for punishment to the very daimio of whom he had complained. By his order, Sogoro, his wife, and their three children were put to death. A monument marks the spot where they died, and they are held in grateful remembrance. This was a case literally fulfilling the words of Caiaphas, "It is expedient that one man should die for the people."

A MISSIONARY'S INTERCESSION.

IN his report to the Baptist Missionary Society, Rev. John H. Weeks who is laboring among the Bangalas writes: "For two years we have been engaged here in building our houses, making our farms, teaching our schools of boys and girls, and, above all, in reducing this language to writing. By our honest and truthful dealings with them, we have won their confidence, and have also gained some influence over them. Sitting on a stool just against me now is one who, eighteen months ago, threatened to kill us, and who, for a long time, was foremost in abusing those who helped us with the language. But now he assists and explains it to us himself. There is awful need of the civilizing influence of Christianity as well as its direct spiritual effect. An instance in point occurred not long ago. One day, I heard that a woman was being killed in the town. I instantly left off building and went to the place. There I saw a woman, with her arms securely tied and pegged to the ground. Through an interpreter I asked the husband, 'Do you intend to kill that woman?' 'Yes,' he said, 'we were about to kill her, but somebody is going to buy her.' Then turning to me the old man said, in an angry and defiant tone, 'It is not your business! Have you brought guns and soldiers with you? Do you want to fight us? If not, go back to your house and leave our palavers alone. She is my wife; I can kill her or sell her, just as I like.'"

AN ACTION WHICH BORE FRUIT.

THE Rev. Mr. Jameson tells the story in the Spirit of Missions of a young Mohammedan of good family, of Aligarh, India, who recently received Christian baptism. How he first became favorably disposed toward Christianity is thus stated: "He stood one day in the Aligarh bazaar and heard a native Christian of venerable appearance preach. There was a large crowd, mostly Mohammedans, and as the address proceeded the preacher was much interrupted. Discussion ensued, and considerable excitement prevailed. When feeling ran high, and the Christian preacher, who was none other than the veteran and learned Dr. Iman-ud-din of the Church Missionary Society, seemed to be baffling the reasoning and rebutting the arguments of his opponents with his wonted power, when a rough man, standing by, lifted his hand and smote the old man severely on the cheek. The venerable disciple, without resentment, and without a moment's hesitation, to the wonderment of the crowd followed to the letter his Master's injunctions and turned the other cheek to the smiter.

"The action not only silenced the riotousness of the crowd, but touched the heart of our young friend so deeply that he marvelled what that religion could be whose devotee could brook and silence so strangely and still so effectually such insult and opposition. It affected his life and changed his attitude toward Christianity and all who professed it. The seed that that one Christian action sowed, bore in God's time good fruit, and now the Munshi has confessed his faith, and we have good hopes that with the development of his Christian character and his intellectual gifts, he will one day do yeoman service in reasoning with his former co-religionists."

IN A JEWISH HOSPITAL.

MUCH has been written of the hardships endured by the Jews who have been expelled from Russia, but nothing so terrible as the following which Mr. Robert Scott Moncrieff sends to a contemporary as the result of a visit he paid to a temporary hospital on the line of march: "The hospital was near the Russian frontier. Medicine and nursing were impossible, there was no money. Cleanliness was unattainable, there was but one attendant. Men and women, eighteen of them, lay suffering and dying together. Cases of cancer, puerperal fever, Bright's disease, meningitis, fracture, amputation, tumor and fever, lay huddled on dirty cubicles, irrespective of age or sex. One plucky Jewish doctor showed me the scene with shame. He did what he could. It was evening, and the western sun sloped its way through the one window. An old man, with his face lit by the sunset, lay a-dying. He had wanted food, and now the gasp of death was in his throat. Alone he had lived, and alone he came to die. By his side lay an open book of psalms, with an ancient pair of spectacles marking the place where he had last read. Other hands than his would move the mark. The book was opened where it is written: 'For he remembered his holy promise and Abraham his servant. And he brought forth the people with joy and his chosen with gladness.' Squalid and foul as were his surroundings, the face of the old man, whose name I never knew, showed a peace within that the troubles of the world had not taken away."

DE LESSEPS' RISE AND FALL.

A Victim of Vanity—His Brilliant Life Checkered by Fraud and Deceit in the Panama Enterprise, and now Closing in Shame.

NOT since the days of the Commune, has the French Republic stood on the edge of such a volcano as that which has lately threatened its destruction. One of its favorite sons, whom it has for two decades loaded with honors, while his countrymen have dignified him with the title of "Le Grand Francais," has fallen into the deepest disgrace, and in his ruin has dragged down many other honored names with his own. Ferdinand de Lesseps, a man whom Frenchmen have been accustomed to name as one of the glories of the nation, is to-day a convicted felon, sick and probably dying, while many of his associates in the greatest enterprise of modern times, are also under condemnation. The crime with which they are charged is the wholesale misappropriation of money belonging to the stockholders of the Panama Canal, and extravagance, bribery and corruption. It was in 1879 that the project of cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Panama was first brought before the French people by de Lesseps at a National Congress convened for that purpose. Credit for the origination of the scheme was really due to Lieutenant Lucien Bonaparte Wyse of the French Navy, who made the survey which was sold to the subsequent projectors. The United States of Colombia granted a concession, the Panama Canal Company was founded, and in 1881 work was begun. It was stated that the work could be completed at a cost of $120,000,000, but soon these figures were exceeded. Loan followed loan, and but little progress was made; still de Lesseps and his associates spread glowing accounts of the work, and the French believed them. They did not scruple to lie, for on the very day when President Hayes sent to the American Congress an adverse message on the Canal, de Lesseps telegraphed to Francc: "The President guarantees the political security of the Canal." It is said that when he went to Panama, the simple natives regarded him as a magician who was to confer supernatural benefits on their country. When he arrived, such was their faith in his powers, that they asked him: "Where is the Canal?" supposing he had brought it with him. His conduct at Panama was characterized by extravagance and diplomatic deception, for he wasted money to impress the people, and he created imaginary opposition to the Canal in order that he might seem to have cleverly overcome the obstacles. Squandering of the funds was begun even before the actual work on the Canal had commenced. There were princely receptions given on the Isthmus at lavish cost, and extravagant banquets, and excursions which were of the nature of orgies throughout. The ladies of Panama were presented with medals in gold and enamel as souvenirs of the enterprise not yet begun, and in these and other ways the money contributed by the Canal stockholders was criminally wasted.

Meanwhile the man who was living in this maze of illusion was the idol of France. Press and people worshipped him. Capitalists poured their money into the Canal Company's treasury, tradesmen and peasants brought in their savings and turned them over to the magician who was to bring them a golden harvest. Soon there were half a million subscribers on the books. A horde of French officers and engineers went to the Isthmus, many of them to perish there of chagres fever. Negroes were imported to work there and died by the hundred. Twenty-four out of thirty-six Red Cross nurses who went down there from the Uuited States, died, and forty out of eighty American and European physicians. Before the end of 1888, over $200,000,000 had been expended, and more millions were called for. De Lesseps induced the government to authorize a lottery and a large number of deputies in the French Chamber were bribed to support the measure. Some 100 million francs were disbursed in this illegal fashion, the French press being subsidized as well as the legislators. It was now claimed that the total cost of the work would be little short of $342,000,000. France stood aghast, the lottery was a failure, the Canal was thrown into the hands of a receiver and a legal investigation was instituted. Consternation followed the first disclosures of the Investigating Commission, when it was found that many of the most trusted

HEN AND CHICKENS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Matthew 23: 37. "As a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!"

JERUSALEM was in sight as Christ came to the crest of Mount Olivet, a height of seven hundred feet. The splendors of the religious capital of the whole earth irradiated the landscape. There is the temple. Yonder is the king's palace. Spread out before his eyes are the pomp, the wealth, the wickedness and the coming destruction of Jerusalem, and he bursts into tears at the thought of the obduracy of a place that he would gladly have saved, and apostrophizes, saying: "Oh Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

Why did Christ select hen and chickens as a simile? Next to the appositeness of the comparison, I think it was to help all public teachers in the matter of illustration to get down off their stilts and use comparisons that all can understand. The plainest bird on earth is the barnyard fowl. Its only adornments are the red comb in its head-dress and the wattles under the throat. It has no grandeur of genealogy. All we know is that its ancestors came from India, some of them from a height of four thousand feet on the sides of the Himalayas. It has no pretension of nest like the eagle's eyrie. It has no lustre of plumage like the goldfinch. Possessing anatomy that allows flight, yet about the last thing it wants to do is to fly, and in retreat, uses foot almost as much as wing. Musicians have written out in musical scale the song of lark and robin red-breast and nightingale, yet the hen of my text hath nothing that could be taken for a song, but only cluck and cackle. Yet Christ, in the text, uttered while looking upon doomed Jerusalem, declares that what he had wished for that city was like what the hen does for her chickens. Christ was thus simple in his teachings, and yet how hard it is for us, who are Sunday School instructors and editors and preachers and reformers, and those who would gain the ears of audiences, to attain that heavenly and divine art of simplicity. We have to run a course of literary disorders as children a course of physical disorders. We come out of school and college loaded down with Greek mythologies, and out of the the Theological Seminary weighed down with what the learned fathers said, and we fly with wings of eagles and flamingoes and albatrosses, and it takes a good while before we can come down to Christ's similitudes, the candle under the bushel, the salt that has lost its savor, the net thrown into the sea, the spittle on the eyes of the blind man, and the hen and chickens. There is not much poetry about this winged creature of God mentioned in my text, but she is more practical and more motherly and more suggestive of good things than many that fly higher and wear brighter colors. She is not a prima donna of the skies, nor a strut of beauty in the aisle of the forest. She does not cut a circle under the sun like the Rocky Mountain eagle, but stays at home to look after family affairs. She does not swoop like the condor of the Cordilleras to transport a rabbit from the valley to the top of the crags, but just scratches for a living. How vigorously with her claws she pulls away the ground to bring up what is hidden beneath! When the breakfast or dining hour arrives, she begins to prepare the repast, and calls all her young to partake.

I am in warm sympathy with the unpretentious old-fashioned hen, because like most of us, she has to scratch for a living. She knows at the start the lesson which most people of good sense are slow to learn—that the gaining of a livelihood implies work, and that successes do not lie on the surface, but are to be upturned by positive and continuous effort. The reason that society and the church, and the world are so full of failures, so full of loafers, so full of dead beats, is because people are not wise enough to take the lesson which any hen would teach them, that if they would find for themselves, and for those dependent upon them anything worth having they must scratch for it. Solomon said: "Go to the ant thou sluggard." I say, Go to the hen thou sluggard. In the old Testament God compares himself to an eagle stirring up her nest, and in the New Testament the Holy Spirit is compared to a descending dove, but Christ, in a sermon that began with cutting sarcasm for hypocrites and ends with the paroxysm of pathos in the text, compares himself to a hen.

One day in the country, we saw sudden consternation in the behavior of old Dominick. Why the hen should be so disturbed, we could not understand. We looked about to see if a neighbor's dog were invading the farm. We looked up to see if a storm cloud were hovering. We could see nothing on the ground that could terrorize, and we could see nothing in the air to ruffle the feathers of the hen, but the loud wild, affrighted cluck which brought all her brood at full run under her feathers, made us look again around us and above us, when we saw that high up and far away there was a rapacious bird wheeling round and round, and down and down, and not seeing us as we stood in the shadow, it came nearer and lower, until we saw its beak was curved from base to tip, and it had two flames of fire for eyes, and it was a hawk. But all the chickens were under old Dominick's wings, and either the bird of prey caught a glimpse of us, or not able to find the brood huddled under wing, darted back into the clouds. So Christ calls with great earnestness to all the young. Why, what is the matter? It is bright sunlight, and there can be no danger. Health is theirs. A good home is theirs. Plenty of food is theirs. Prospect of long life is theirs. But Christ continues to call, calls with more emphasis and urges haste, and says not a second ought to be lost. Oh, do tell us what is the matter. Ah, now I see, there are hawks of temptation in the air, there are vultures wheeling for their prey, there are beaks of death ready to plunge, there are claws of allurement ready to clutch. Now I see the peril. Now I understand the urgency. Now I see the only safety. Would that Christ might this day take our sons and daughters into his shelter, "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing." The fact is, that the most of them will never find the shelter unless while they are chickens. It is a simple matter of inexorable statistics that most of those who do not come to Christ in youth never come at all. What chance is there for the young without divine protection? There are the grog shops. There are the gambling hells. There are the infidelities and immoralities of spiritualism. There are the bad books. There are the impurities. There are the business rascalities. And so numerous are these assailments that it is a wonder that honesty and virtue are not lost arts. The birds of prey, diurnal and nocturnal, of the natural world, are ever on the alert. They are the assassins of the sky. They have varieties of taste. The eagle prefers the flesh of the living animal. The vulture prefers the carcass. The falcon kills with one stroke, while other styles of beak give prolongation of torture. And so the temptations of this life are various. Some make quick work of death, and others agonize the mind and body for many years, and some like the living blood of great souls, and others prefer those already gangrened. But for every style of youth there is a swooping wing and a sharp beak and a cruel claw, and what the rising generation needs is a wing of protection. Fathers, mothers, older brothers and sisters, and Sabbath school teachers, be quick and earnest and prayerful and importunate, and get the chickens under wing. May the Sabbath schools of America and Great Britain within the next three months sweep all their scholars into the kingdom. Whom they have now under charge is uncertain. Concerning that scrawny, puny child that lay in the cradle many years ago, the father dead, many remarked, "What a mercy if the Lord would take the child," and the mother really thought so, too, but what a good thing that God spared that child, for it became world-renowned in Christian literature, and one of God's most illustrious servants—John Todd. Remember, your children will remain children only a little while. What you do for them as children, you must do quickly, or never do at all. "Why have you never written a book?" said some one to a talented woman. She replied: "I am writing two, and have been engaged on one work ten years and on the other five years—my two children. They are my life-work." When the house of John Wesley's father burned, and they got the eight children out, John Wesley the last before the roof fell in, the father said: "Let us kneel down and thank God. The children are all saved, let the rest of the place go." My hearers, if we secure the present and everlasting welfare of our children, most other things belonging to us are of but little comparative importance. Alexander the Great allowed his soldiers to take their families with them to war, and he accounted for the bravery of his men by the fact that many of them were born in camp, and were used to warlike scenes from the start. Would God that all the children of our day might be born into the army of the Lord! No need of letting them go a long way on the wrong road before they turn around and go on the right road. The only time to get chickens under wing is while they are chickens.

Hannah Whitall Smith, the evangelist, took her little child at two years of age when ill out of the crib, and told her plainly of Christ, and the child believed, and gave evidence of joyful trust which grew with her growth into womanhood. Two years are not too young. The time will come when by the faith of parents children will be born into this world, and born into the bosom of Christ at the same time. Soon we parents will have to go and leave our children. We fight their battles now, and we stand between them, and harm, but our arm will after awhile get weak, and we cannot fight for them, and our tongue will be palsied and we cannot speak for them. Are we going to leave them out in the cold world to take their chances, or are we doing all we can to get them under the wing of eternal safety?

But we all need the protecting wing. If you had known when you entered upon manhood or womanhood what was ahead of you, would you have dared to undertake life? How much you have been through! With most life has been a disappointment, they tell me so. They have not attained that which they expected to attain. They have not had the physical and mental vigor they expected, or they have met with rebuffs which they did not anticipate. You are not at forty or fifty or sixty or seventy or eighty years of age where you thought you would be. I do not know anyone except myself to whom life has been a happy surprise. I never expected anything and so when anything came in the shape of human favor or comfortable position or widening field of work, it was to me a surprise. I was told in the theological seminary by some of my fellow students that I never would get anybody to hear me preach, unless I changed my style, so that when I found that some people did come to hear me, it was a happy surprise. But most people according to their own statement, have found life a disappointment. Indeed we all need shelter from its tempests. About three o'clock on a hot August afternoon you have heard a rumble that you first took for a wagon crossing a bridge, but afterward there was a louder rumbling, and you said, Why, that is thunder! and sure enough the clouds were being convoked for a full diapason. A whole park of artillery went rolling down the heavens and the blinds of the windows in the sky were closed. But the sounds above were not more certain than the sounds beneath. The cattle came to the bars and moaned for them to be let down that they might come home to shelter, and the fowl, whether dark Brahma or Hamburg or Leghorn or Dominick, began to call to its young, "Cluck!" "Cluck!" "Cluck!" and take them under the wagon-house or shed, and had them all hid under the soft feathers by the time that the first plash of rain struck the roof. So there are sudden tempests for our souls, and, oh! how dark it gets, and threatening clouds of bankruptcy or sickness or persecution or bereavement gather and thicken and blacken, and some run for shelter to a bank, but it is poor shelter, and others run to friendly advisers, and they fail to help, and others fly nowhere simply because they know not where to go, and they perish in the blast, but others hear a divine call, saying: "Come, for all things are now ready." "The spirit and the bride say, Come." And while the heavens are thundering terror, the Divine voice proffers mercy, and the soul comes under the brooding care of the Almighty "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing."

The wings of my text suggest warmth, and that is what most folks want. The fact is that this is a cold world, whether you take it literally or figuratively. We have a big fireplace, called the sun, and it has a very hot fire, and the stokers keep the coals well stirred up, but much of the year we cannot get near enough to this fireplace to get warmed. The world's extremities are cold all the time. Forget not that it is colder at the South Pole than at the North Pole, and that the Arctic is not so destructive as the Antarctic. Once in a while the Arctic will let explorers come back, but the Antarctic hardly ever. When at the South Pole, a ship sails in, the door of ice is almost sure to be shut against its return. So life to many millions of people at the South and many millions of people at the North is a prolonged shiver. But when I say that this is a cold world, I chiefly mean figuratively. If you want to know what is the meaning of the ordinary term of receiving the "cold shoulder," get out of money and try to borrow. The conversation may have been almost tropical for luxuriance of thought and speech, but suggest your necessities and see the thermometer drop to fifty degrees below zero, and in that which, till a moment before, had been a warm room. Take what is an unpopular position on some public question and see your friends fly as chaff before a wind-mill. As far as myself is concerned, I have no word of complaint, but I look off day by day and see communities freezing out men and women of whom the world is not worthy. Now it takes after one and now after another. It becomes popular to depreciate and defame and execrate and lie about some people. This is the best world I ever got into, but it is the meanest world that some people ever got into. The worst thing that ever happened to them was their cradle and the best thing that will ever happen to them will be their grave. What people want is warmth. Many years ago a man was floating down on the ice of the Merrimac and great efforts were made to rescue him. Twice he got hold of a plank thrown to him and twice he slipped away from it, because that end of the plank was covered with ice, and he cried out, "For God's sake, give me the wooden end of the plank this time," and this done, he was hauled to shore. The trouble is that in our efforts to save the soul, there is too much coldness and icy formality, and so the imperilled one slips off and floats down. Give it the other end of the plank. Warmth of sympathy, warmth of kindly association, warmth of genial surroundings. The world declines to give it, and in many cases has no power to give it, and here is where Christ comes in, and as on a cold day, the rain beating and the atmosphere full of sleet, the hen clucks her chickens under her wings and the warmth of her own breast puts warmth into the wet feathers and the chilled feet of the infant group of the barnyard, so Christ says to those sick and frosted and disgusted and frozen of the world, come in out of the March winds of the world's criticism, come in out of the sleet of the world's assault, come in out of a world that does not understand you; and does not want to understand you; I will comfort and I will soothe and I will be your warmth, "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing." Oh, the warm heart of God is ready for all those to whom the world has given the cold shoulder.

But notice that some one must take the storm for the chickens. Ah! the hen takes the storm. I have watched her under the pelting rain. I have seen her in the pinching frosts. Almost frozen to death, or almost strangled in the waters, and what a fight she makes for the young under wing if a dog, or a hawk, or a man come too near. And so the brooding Christ takes the storm for us. What flood of anguish and tears that did not dash upon his holy soul. What beak of torture did not pierce his vitals. What barking Cerberus of hell was not let out upon him from the kennels.

> What he endured, O who can tell
> To save our souls from death and hell.

Yes, the hen took the storm for the chickens, and Christ takes the storm for us. Once the tempest rose so suddenly the hen could not get with her young back from the new ground to the barn, and there she is under the fence half dead. And now the rain turns to snow and it is an awful night, and in the morning the whiteness about the gills and the beak down in the mud show that the mother is dead, and the young ones come out, and cannot understand why the mother does not scratch for them something to eat, and they walk over her wings, and call with their tiny voices, but there is no answering cluck. She took the storm for others and perished. Poor thing! Self-sacrificing even unto death! And does it not make you think of him who endured all for us? So the wings under which we come for spiritual safety are blood-spattered wings, are night-shadowed wings, are tempest-torn wings. In the Isle of Wight I saw the grave of Princess Elizabeth, who died while a prisoner at Carisbrook Castle, her finger on an open Bible and pointing to the words: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Oh, come under the wings!

But now the summer day is almost past, and the shadows of the house and barn and wagon-shed have lengthened. The farmer, with scythe or hoe on shoulder, is returning from the fields, The oxen are unyoked. The horses are crunching the oats at the full bin. The air is bewitched of honeysuckle and wild-briar. The milkman, pail in hand, is approaching the barnyard. The fowls, keeping early hours, are collecting their young: "Cluck!" "Cluck!"

OLD DOMINICK CALLS HER BROOD.

"Cluck!" and soon all the eyes of that feathered nursery are closed. The bachelors of the winged tribe have ascended to their perch, but the hens, in a motherhood Divinely appointed, take all the risk of a slumber on the ground, and all night long the wings will stay out-spread and the little ones will not utter a sound. Thus at sundown, lovingly, safely, completely, the hen broods her young. So, if we are the Lord's, the evening of our life will come. The heats of the day will have passed. There will be shadows and we cannot see as far. The work of life will be about ended. The hawks of temptation that hovered in the sky will have gone to the woods and folded their wings. Sweet silences will come down. The air will be redolent with the breath of whole arbors of promises sweeter than jasmine or evening primrose. The air may be a little chill, but Christ will call us, and we will know the voice and heed the call, and we will come under the wings for the night, the strong wings, the soft wings, the warm wings, and without fear, and in full sense of safety, and then we will rest from sundown to sunrise, "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing." Dear me! How many souls the Lord hath thus brooded. Mothers after watching over sick cradles and then watching afterward over wayward sons and daughters, at last themselves taken care of by a motherly God. Business men, after a lifetime struggling with the uncertainties of money markets and the change of tariffs, and the underselling of men, who, because of their dishonesties, can afford to under-sell, and years of disappointment and struggle, at last under wings where nothing can perturb them any more than a bird of prey, which is ten miles off, disturbs a chick at midnight brooded in a barnyard.

My text has its strongest application for people who were born in the country, wherever you may now live, and that is the majority of you. You cannot hear my text without having all the rustic scenes of the old farmhouse come back to you. Good old days they were. You knew nothing much of the world, for you had not seen the world. By law of association, you cannot recall the brooding hen and her chickens without seeing also the barn, and the hay-mow, and the wagon-shed, and the house, and the room where you played, and the fireside with the big back log before which you sat, and the neighbors, and the burial, and the wedding, and the deep snowbanks, and hear the village bell that called you to worship, and seeing the horses which, after pulling you to church, stood around the old clapboarded meeting-house, and those who sat at either end of the church pew, and indeed all the scenes of your first fourteen years, and you think of what you were then and of what you are now, and all these thoughts are aroused by the sight of the old hencoop. Some of you had better go back and start again. In thought return to that place and hear the cluck, and see the out-spread feathers, and come under the wing, and make the Lord your portion and shelter and warmth, preparing for everything that may come, and so avoid being classed among those described by the closing words of my text, "as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." Ah, that throws the responsibility upon us. "Ye would not." Alas! for the "would-nots." If the wandering broods of the farm heed not their mother's call and risk the hawk and dare the freshet and expose themselves to the frost and storm, surely their calamities are not the mother's fault. "Ye would not!" God would, but how many would not. When a good man asked a young woman who had abandoned her home and who was deploring her wretchedness why she did not return, the reply was: "I dare not go home. My father is so provoked, he would not receive me home." "Then," said the Christian man, "I will test this," and so he wrote to the father, and the reply came back, and in a letter marked outside "Immediate," and inside saying "Let her come at once; all is forgiven." So God's invitation for you is marked "Immediate" on the outside, and inside it is written, "He will abundantly pardon." Oh, ye wanderers from God and happiness and home and heaven, come under the sheltering wing. A vessel in the Bristol Channel was nearing the rocks, called the "Steep Holmes." Under the tempest, the vessel was unmanageable, and the only hope was that the tide would change before she struck the rocks and went down, and so the Captain stood on the deck, watch in hand. Captain and crew and passengers were pallid with terror. Taking another look at his watch and another look at the sea, he shouted, "Thank God, we are saved! The tide has turned! One minute more and we would have struck the rocks." Some of you have been a long while drifting in the tempest of sin and sorrow and have been making for the breakers. Thank God, the tide has turned. Do you not feel the lift of the billow? The grace of God that bringeth salvation has appeared to your soul, and in the words of Boaz to Ruth, I commend you to "the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou hast come to trust."

A CRUEL KING.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

KING ALCOHOL sits on his throne and rules with a rod of iron. He strikes to kill and always maims when he does not kill. Tears, hunger, heartache, despair, poverty, ruin and death are some of the favors he confers on his subjects. He is as heartless as famine, pitiless as pestilence and cruel as death. When Rome was burning, Nero got his melodies out of the fiddle, but, this King gets his music from the sobs of children, the cries of the broken-hearted and the awful crash of doomed souls. Come with me and behold one of his victims. I was told that a man lay dying from drink in a dismal cellar on one of the foulest streets of the city. An outside cellar door and with stone steps which led down from the sidewalk, gave me entrance to a dark, dismal hole in the ground. A woman stood within and I said, "They tell me a man is dying here."

"Yes; he is in the back room."

"Back room! Great heavens, can there be anything back of this?"

I made my way into the black hole. A candle standing on the head of a barrel gave but a faint glimmer in the foul air, and I needed to wait to get used to the darkness. A groan from a corner, showed me where one of the King's victims lay on a little straw spread on the damp floor. I went over to him, knelt by his side, reached over and grasped his bony hand and said, "My brother, they tell me you are dying."

He snatched his hand away and said, "I am a dying wretch, but for God's sake don't insult me."

"Insult you! how have I insulted you?"

"When you call a wretch like me, brother, it is an insult; for you don't mean it. I am brother to no man, and no man is brother to me."

"Give me your hand, for you are my brother. God is your father and mine. Christ died to save you and me. The Gospel is good news for us both. Let me hold your hand, while I pray for my brother."

"Too late for that. I am beyond all hope. Drink has been my ruin and my curse and I am lost."

He grew excited, and trying to quiet him, I said, "What is your name?"

"I won't tell you my name. I go by such a name, but it's not my real one."

"Why won't you tell me your name?"

"Because I don't want any one to know who I am or how I die."

"Why not? Perhaps you have some one who loves you yet, and would want to know."

"No! No!" he cried. "Listen. In a little church—a Presbyterian Church—in a little country village over in Pennsylvania, an old white-haired man stands up every Sunday and preaches this Gospel of which you speak. That man is my father; made prematurely old by the ruin of his boy. Back of the church, in a grave, lies my mother. My waywardness broke her heart and sent her to an untimely grave. If my father knew how his only boy died, he would soon lie alongside of my mother. I won't tell you who I am. I am beyond the hope of mercy. Drink has been my ruin. You come too late—too late."

He lay dead. A nameless grave in the Potter's Field contains the body of some preacher's boy. And since that day, sixteen years ago, two million more have gone down the same road.

Yet the King still sits on his throne, and laughs over the ruin that makes heaven weep. "How long, O, Lord, how long?"

ESTHER BEFORE THE KING.

S. S. Lesson for Mar. 12. Esth. 4: 10-17; 5:1-3. Golden Text, Prov. 31: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

QUEEN Esther was placed in a position of great difficulty. The head of the harem of a heathen tyrant! How could a child of God wed in such a capacity? Did she know that intermarriage with the heathen was forbidden by the law of God? Surely the enemy would take advantage of this fact to persuade her that it was in vain for her to serve God. Yet Esther was under obedience; she "did the commandment of Mordecai [her cousin] like as when she was brought up with him;" she was given in marriage, and therefore not responsible. Esther was a wife without knowing anything of true union of spirit with her husband, and her very queenship must have been a galling yoke to a true child of God. All the circumstances of her life, the pomp and state, connected as it was with heathen worship, and then the terrible yoke of secrecy which Mordecai enjoined, touching her kindred and her people, must have made her position as a child of God almost impossible, if God himself had not specially watched over her, and given her some "maidens" who could help her in prayer and strengthen her hands in God.

Are they to be Pitied whom the Lord allows to be placed in difficult, almost impossible positions? There are circumstances in the lives of some of God's children which cannot be explained to any but God, and which can be understood by no other; circumstances which bring a child of God to such an intimate walk with him that every step must be taken with the Lord, or it may be a false one. There are positions where a life is indeed hid with Christ in God. The name of Esther means "secret; hidden;" and her life is a sample of many lives in which all the surroundings are adverse to a life of holiness, and where witness for God seems to be an impossibility.

Esther was not to be pitied, just as Joseph in Egypt, and Daniel in Babylon, were not men to be pitied. The moment we yield to self-pity or seek or accept the compassion of man in a time of difficulty, that moment between God and us. The difficulty of our circumstances is an appeal to the power and the love of our heavenly Father, and it is a claim upon his intervention and affords him an opportunity of manifesting his delivering power. "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations." (James 1: 2.) But he must be trusted if he is to act, and trusted without reserve. The story of Esther is well known. Out of a number of maidens brought to king Ahasuerus, when queen Vashti displeased him, Esther was his choice, and he set the crown royal upon her head. Haman—the Agagite—probably a descendant of that very Agag the Amalekitish king whom Saul in his vanity had spared contrary to the will of God,—had gained a powerful ascendancy over the king, so that practically Haman ruled the kingdom, and, according to the king's command, he received almost regal honors, all the king's servants bowing down to him. But there was one man who looked at things in another light than the flattering courtiers and creatures of the king. A man of God, Mordecai, the cousin of the queen (Esther 2: 15), sat in the gate. This man had the cause of God, and of his people at heart, and bowed to his control. As a Jew he could not bow to Haman the enemy of God.

Haman marked the upright Jew, and his overbearing spirit could not brook that this man alone should fail to do him reverence. Haman knew no god greater than himself; his standard of right and wrong in others was simply how they treated him. Exasperated that one whom he looked upon as such a puny enemy should resist him, the wretched man conceived the horrible idea of extirpating all the Jews throughout the kingdom of Ahasuerus; and he persuaded the king to assent to his proposal by promising a sum of money to his treasury (chap. 4: 7.) This wholesale butchery was to take place only to gratify the spite of one man's Wounded Pride.

So diabolical can be the heart of man untouched by the grace of God! Mordecai heard the tidings that not only was this wicked thing conceived by Haman, but that actually he had persuaded the king to gratify him, and that already the command had been sent out into all the dominions of the king, that the Jews, men, women and children, should be slaughtered! Mordecai took the matter to heart, and came before the gate of the king with rent clothes, sackcloth and ashes, crying with a loud and bitter cry. All this time the queen was in ignorance of what had happened. At last the tidings reach her of Mordecai's grief and, attached as she was to her cousin, her first thought was for him, and she sent out other raiment for him and besought him to give up his garb of sackcloth, but he refused. The queen perceived that something of importance had happened, and she sent out Hatach, who was her chief chamberlain, to inquire the cause of such overwhelming sorrow. It was a fearful revelation to Esther. Not only was there her people's danger, but she saw the awful and satanic influence of Haman over Ahasuerus, and at first, when the request came from Mordecai that she should go in unbidden to the king's presence with her life in her hand to plead for her people, her heart failed her. Who and what was she to withstand one who had such power as Haman? She bid Hatach represent the difficulties to Mordecai, and how she would probably risk her own life and nothing would come of it, if she ventured uncalled for into the king's inner court, where Haman was welcome, but she had not been called for thirty days.

Mordecai returned her an answer which challenged all the faith she had in the living God and called forth all the warmth of her Jewish blood: "Think not with thyself that thou shall escape in the king's house more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed." What was this? How did Mordecai know this? Under the sackcloth and ashes, under the loud and bitter cry, God saw in Mordecai a heart which and between God and his servant it was already a settled thing that his people should be delivered: the only question which remained was: Who should be the instrument? "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Esther was thoroughly aroused. Tried child of God, art thou aroused to see the honor and dignity which thy God puts upon thee when thou art called to face worse than death itself that he may have the opportunity to manifest the life of Christ in thee? Who knoweth whether thou wert not born, and born again for such a time as this, and who knows whether thy destiny for eternity may not hang upon the very crisis through which thou art now passing? Still more, who knows whether thy witness in this very hour may not tend to hasten the coming of the Lord, if thou be found faithful?

The appeal found its response in the young Jewess. She had found little sphere where, as queen, she might be made a blessing; now there lay before her the possibility of being the instrument of but it must be at the risk of her life itself. It was no light step: she assembled her maidens and called on Mordecai to assemble all the Jews around to seek help of God. The obedient subject young woman developed at this crisis into the dignified capable deliverer of her people, and her dependence upon God was the chief mark of her capability: "Go, gather all the Jews which are present in Shushan, fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink for three days, night or day. I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law, and if I perish, I perish." Such is the spirit of the true Bride of Christ; the spirit of sacrifice like that of her Lord, such only can really be used to deliver.

Little knew the king of the burden which lay on the heart of his fair young queen as he held out the golden sceptre to her. A greater presence overshadowed her, and when, in answer to her request he came with Haman to her banquet and there and then she made request for her life and that of her people, strength and courage was given to her by the God whose face she had sought. And the God of Israel turned the king's heart. As soon as Esther had risen to her vocation, and understood her God, as soon as she became a real type of the Church of Christ in these days, God could deal with the king of Persia. In one moment the spell of Haman's influence was broken, and the man who had ruled the king up to that hour was taken from his presence to be hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai. And, moreover, the decree of the king was sent forth that throughout the empire the Jews were given leave to stand for their lives and to take the prey of their enemies who would do them hurt.

The day came and everywhere the "Jews gathered themselves together in their cities throughout all the provinces of the King Ahasuerus to lay hand upon such as sought their hurt, and no man could withstand them; for the fear of them fell upon all people." The very rulers helped the Jews and God thus gave a great deliverance which the Jews commemorate to this day. Thus the faithfulness of one child of God in a moment of crisis saved a whole nation, and she is a witness to all ages how in the most impossible of circumstances a true child of God may be blest and may be a blessing.

THE PERSIAN THRONE.

JEWS in all lands celebrate, to this day the events recorded in the Book of Esther. The festival of Purim, which is kept in the lunar month February-March, is to them the period of rejoicing, festivity and giving of presents that Christmas is to us. It is the commemoration of the deliverance of the Jews in Persia from extirpation. The exact date of the event has been matter of dispute. The most probable theory is that which identifies the Ahasuerus of Esther with Xerxes, the son of Darius Hystaspis. Recent discoveries of inscriptions at Persepolis tend to confirm this theory. If the identification is correct the events recorded must have occurred about 475 years before the Christian era, and the feast at which Vashti refused to appear was that prolonged orgie mentioned by Herodotus. Many of the Jews had returned to Jerusalem sixty years before, under the decree of Cyrus, and had rebuilt their Temple. Some had remained behind, among whom were the parents of Nehemiah, who was cupbearer to Artaxerxes, the son and successor to Xerxes. As he was probably a young man when appointed cupbearer he must have been only an infant when Esther was queen. The author of the book of Esther may have been Ezra or some one of the Jews about the court. From the fact that the name of God is not mentioned in the book, from beginning to end, it may be inferred that he expected his readers would be persons to whom the God of the Hebrews was unknown. He strangely has not a word of sympathy for Vashti, the modest queen who refused to be exhibited to the crowd of drunken revellers; and appears to see nothing unwomanly in Esther's request for a second day of slaughter, when the king told her how large a number had been killed on the first day. One conspicuous lesson of the whole book is the contrast of its savage vindictive spirit with the infinitely higher law which Christ gives us to love our enemies and pray for them that despitefully use us.

Why would not Mordecai bow to Haman? Herodotus states it as a fact that the Persians paid divine homage to their kings, and worshipped them as Gods, just as the Romans worshipped their Emperors in a later time. He mentions the fact that certain Greeks who came to Susa (or Shushan as it is called in the book of Esther), were informed that it was the custom for persons presented to the king to prostrate themselves before him. They, however, refused, alleging that it was "not the custom of the Greeks to worship a man. "Probably this obeisance which the author of Esther describes as bowing was regarded as an act of worship. The courtiers seeing Haman high in the king's favor may have paid it to him as an act of prudence. There would be much curiosity to see if Mordecai, a representative of a race noted in an age when all nations were idolatrous for its adherence to monotheism, would offer to Haman this homage. It would mean more from him, and be a greater tribute to Haman than the adoration of the Persians who distributed such tributes among numerous deities. Conversely, Mordecai's refusal was the more irritating because of his belonging to a captive people.

Whosoever . . . who is not called. Access to royalty is not easy even in the present day. A stranger who made his way to the room in which a European king or queen was sitting and intruded uninvited on the monarch's presence would surely be punished. It is all the more important therefore to make it widely known that the King of kings will receive all who come to him. The teacher of a mission Sunday School was telling a friend whom he met on the street that he was afraid he would have to discontinue the school, as he had seen no fruit whatsoever of his labors. At that moment a little ragged boy came up and asked him if he would come to see his brother, who was very ill. He went with the boy into one of the lowest streets of the city, and on entering the room was struck with the extreme misery of it. The sufferer lay on a mere heap of rags in a corner. The teacher said, "My poor boy, what can I do for you? Can I get you a doctor?" "Oh, no sir," said the boy. "Shall I find you a nurse, and have you removed to a nice bed?" "Oh, no sir, not that; but tell me, tell me, did you say that Jesus died for everybody?" "Yes I did,". "And that he will receive anyone who comes to him?" "Yes, indeed, I did, dear boy." "Well, then, I know that he has received me," and in a few minutes the boy dropped back dead—his soul had gone to his Saviour.

Then shall deliverance arise from another place. Mordecai assured the queen that even if she did not do the duty he required of her that in some other way the people would be delivered. She might have the privilege if she would and the glory that would come of it. It might be that the strange circumstances which had given her the high position she occupied had been arranged for the very purpose of putting the opportunity of doing this great service in her power. If she neglected it the loss would be hers. God would deliver his people without her help. It is so, now. God's work will be done, but it is the privilege of every Christian boy or girl to help in it by telling some unconverted companions of Christ, or bringing them to school where they will hear of him. The story has been told of a soldier who was missed amid the bustle of a battle, and no one knew what had become of him; but they knew that he was not in the ranks. As soon as opportunity offered, the officer went in search of him, and to his surprise found that the man, during the battle, had been amusing himself in a flower garden! When it was demanded what he did there, he excused himself by saying, "Sir I am doing no harm." But he was tried, convicted and shot. What a sad but true picture this is of many who waste their time, and neglect their duty, and who could give their God, if demanded, no better answer than, "Lord, I am doing no harm!"

So will I go unto the King. Esther knew that she put her life in peril when she went uninvited into the King's presence. The law was dead against her. Unless the King chose to accord her a welcome she must die. But she went to plead for a whole people, who would die if she did not go. She risked death that she might save their lives. It was a law among the Romans that no one should approach the Emperor's tent at night, under penalty of death. One night, however, a soldier was found near the royal tent, holding in his hand a petition which he meant to present to his master; and thereupon he was sentenced to death. But the Emperor hearing voices, and asking what was amiss, and hearing that a soldier had intruded within the forbidden bounds to present a petition, and that they were about to deal with him according to the law, said, "If the petition is for himself, let him die, but if for another, spare his life." It was found that it was for two of his fellow-soldiers that he had come to intercede, who had been taken asleep while they were posted on the watch.

DE LESSEPS' RISE AND FALL.

men in the Republic had been concerned in the bribery and spoliation. Baron Reinach, who had been the Canal Company's leading agent in the bribery, killed himself and some of his associates fled. A Cabinet crisis followed these revelations, and when a long list of corrupted deputies was announced, public indignation was unrestrained. It was at one time feared that the outcome would be the destruction of the republic. The investigation proved that de Lesseps the elder, Charles de Lesseps, his son, Eiffel, the builder of the famous tower, Albert Grevy, a brother of the ex-President of France, nearly forty deputies, a host of officials, and almost every journal in Paris had been partakers of the corruption fund in amounts ranging from 50,000 to 100,000 francs apiece. One witness testified that M. de Lesseps had offered him 300,000 francs to buy votes. Of one milliard francs ($200,000,000), 600,000,000 francs had been spent at the Isthmus, and 400,000,000 in "booming" the scheme in France.

Wholesale arrests and convictions followed the disclosures. Charles de Lesseps, and Messrs. Fontane and Cottu, his associates, were imprisoned. Count de Lesseps, who had been prostrated by sickness, could not be moved. A number of the deputies, too, were included in the prosecution. Renewed excitement followed when it became known that the leading actors in this public infamy had been convicted and that Count de Lesseps and his son Charles had each been sentenced to five years imprisonment and a fine of 3000 francs, while Cottu, Eiffel and Fontane had each been sentenced to two years, with heavy fines.

Justice has overtaken the principal actors in this great international sin, but all are not yet punished. The harvest is far from being fully reaped. There have been some expressions of sympathy for de Lesseps, yet all admit that he has suffered justly for the course of misrepresentation, extravagance and corruption he pursued, and for permitting and even participating in the plundering of the Panama shareholders. His career has been one of the most brilliant in France; he was a member of the National Academy, a Knight of the Legion of Honor and a Count of the old empire. His name was everywhere honored; but now, through yielding to this temptation, he has wrecked not only his own character and career, but ruined many others in like manner, besides rendering thousands of industrious French families penniless, since they had invested their little all in his delusive enterprise. He is still very ill, and may never recover sufficiently to realize his degradation and shame, but his experience will stand as a warning to all who, ambitious to accomplish great deeds, endeavor to do so regardless of the welfare and interests of others, and who stifle all the nobler instincts and impulses, and even conscience itself, in the mad struggle for worldly wealth, power and fame.

One of the greatest engineering triumphs of modern times is the Suez Canal, connecting the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, and it is on the success of this vast undertaking that the fame and glory of De Lesseps have mainly rested. Yet the project did not originate with him, for long centuries ago—as early as six hundred years before the Christian era—a canal existed between the two seas, which are nearly on the same level. It was in operation 1400 years before it finally fell into disuse, and there still exist traces of this very ancient work which had probably been destroyed by the inundations to which Egypt is peculiarly subject. Napoleon I. was the first in modern times to suggest the re-establishment of the canal, and one of his engineers, M. Lempere, made a survey and reported on the work which it afterward fell to de Lesseps to carry out.

In 1854, de Lesseps' project was matured and Viceroy Mahmoud Said Pacha, gave him a commission to form "The Universal Suez Canal Company," the canal to be built between Port Said on the Mediterranean and the port of Suez on the Red Sea. The route lay for eighty-eight miles along the valley or depression containing Lake Menzaleh, Lake Timseh and the "Bitter Lakes," and there were no serious difficulties to be encountered, no mountains, and hardly even a hillock. Still, there were other obstacles, one of the most serious being the absence of a supply of sweet water for the 30,000 workmen. In 1869, when Napoleon III. was at the very zenith of his power, the canal was completed, at a cost of $100,000,000, and vast tracts of arid land were flooded and navigated by vessels of the largest class.

The triumph of de Lesseps was complete, but was a triumph dearly won. He had cut out a route for the nations of Europe to India, but it had been at a frightful cost of human life. Thousands of native laborers, who had been forced by the Egyptian Government to work on the canal, perished wretchedly in the desert valleys. Their bodies were flung aside like carrion. Many died from sheer exhaustion, others from thirst, and still others from the brutality of the taskmasters. When remonstrated with for his share in this frightful immolation, de Lesseps looked surprised and said with a smile that disclosed a cruel heart: "Well, what of it? They're only fellaheen!"

The same brutal disregard of human suffering that prevailed at Suez, where de Lesseps' Egyptian laborers sank by thousands under the lash, was a revolting feature of the Panama Canal project. It has been said, and no doubt truthfully, that every foot of the excavations was marked by human blood, and that every sleeper in the construction roads represented a life. There are individuals so callous to all human feeling that they care not at what sacrifice of the weak the strong win their victories. The Pharaohs who reared the pyramids spent hundreds of thousands of lives in the task, in order that they might transmit their own fame to posterity. Had they been remonstrated with, they might have replied with a proud curving of the imperial lips: "They were only fellaheen!"

At every five or six miles along the Suez Canal there is a "passing-place" to enable large vessels to moor for the night or to round to in order that others may pass. These and all other matters relating to the canal are regulated from Suez, Port Said, or Ismailia. The latter is a town nearly in the centre of the Isthmus of Suez on the western shore of Lake Timseh, and has come into prominence in recent years in connection with the Canal. The illustration on the first page is from a photograph secured by Rev. Dr. Talmage, who, with the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, passed through the Canal between Ismailia and Port Said, while visiting the East a few years ago. It shows the Ismailia steamship landing, and the hotel building, half hidden among trees which extend in umbrageous avenues through the entire length of the pleasant town. Ismailia has a population of probably 4,000. It has broad paved streets and regular squares bordered with trees. On three sides of the town are flourishing gardens. The principal thoroughfare is the Quai Mehemet Ali which lies along the banks of the Canal, and which contains among other notable residences, the chalet long occupied by de Lesseps. The town has a governor and a vice-regal palace.

On the first page of this issue, our illustrations show the Suez Canal in outline, together with a scene at Port Said, the entrance, and a portrait of Khedive Ismail, who governed Egypt at the time of its completion. On this page is a portrait of Count de Lesseps, taken from a recent photograph. He has lived beyond the appointed span being now nearly 90 years old—an age at which a life of usefulness might well be crowned with honor and veneration, instead of being obscured in shame and obloquy, the result of deeds so flagrant that even his own kindly compatriots could not pass them by unpunished. Such a remarkable history as that of Ferdinand de Lesseps, overtaken by justice, old and dying, carries its own moral.

COUNT FERDINAND DE LESSEPS.

RELIGION AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

IN the general programme of the World's Congresses, just issued, religion has a prominent place. The sixteenth department is devoted exclusively to the progress of religion, and it already embraces a great many divisions while others are now in course of formation. Among the denominations to be represented are the Baptist, Congregational, Christian, Evangelical Association, Evangelical Church, Friends, Jews, Lutheran General Council, Lutheran General Synod, Lutheran Synodical Conference, Methodist Episcopal, New Jerusalem, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Reformed Church of North America, Reformed Dutch Church, Reformed Episcopal, Swedish Evangelical, United Brethren, Missions, Evangelical Alliance, Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, Society of Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Brotherhood of Christian Unity, Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The World's Parliament of Religions will commence on Monday, September 11, 1893, and will continue for seventeen days or more thereafter. The programme will be four-fold. The first part will consist of the presentation, in one of the large audience rooms of the Art Palace, of the grounds of sympathy and union or fraternal relations among the religious bodies of the world. The second part will consist of a concurrent presentation to the world, as represented by the attendance in the other large audience room of the Art Palace, of the faith and work of the different participating religious denominations. Separate sessions will be assigned to each denomination for this purpose. The third part of the programme will consist of informal conferences in the smaller halls of the Art Palace, in which further information in regard to any of the religious denominations may be sought by persons interested therein. The fourth part of the programme will consist of Denominational Congresses proper, in which each denomination will, in such way as it may deem best, set forth more fully and at large its peculiar history, achievements and purposes. The Denominational Congresses are expected to continue for at least one week each, and to accommodate them it is expected that perhaps one hundred Chicago churches will be called into requisition.

These four programmes are expected to continue concurrently in a regular order during the entire period to be occupied by the World's Religious Congresses of 1893, each denomination to hold its denominational congress during the week in which its presentation to the World's Parliament of Religions is to be made. For example, the Protestant Episcopal presentation in the Art Palace will be made on Wednesday, September 20, 1893, and its denominational congress will be held during that week. The Missionary Congresses will commence on Thursday, September 28; Y. M. C. A., October 6; Evangelical Alliance, October 8 to 15; Christian Endeavor, October 9 to 12.

Eastern Wedding Customs.

VEILS are almost universally worn by the women of Oriental countries. In ancient times the veil was adopted only in exceptional cases, either as an article of adornment or by betrothed maidens in the presence of their future husbands. In Egypt, it has become an essential article of female attire, and in Mohammedan countries it is scupulously worn, in obedience to the mandate of the Koran. The veil most commonly worn by the women of Palestine is usually of stout white cloth, strong and ample, and serves a variety of purposes. Some of the styles—of which there is a great variety—fold over the shoulders and others may be wrapped around the body, while still others practically envelop the entire person. Indoors, veils of scantier proportions and finer texture are worn.

BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM

All through Syria and Arabia the veil is in general use, and some of the face-veils worn are of white muslin, richly embroidered with colored silks and gold and hanging down nearly to the ground. Occasionally they are of black silk or crape ornamented with gold coins, pearls or spangles. Rank and condition are indicated by the quality of the material, unmarried ladies of the better class wearing white silk, and married ladies darker material, while the poorer women content themselves with white calico.

Wedding veils have been used from immemorial days. In some countries, in ancient times, the veil was spread over both grown and bride during part of the service. A bride's veil is the symbol of modesty and obedience. In some parts of Palestine there is a custom observed at Moslem weddings, which is shown in the illustration on this page. After the ceremony, the unveiling of the bride takes place. The groom, with a sharp sword cuts the veil from top to bottom and as it falls apart, revealing the blushing girl, he raises it with his disengaged hand and stoops forward to offer the kiss of salutation. A similar custom prevails among the Druses of Lebanon. In some places, a still older custom is for the bridegroom to strike the bride lightly with the flat sword, before cutting the veil, and a show of threats and violence is sometimes indulged in, by way of demonstrating the duty of the wife to obey her husband. Still another custom, now rarely observed is for the bride to hold a spray of olive high against the doorpost, while the groom cuts it in two with a dexterous sweep of his sword, just missing her fingers.

GOD IN NATURE.

THERE is a small mysterious voice
That whispers in the wind;
It speaks of God's divinity
To every mortal mind.

It speaks in mellow, silver tones,
When waters softly flow—
It thunders in the roaring flood,
And shrieks when tempests blow.

It whispers when a gentle breeze,
Roams 'mong the forest trees;
When lofty pine and maples sigh,
When fluttering fall the leaves.

When seared and old and lifeless they,
Lie moulding one and all,
That voice in solemn accents says:
"Thus every man shall fall."

STRENGTH IN SACRED SONG.

DO you know that a singing church is always a triumphant church? If a congregation is silent during the exercise, or partially silent, it is the silence of death. If when the hymn is given out you hear the faint hum of here and there a father and mother in Israel, while the vast majority are silent, that minister of Christ who is presiding needs to have a very strong constitution if he does not get the chills. He needs not only the grace of God, but nerves like whalebone. It is amazing how some people with voice enough to discharge all their duties in the world, when they come into the house of God have no voice to discharge this duty. I really believe that if the Church of Christ could rise up and sing as it ought to sing, that where we have a hundred souls brought into the kingdom of Christ there would be a thousand. How was it in olden time? Cajetan said: "Luther conquered us by his songs."

I am far from believing that music ought always to be positively religious. Refined art has opened places where music has been secularized, and lawfully so. The drawing-room, the musical club, the orchestra, the concert, by the gratification of pure taste, and the productions of harmless amusement, and the improvement of talent have become very forces in the advancement of our civilization. Music has as much right to laugh in Surrey Gardens as it has to pray in St. Paul's. In the kingdom of nature we have the glad fifing of the wind as well as the long metre psalm of the thunder. But, while all this is so, every observer has noticed that this art which God intended for the improvement of the ear and the voice and the head and the heart, has often been impressed into the service of error. Tartini, the musical composer, dreamed one night that Satan snatched from his hand an instrument, and played upon it something very sweet—a dream that has often been fulfilled in our day, the voice and the instruments that ought to have been devoted to Christ, captured from the church and applied to purposes of sin.

The vast majority of people singing in church never want anybody else to hear them sing. Everybody is waiting for somebody else to do his duty. If we all sang, then inaccuracies that are evident when only a few sing would be drowned out. God asks you to do as well as you can, and then, if you get the wrong pitch or keep wrong time, he will forgive any deficiency of the ear and imperfection of the voices. Angels will not laugh if you should lose your place in the musical scale, or come in at the close a bar behind.

There are three schools of singing, I am told—the German school, the Italian school, and the French school of singing. Now, I would like to add a fourth school, and that is the school of Christ. The voice of a contrite, broken heart, although it may not be able to stand human criticism, makes better music to God's ear than the most artistic performance, when the heart is wanting.

TROUBLE, THE GREAT EDUCATOR.

MISFORTUNE and trials are great educators. A young doctor comes into the sick-room where there is a dying child. Perhaps he is very rough in his prescription, and very rough in his manner, and rough in the feeling of the pulse, and rough in his answer to the mother's anxious question; but years roll on, and there has been one dead in his own house; and now he comes into the sick-room, and with tearful eye he looks at the dying child, and he says, "Oh, how this reminds me of my Charlie!" Trouble, the great educator. Sorrow—I see its touch in the grandest painting; I hear its tremor in the sweetest song; I feel its power in the mightiest argument.

Grecian mythology said that the fountain of Hippocrene was struck out by the foot of the winged horse Pegasus. I have often noticed in life that the brightest and most beautiful fountains of Christian comfort and spiritual life have been struck out by the iron-shod hoof of disaster and calamity. I see Daniel's courage best by the flash of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. I see Paul's prowess best when I find him on the foundering ship under the glare of the lightning in the breakers of Melita. God crowns his children amid the howling of wild beasts and the chopping of blood-splashed guillotine and the crackling fires of martyrdom. It took the persecutions of Marcus Aurelius to develop Polycarp and Justin Martyr. It took the pope's bull and the cardinal's curse and the world's anathema to develop Martin Luther. It took all the hostilities against the Scotch Covenanters and the fury of Lord Claverhouse to develop James Renwick, and Andrew Melville, and Hugh McKail, the glorious martyrs of Scotch history. It took the stormy sea, and the December blasts and the desolate New England coast, and the war-whoop of savages, to show forth the prowess of the Pilgrim Fathers—

> When amid the storms they sung,
> And the stars heard and the sea,
> And the echoing arches of the dim wood
> Rang with the anthem of the free.

It took all our past national distresses, and it takes all our present national sorrows, to lift up our nation on that high career where it will march along after the foreign aristocracies that have mocked and the tyrannies that have jeered, shall be swept down under the omnipotent wrath of God, who hates despotism, and who, by the strength of his own red right arm, will make all men free. And so it is individually, and in the family, and in the Church, and in the world, that through darkness and storm and trouble men, women, churches, nations, are developed.

DIVINE PATIENCE.

WRITTEN all over the earth, written all over history are the words, "Divine forbearance, divine leniency, divine long-suffering." I wonder that God did not burn this world up two thousand years ago, scattering its ashes into immensity, its aerolites dropping into other worlds to be kept in their museums as specimens of a defunct planet. People sometimes talk of God as though he were hasty in his judgments and as though he snapped men up quick. Oh, no! He waited one hundred and twenty years for the people to get into the ark, and warned them all the time—one hundred and twenty years—then the flood came. Patience antediluvian, patience postdiluvian, patience in times Adamic, Abrahamic, Mosaic, Davidic, Pauline, Lutheran, Whitefieldian. Patience with men and nations. Patience with barbarisms and civilizations. Six thousand years of patience! Overtopping attribute of God, all of whose attributes are immeasurable. Why do the wicked live? That their overthrow may be the more impressive and climacteric. They must pile up their mischief until all the community shall see it, until the nation shall see it, until all the world shall see it. The higher it goes up the harder it will come down and the grander will be the divine vindication.

God will not allow sin to sneak out of the world. God will not allow it merely to resign and quit. This shall not be a case that goes by default because no one appears against it. God will arraign it, handcuff it, try it, bring against it the verdict of all the good, and then gibbet it so high up that if one-half of the gibbet stood on Mount Washington and the other on the Himalayas, it would not be any more conspicuous.

THE PRESENT.

OUR opportunities of getting good are flying away. We treat the Bible as though we were going to have it a great while; but we are not. It has been handed to us with all its wealth of promise and invitation and warnings. All the influence the Bible will have upon us will be gone in a very short time. We are going beyond its reach. If we have put into practice the truths which that Bible has taught us, all shall be well; if not, all shall be wrong. O, what an accountability before God, for the simple fact that we have such a Bible so suited to soothe us in our troubles, and coax us away from our sins, and qualify us for all our duties. Its work for us will soon be done. The door of prayer is going to be shut. After we have passed a certain point, there will be no more praying. If there is any advantage in supplicating God's mercy, that advantage is a present advantage, not a future one. If the closet of prayer is neglected, if the praying-circle is not properly improved, God will bring us at last into an account for the neglect of our privilege, and the door of prayer which has been so mercifully set open before our souls for years, will be closed for ever So, if there are any petitions which we ought to put up for our own souls or for the souls of our associates, we had better offer them now. Do not take it for granted that because Jesus sits on the throne of mercy, and we are invited to pour out our wants before him, that we shall always have the advantage. It is a present privilege, not belonging to the great future.

So it is with all our Christian associations; they are coming to a terminus. It is impossible that we be associated with Christian men and not get some religious advantage. We have had this privilege year after year, some of us hardly knowing what it is to be outside of a Christian association; but we soon shall have shaken hands in this world for the last time. The roll of our mercies will soon be made up. All the good you are going to do us, you had better do soon. "The end of all things is at hand."

But be of good cheer. However attractive our earthly surroundings may be, and however good our health, and however pleasant our friendships, we could not endure forever the wear and tear and strain of this earthly conflict. God has good things in reserve for us; be of good courage; get in the habit of looking forward toward the rest which Christ hath provided for all those who love him, and soon the darkness and the toil and sin of earth will end in the brightness and rest and holiness of heaven.

YATMAN'S COLUMN

GOOD WOMEN.

I DON'T believe in boycotts as a rule, but I know of one I heartily approved of. In a certain town the men, young and old, ran wild after drink; open saloons everywhere, and openly visited. The girls of riper years got together: they saw how the happiness of other women had been destroyed by the curse; they well knew if they married it must be from the men of that city, as a rule, and they proposed to die old maids, rather than to suffer torments married. So they resolved that no fellow could have their company, so long as he visited a saloon. They agreed to stand by their decision, cost what it might.

The result was the young men said, "if the girls can get along without us, we can get along without them," and feminine sweetness sat alone behind the shutters, as the smart young men walked by.

Now it took about two weeks to straighten things out. When it comes to a dead choice by a man, between drink, or a good, pure, sensible girl, he takes but one view, and decides aright. So one night a door-bell rang, and he said to her, "I don't drink any more: can I come in?" Which was the happier, I can't tell; but that was the signal for a break in the ranks, and what was the result. A number of saloons in that town closed, for want of patronage; and you go there now and you will find happy wives, not in houses, but in homes; for there is a great difference between a house and a home.

Mothers, fathers, see to it—that the company your children keep is good company.

Let a noble girl fall in love with a man, whose vices are hidden from her, and once she loves him, then all is too late. The story of what a woman's love will do, need not be told here.

To the Christian girl, let me say, Keep the company of Christian men. Let me tell thee a tale, as they say in the South.

It's a sad one: A noble, Christian girl was thrown in the company of a man who, in manners and dress and conversation, had every appearance of being a gentleman. He was a man of profession, a physician. Whenever she wanted to go to church he took her, and to prayer-meeting, too; he preferred the theatre, to be sure, but her choice was his, for he was wooing. They married. That man struck her, one day, a blow from which she never recovered. "With his fist?" No, no. That would have been kindness, compared to what came.

They were at dinner. She asked him to go with her to prayer-meeting that night; for since marriage he had not gone, save two or three times, long since. He said he was too busy—that was his usual excuse; but to-day, when she asked him, he said: "Look here, wife, you don't really believe in that, do you? This praying nonsense, and a personal God." "What! what!" said she, "don't you believe in God?" "No, of course not; this church business is all bosh!"

"What! You don't mean to tell me you are an infidel! That I have married an infidel? Oh!"

He picked her up in a dead faint. It was weeks before the color came back again to her face; then it slowly faded away, and has never returned. She is an old woman now, the wrinkles have plowed deep in her face; she dresses in black.

Four children were born unto them, all boys. They all took after their father. His office being in the house, he met them much, and instilled his notions into their brains and hearts. They have no children now. They have all died—died between the ages of fifteen and twenty; and each died as he had lived—godless, hopeless. She saw them all wrapped in Christless shrouds and put in Christless graves. And often, alone in her room, you will hear her sob and wring her hands, repeating the third chapter of Job, saying: "I wish I had never been born." To have given the world four boys, and all lived and died without hope, is more than she can bear and she longs for death to end her earthly sorrow, yet dreads it, too.

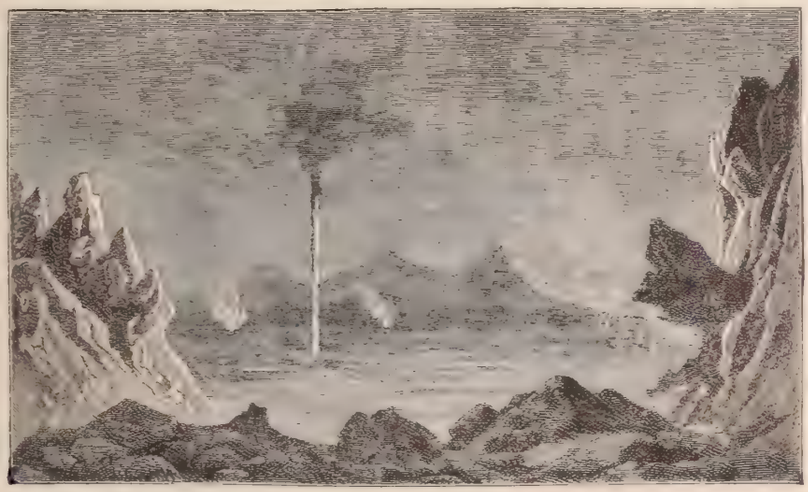
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE HAWAIIAN VOLCANO.

ON one of the islands which are apparently to become a territory of the United States is the volcano the crater of which is depicted in the illustration on this page. It is called Kilauea and is on the slope of Mauna Loa on the island of Hawaii. It is one of the natural wonders of the world which attracts visitors from all parts of the earth. The nearest town to it is Hilo, thirty miles distant. Four thousand feet above the level of the sea is the crater with its great lake of restless fire which the natives call Halemaumau. It lies a thousand feet below the jagged line of rocks which surround it, like a great basin three miles across. The traveller descends the side over cold shiny lava coiled in fantastic shapes. At first he passes through stunted vegetation, but half-way down nothing grows, and he steps carefully from one petrified wave to another, until the floor of the crater is reached. The surface is broken by elevations from forty to eighty feet high. It looks bleak and lifeless, but not for long. The prief periods of inaction during which the lava cools and crusts is broken by upheavals and here and there a jet of steam rises fifty feet or more, molten lava follows it and the bed of the crater is broken up like blocks of ice in a spring flood. Huge masses of lava are tossed about on the seething sea of fire and rumblings like thunder echo across the gorge. Horrible fiery waves wash against the sides to leave another crust on the hard rocks, and then subside into brief and treacherous quiescence. Higher up, on the very top of the mountain, ten thousand feet above, is the terminal crater Mokuaweoweo, which is seldom active, but which is more dreaded than Kilauea, as irruptions from it are more violent than from the lower crater. A memorable incident is associated with Kilauea. It is sacred to the Goddess Pele and an ancient tradition existed that anybody who visited the crater without first sacrificing to Pele would be engulfed in the fiery lake. But in 1825, Kapiolani, a Hawaiian princess who had become a convert to Christianity defied the wrath of the dreaded goddess and in spite of the entreaties of her husband and friends went up to the crater. She returned safely and the power of Pele was no more a terror to the people. It is difficult to form a just estimate of the faith and courage of this noble woman, but those are best able to do so who have refused in some crisis to adopt worldly methods of saving themselves from ruin or disgrace, and in spite of the advice of worldly friends have trusted in God alone to deliver them. (Psalm 20: 7.)



HALEMAUMAU, THE LAKE OF FIRE ON THE VOLCANO OF KILAUEA, IN HAWAII.

A Bride Blindfolded.

A STRANGE suit for the annulment of a marriage is set down for hearing in the City Court of Brooklyn, N.Y. It is brought by an Armenian woman who came to this country with her husband two years ago. She is twenty-three years old, while her husband is over sixty. She says that she was married in Armenia in 1885, and, according to the custom of the country, her husband was selected by her parents. She was assured by them that he was all that a young woman could desire, but she was not permitted to see him, even at the wedding ceremony. On that occasion she wore the usual Armenian bride's costume of flowing robes and a thick veil. In addition, her eyes were bandaged under the veil, as is sometimes done in that country. Not until the ceremony was over and the union irrevocable were her eyes uncovered and she saw her husband. She was grievously disappointed, and during the years that have elapsed since then, she has not become reconciled to her lot. When she arrived in America she heard of the existing provisions for divorce, and she has now petitioned for the annulment of her marriage. Whether an American court has power to declare a marriage void which was celebrated in another country, according to the customs of that country, is matter of dispute. It is said that the issue of the trial is being awaited with anxiety by a number of Armenian women here, who were married in the same way, and who will apply for relief if the court decides that a marriage is null and void if the bride was blindfolded at the ceremony. Their number cannot be very large, but what an inundation of cases the court would have, if it were ready to dissolve every marriage in which the wife's eyes were blinded at the ceremony by ambition, pride, or avarice to the true character of her husband and the nature of the marriage relation (IICor.6:14!)

A Postal Experiment.

A PARTY of distinguished guests assembled at the Philadelphia Post Office on Feb. 17 to witness the trial of the first pneumatic tube ever used for mail transit in the United States. It is an ordinary water-pipe six inches in diameter and over half a mile in length connecting the general post office with one of the stations. The interior of the pipe has been bored smooth, so that the steel carriers may fit closely and no air be lost. The carrier used holds half a peck of mail matter and weighs when loaded about fifteen pounds. A pressure of compressed air of six pounds to the square inch sends the carrier through the tube at the rate of a mile in two minutes. At the trial on Friday, Postmaster-General Wanamaker was present and sent the first package through the tube. It consisted of a Bible, wrapped in an American flag with the following message: "First use of the pneumatic tube in the United States is to send through it a copy of the Holy Scriptures, the greatest message ever given to the world. Covering the Bible is the American flag, the emblem of freedom of 65,000,000 happy people." This was safely received at the station and several other packages were then sent and finally the regular evening mail. The innovation is only one more illustration of the tendency of modern civilization to facilitate communication between men. The Postmaster General's object lesson was therefore significant in showing that the first and best use to be made of every new facility is to spread the knowledge of God. (II. Peter 1: 19-21.)

Tributes to the Dead Bishop.

A REMARKABLE meeting was held in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, on February 16. It was held "in loving memory of Bishop Phillips Brooks." The vast building was crowded in every part by an audience of rich and poor, and representatives of many races and creeds. Among the clergymen who were present and spoke in affectionate, reverential and admiring terms of the deceased bishop were an Episcopalian, a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Congregationalist, a Roman Catholic and a Jew. Each told how Bishop Brooks was mourned and had been honored in the community the speaker represented. The genius of the dead preacher, his matchless eloquence, his brotherly kindness, his broad tolerance and his high ideals were celebrated in glowing words. Every speaker showed, by his manner and language, his consciousness of personal bereavement in the death of the great leader. It was an uncommon and significant tribute to come from men so widely separated by difference of creed from each other and from the man they honored. It shows how much stronger, as a cohesive force, is personal love and regard than is a creed. That is the secret of the survival and growth of Christianity. In spite of the division of sects the Church of Christ has been a unit in loyalty to its divine Founder. (I. Cor. 1: 10-13.)

A Testator's Oversight.

A MUCH disappointed lady is living in Buffalo, N. Y. A few days ago, she presented for probate the will of a recently deceased gentleman of whom she was the adopted daughter. When the will was examined it was found to be unsigned. It had been regularly drawn and was dated six months before. Two persons had affixed their signatures to it as witnesses, but neither of them had observed that the testator himself had not signed it. He had sealed it up and put it away in his safe, as if he supposed it was a valid instrument, which would take effect after his death. In the will, he bequeathed the whole of his large estate to his adopted daughter. The omission of the signature will, however, bring the estate under the intestate law, and as, being only an adopted daughter she has no claim under it, the estate will go to distant relatives of the testator who are living abroad. Such disappointment of his promised inheritance can never befall the Christian. Though his claim too is one of adoption and he is sometimes tempted to doubt, he has no reason for doing so, as the covenant under which he will inherit is solemnly attested. (Heb. 6: 17-19.)

Long-Lived Germs.

A GIRL living at a farm-house near Groton, Conn., was recently stricken with small-pox under peculiar circumstances. She had not been in contact with any person afflicted with the disease, nor is there any case in the neighborhood for many miles around. On inquiry it was learned that thirty years ago a person living in the farm-house suffered from the disease, and occupied the room in which the girl had been sleeping. That person recovered, and the house was fumigated and the walls of the room were repapered. The family left the house subsequently, and the present occupant took possession. A few weeks ago the paper was removed from the walls of the room in which the small-pox patient was ill thirty years ago, and soon afterward the girl who slept in the room was seized with the disease. The physician attending her is convinced that the infection came from germs which had been lying dormant behind the paper for thirty years. The disinfection of the house could not have been so thorough as was supposed, and a similar mistake is often made as to moral and spiritual change. Mere reformation of character and life is sometimes only repression of the evil, as the paper covered the germs on the walls; as Christ said to Nicodemus: "Ye must be born again" (John 3: 7.)

A Marriage in a Hospital.

THE patients in a hospital at Elizabeth, N. J., witnessed an unusual spectacle on Feb. 15. Dr. Cobb, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that town came to the hospital and was conducted to a bed in the accident ward where lay a patient who was suffering from a broken leg. Two ladies were at the bedside and the clergyman had been sent for to marry the patient to one of them. The other acted as brides-maid and the house-surgeon acted as best man. The patients in the other beds raised themselves to look at the interesting scene. The simple service was soon performed and the usual congratulations being tendered, the group separated, the newly made wife alone remaining to minister to her injured husband. On being asked for an explanation of the ceremony taking place there, the bride said that she and the patient had been engaged for some time and that day had been fixed for their wedding. The fact that the bridegroom had been hurt did not appear to them a sufficient reason for deferring the ceremony. It was a loving wife-like remark and we can but wish that some who have often promised to give themselves to Christ were likeminded and did not allow unforeseen circumstances to prevent their keeping their promise. (Luke 9: 59-62.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Ohio Wesleyan University and the churches of Delaware, have been enjoying a revival under the leadership of the Rev. A.S. Keene, D.D. From one hundred and fifty to two hundred persons were at the altar each evening during the closing nights of the service.

News has been received at San Francisco of a new rising against the missionaries at Nanking, China. The mob gathered around the Methodist Chapel, destroyed its interior furnishings, and were preparing to set it on fire when the authorities interfered and dispersed them.

At the ordination of Rev. C. F. Ollson, a scholarly young Swede, as pastor of the Swedish Church in Ashtabula, Ohio, the ordination prayer was quite international in character. The hands of American, Welsh, Swedish and Finnish ministers were laid on his head. The examination, which was strong and thorough, proved satisfactory, though it was conducted through an interpreter.

The work of Evangelist F. E. Smiley, at East Liverpool, O., has been productive of lasting good. The meetings in the Rink are being continued by the pastors of the various churches, which united in the movement. Rev. W. H. Locke, pastor of the First M. E. Church, writes us that such scenes as were witnessed during Mr. Smiley's services are seen only once in a life-time, and once seen are never forgotten.

The union revival meetings at Pilgrim Church, Worcester, Mass., under the lead of Dr. L. W. Munhall, were well attended, the interest increasing from day to day. The work was especially useful among Christians. Sunday afternoon a meeting for young people was held. The meetings were in the Old South Church. Bible readings were given by Dr. Munhall every afternoon except Monday and Saturday. The women held prayer meetings every morning at private houses.

A remarkable religious interest has developed in St. Louis, since the week of prayer. All through January the pastors of the city held united meetings to pray for an outpouring of the Spirit. Early in February three Evangelists were induced to visit the city and hold meetings. Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt was at the Third Baptist Church; Major Cole at Dr. Brookes's Church, and Evangelist Brown at Lafayette Park. A very deep interest has been aroused which is spreading throughout the city.

A petition for "Peace and Work" has been drawn up in view of the appeal of the prosecutors in the Briggs case to the General Assembly. The signers express the gravest fears lest the continuance of the controversy should hinder the usefulness of the church and diminish her honor. They are not all partisans of Dr. Briggs, and they do not take any attitude as to the merits of the controversy. The plea has been signed by 235 ministers of NewYork, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, &c.

Mr. Chauncey M. Depew, in speaking the other day of the revival at Peekskill, N. Y., said that he remembered the revival there o 1857, and knew well the people who were converted at that time. In the thirty-six years that have passed since then a very small proportion had gone back to their old ways. The great mass of the converts had remained faithful and many young men who had been converted then went into the ministry. Such testimony from so prominent a man as to th permanence of revival influence is very important.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman closed his meetings at Peekskill, N. Y., on Feb. 16th. It is nearly forty years since that town saw so extensive and deep-seated a revival. Six churches joined in the work. The meetings were held three times a day in the Depew Opera House. Stores were closed early in the evening to allow of all attending who wished to do so, and on Feb. 14th, they were closed at noon and the remainder of the day devoted to revival work. It is believed that on that day alone there were more than eighty conversions. The Catholic priest of the town encouraged his people to attend the services. From Peekskill Dr. Chapman went to Springfield, Ohio.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

SAD SOWING=GLAD REAPING.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." Ps. 126: 6.

This psalm was doubtless composed soon after the return from the Babylonian captivity. The first group of colonists had returned. The permission to return was so unexpected, and all the circumstances were so providential, that when they actually found themselves in the land of their hopes and prayers they were like those that dreamed. It seemed too good to be true. God had interposed in a marvelous way, and their highest hopes were more than realized. With thoughts like these the psalm opens. But the psalmist goes on, and represents the returned colonists as offering earnest prayer for those left behind. As a matter of fact, they came back in various groups. Some came under Cyrus, some under Darius, and still others under Xerxes and his successors. As Perowne has observed, the first arrivals were as a trickling rill amid the desert wastes; so the prayer bursts from the psalmist's lips that God would send them back as mighty streams swollen by the winter rains. During their absence the land was neglected. It was overgrown with weeds and the seed had not been sown. Still, faith could overcome these difficulties. The joy of harvest would more than repay the sorrow of sowing. And so in the fifth verse of the psalm he says, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." The text is just an expansion of the thought contained in the fifth verse. In the text the singular is substituted for the plural in order to make the individual sower more distinct. In presenting this subject we shall give two pictures, which we shall entitle, "The Outgoing Sower and the Incoming Reaper."

First picture

"The Outgoing Sower."

These pictures are not given in the text simply in outline. The psalmist, with the pen of inspiration, has completely filled in all their parts. Let us follow him in this inspired description. The first element of the description is expressed in the words, "He that goeth forth." There is here a literal, a verbal accuracy. We know that in that ancient time and Oriental land the harvest fields were often at a great distance from the husbandman's humble home. Sometimes he was obliged to go six or eight miles in order to reach the ground which he cultivated. Large companies for purposes of mutual protection, went out in the early dawn from their homes and returned again as the evening shades were falling. Often these farmers were obliged to protect themselves by deadly weapons as they went to or returned from their fields. Something similar to this was seen in Europe during the Middle Ages. It was literal truth in our Lord's parable when he said, "Behold, a sower went forth to sow."

Spiritually this is true always and everywhere. The sincere sower of the good seed of the kingdom must often leave the ranks of ordinary church members. It must be sadly admitted that the rank and file of church workers do but little for the Master. The seeker for souls must be willing to step out from and far in advance of the line which the average worker reaches. Take out of our very best churches a score or more of earnest workers, and little seed would [illegible] When Carey, the great Baptist missionary, arose from his shoemaker's bench, inspired with holy love [illegible] halls, and theatres, has had to suffer from secret dislike, if not from open opposition, on the part of many who bear the Christian name. But men who know the constraining love of Christ, and who feel the value of immortal souls, must not fear such opposition. Conscious of the divine call, they must be willing to go forth and sow the precious seed in the Master's name. If they feel that God is with them, that God is sending them, they will not fear opposition; and they may be assured that they will yet return with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them.

The Tearful Worker.

The next element in the picture is that the sower is represented as weeping. The language is very strong. One commentator puts it in this form, "may indeed weep every step he goes." It has also been rendered, "Takes no step of his way without weeping." The double infinite is employed "to mark the continuance of the action." There is also a literal and verbal accuracy in this strong language. Sometimes the scarcity of the seed makes the sower well-nigh a weeper as he scatters it in the furrow. The harvests of the previous year have been poor; but by the exercise of great economy the humble husbandman has enabled his family to subsist through the year. What shall he now do? Not to sow the seed is to have no bread for the coming year; but to sow it is like taking the bread out of his children's mouths for the present year. This condition of things was seen in Russia last year. This is the sower's trying position. We know that sometimes in early and in recent days the government has been obliged to step in and furnish seed-corn, even as in the days of Joseph in Egypt. In all of this there is much to make sowing sad work. But, again, the extreme danger to which the sower was exposed made his labor one of sadness. As Dr. Thomson tells us in "The Land and the Book," the sower was often obliged to drop the plough and seize the sword. His fields, as we have already seen, were far from his home, and so near the lawless desert. As in Job's day, when the oxen were ploughing and the asses feeding beside them, the Sabeans came and took them all away, so often since fierce hordes from the deserts have swept down upon the peaceful husbandman, and robbed him of seed and implements, sparing only his life. In all of this there was much to make the work of sowing also a work of weeping.

Causes of Sorrow.

But still again, the frequent fruitlessness of the labor made it sad toil. The land had gone to weeds, the ground was fallow. It was no easy task to break up this stubborn soil. Their once fruitful land was barren, and its cultivation was a work of the utmost toil. Their implements were poor and inefficient; their oxen were small and weak, and their own skill very unlike that of the farmer of modern days. For these and similar reasons the literal sowing of the seed might be called a work of weeping. The spiritual sower has also his times of sadness. He is often saddened because of the barrenness and deadness of his own heart. When he remembers the matchless love of Christ for him and others, when he remembers the value of an immortal soul, when he looks upon the insensibility of men without God and without hope in the world, he may well weep day and night. Often his prayer is, "Oh that my head were waters and my eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people." He is also saddened because of the indifference of many Christians about him. They bear the name of Christ, but fail to possess the Spirit of Christ. It is beautifully said of Jesus that, "He went about doing good." They do not follow in his footsteps. Weary with his journey, and oppressed by the heat of the noonday sun, he is still able to use the precious seed at Jacob's well; but many who now profess to be his followers grow weary in well-doing and soon utterly abandon the task. The sower of the spiritual seed is often saddened, too, because so much of it falls, in unfruitful soil. When he has sown it with prayers and tears, and expects to reap a harvest of souls for the glory of Master, he discovers with unspeakable sadness that some of it has fallen by the wayside, and the fowls of the air have taken away the good seed; while still other seed has fallen into stony places, and by and by the sun of persecution destroys the tender blade; while still other seed is choked by the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches. These things sadden the sower's heart. When converts run well for a season and then fall out of the way, a sword pierces the heart of the earnest Christian worker.

The Use of Tears.

There is, however, marvelous power in this element of tenderness in seed-sowing. I have known farmers who wished for a speedy growth, steep the seed in water before they put it into the ground. When sown it was ready at once to sprout, because of this previous preparation. When men can baptize the good seed of the kingdom in their tears and prayers, they may expect soon to see it spring up and bring forth fruit, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold. This was an element of power in the life of the Lord himself. To what times do we look in Christ's life as occasions which most powerfully move us? Is it to the wonderful displays of his power when he hushed the raging storm, and the wind ceased and the sea became a pavement of adamant? or shall we see him in a still greater display of his power? The war in the human breast is wilder than that which sweeps over the ocean's surface. Christ will prove his power, not only over this war of the elements, but he will bring peace to the raging storm in a human soul. The man who had lived among the tombs, who had made the way impassable, who had cut himself with stones, who had broken chains as if they had been ropes of sand, is seen clothed, sitting in his right mind at Jesus' feet. These displays of power awaken our enthusiasm and stir our tender emotions. But not here shall Christ most move the world's heart.

The Tears of Jesus

have melted men's hearts through all the centuries. Three times during his earthly life did he weep. The first two instances are recorded in the Gospels; for the last instance we must go to the letter to the Hebrews. The first were tears of family friendship; the second were tears of patriotic fervor; the last were tears of sacrificial love. The first tears were a rill that flowed for an afflicted family, when Christ wept at the grave of Lazarus; the second were a rivulet streaming forth for a doomed nation, when he beheld Jerusalem and wept over it; the third were a mighty river that has swept across the world, when he bowed in Gethsemane "with strong crying and tears" for a world's woe. This element of tenderness gives power to every Christian effort today. There is often more power in a warm grasp of the hand, in the tremulous voice, and in the tearful eye, than in the thunders of eloquence and the arguments of logic. Just at this point many workers for Christ are shorn of their power. They are stately and cold. They lack the sympathy which is born of love for Christ and for the souls of men. If we are to draw men with the cords of a man, we must have the bands of true Christian love.

Love is the best Logic.

Oh, for that kindness which comes from communion with Christ, and from appreciation of the value and loss of immortal souls! He who sows the precious seed in this spirit shall reap the golden harvest. We remember an incident which illustrates this thought. An earnest Christian was very anxious for the conversion of a sceptical blacksmith. He determined to visit him in his shop; he would fill his mouth with convincing arguments and thus refute all the blacksmith's positions. He came. His heart was overflowing with love for his neighbor's soul. He took him by the hand; but his emotions choked his utterance except to say, "I am greatly concerned for your soul." He could say no more. It was enough. The arrow went home. "Concerned for my soul; then I ought to be concerned," thought the convicted sinner. Soon he was consulting with his Christian wife; soon he was journeying to his friend's house a burdened and seeking sinner. That night they knelt together at Jesus' feet, and the sceptic found joy and peace in believing. He could not resist his neighbor's loving solicitude. Love is the best logic. It furnishes unanswerable arguments. Gentleness is greatness; meekness is mightiness. Oh, for Christ's tenderness!

Another element in this picture is that the sower goeth forth bearing precious seed. The idea suggested by the word "precious" is not found in the original word. The seed is precious, however, both in its literal and spiritual sense. Strictly speaking, it is a draught or a drawing of seed that is here mentioned. It has sometimes been called the "seed-basket." It is as much seed as the sower can take in the vessel he carries, or in the folds of the robe which he wears. In literal sowing often as much depends on the nature of the seed as on the character of the soil. It is certainly not otherwise in spiritual life. This seed is the Word; this is the good seed of the kingdom. Nothing but this good seed can save men. The woman in the parable might have put something else than leaven into the meal. It might have been a nugget of gold; it might have been a valuable diamond, but it never would have leavened the meal. So here; whatever else men sow, if it be not this precious seed there shall be no harvest of joy. All of us have listened to sermons ten thousand of which would never convert a soul. Had God converted souls under such preaching it would be putting a premium on the preaching of error. Many of us know preachers, who, themselves, there is reason to fear,

Do not Know the Power of God's grace. They were set apart by their parents to preach the Gospel, as other members of the family were set apart to practice law or medicine, or to enter some line of business. It was merely a profession. The case of such a man comes to me as I speak. In Scotland his parents designated him to the ministry in this spirit. For forty years he preached in one pulpit. A revival would have startled him and his people more than an earthquake. Seldom, except when there were revivals in other churches were there additions to his church. He did sow some seed, but it was so wrapped up in the cold formalities of lifeless dogmas that a harvest could not be expected, and certainly was not secured. We must know Christ as our personal Saviour, as teachers in Sunday Schools, as workers in missions, and as preachers in the pulpit. Our own hearts must glow with Christian love, and out of the abundance of this glowing heart our glad lips must speak. How can men tell others of Christ except they know him for themselves? Surely if the blind lead the blind both must fall into the ditch. We want at this hour what a Chinese convert told his missionary that his people needed—"Men with hot hearts to tell us of the love of Christ."

The Limited Capacity.

A thought suggests itself here which may seem fanciful to some, and yet to me it comes naturally out of the figure employed. The drawing of the seed, as the Word implies, was as much as the sower carried with him in his basket or robe, from the seed-pile in the storehouse. Is it not true spiritually, that the sower can only sow what he carries with him in his own brain and in his own heart? He cannot sow the seed from the storehouse of God's Word except he has first taken it into his own mind and heart. There are truths which no man can understand except as he has felt his way through them. He must by a happy experience know something of the deep things of God's Word before he can lead others into its profound depths. There can be no power in merely mechanical or professional preaching, whether by pastor, teacher, or Christian worker. Only that which you can tell from experience is really your own of God's truth. May this inspired picture of the sower live in our thoughts, and be reproduced in our lives! May each of us go forth weeping, bearing this precious and divine seed, sowing it with faith and hope in the hearts of our fellow-men! We need for the highest success the "blood earnestness" born of intense conviction, and inspired by Christ's constraining love.

The second picture,

"The Incoming Reaper."

We have here in the Hebrew a striking form of expression. It is the combination of the finite tense with the infinitive; it is difficult in our idiom to bring out the exact thought. In some versions it is rendered, "Coming, he shall come." This, however, Dr. Alexander, says, "conveys neither the peculiar form nor the precise sense of the Hebrew phrase." Luther's repetition of the finite tense, most scholars are agreed, gives us the best approximation to the force of the original, "He shall come, he shall come." The certainty of his coming again is the thought; this our version, with its "doubtless shall come again," clearly teaches. This is the first element in this second picture. The tearful sower shall become the joyful reaper. Of this there can be no doubt. There is a law of spiritual as truly as of natural agriculture. No good word spoken for or of God is spoken in vain. For the past few years I have preached with far more certainty of a spiritual harvest than a husbandman can have of the natural harvest when he casts the seed into the ground. God's Word will not return to him void. This he has declared; this we must believe. Doubting it, we are shorn of our power; doubting it, we become dwarfs when we ought to be giants. Has not God declared that seed-time and harvest shall not fail? And they do not. Shall he be more mindful of the harvests of the earth than of the in-gathering of souls? Rather, in the spiritual vineyard we ought to expect a continous harvest. "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed." Here is a continuous harvest; here the fruits of one season are not gathered before the sowing for the next season begins. There ought never to be, in the technical sense, a revival in a church, because there ought never to be anything else. Let us not talk of waiting four months' for harvest. "Lift up your eyes now and behold the fields white already with harvest." The reaper shall certainly come. Sunday School teachers continue your work in this spirit. Parents, teachers, workers in all departments of Christian effort, you do not toil alone. God's eye is upon you. You shall certainly reap, if you faint not. Go forward. Tearfully sow the seed; and joyfully await the harvest.

The Joy of Harvest.

A second feature of the second picture is that the reaper comes with rejoicing. Of course he does. Why should he now be sad? Some of us remember the "Harvest-home" singing and rejoicing when the last sheaf was gathered in. Something like that is here implied. There is no joy like that which comes from successful work for Christ. All the joys of earth are nothing when compared with this. This endures; this allies us to angels and God. This awakens the purest and noblest instincts of the soul. In this joy we feel the throb of Christ's heart. The promise to him is that "He shall see the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied." This joy is mingled even with the gloom of Gethesmane and Calvary. It was for the joy set before him that he endured the Cross and despised the shame. I pity the man who knows nothing of this rejoicing; I envy the man whose soul is constantly overflowing with its blessedness.

But, again, he comes bringing his sheaves with him. This gives additional joy. Behold the picture! He is Returning with his Sheaves.

These he cannot carry... Oxen and twain are introduced. The wagon groans under the burden; the reaper joyfully walks on before. He is abundantly rewarded for his toil; his soul overflows with joy. This assurance would cheer the hearts of the exiles who were still journeying home; it would stimulate those who had returned. It encourages all who are laboring for their own salvation and that of others. You labor not in vain. God shall give the increase. We ought to be willing to labor even if we do not reap. God may sometimes require this of us. One sows, another reaps. Christ taught this lesson. But, thank God, he often permits us to sow and reap. Never to reap requires marvelous faith if the sower be earnest; if he be indifferent he will not long for sheaves. But we may expect them. As God lives we shall not toil in vain. Are you watching for the harvest? Are you willing to stand before Christ without any sheaves? God forbid that this should be the experience of any of you! There is a great Harvest-day Coming.

The field shall be the world; angels shall be the reapers. Oh, that great and terrible day! Oh, that joyous and blessed day! When that day dawns the "ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

But we are all sowers and reapers. The law of spiritual agriculture is as sure as the law of gravitation. You may not expect to sow thistles and reap wheat; you cannot sow the seeds of vice and reap the fruits of virtue. You cannot cheat God. If you sow to the flesh you must reap corruption; if you sow the wind you must reap the whirlwind; if you sow to the world, the flesh and the devil, as the eternal God lives, you shall reap an eternal hell. Judging by your sowing to-day, I ask you in God's name, "What shall the harvest be?" Whatsoever a man soweth, that, precisely that, shall he reap. Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die? Sow to-day, the seeds of a tearful repentance and you shall reap the fruits of a joyful forgiveness. Patience, courage, oh sowers of the good seed, soon we shall stand before the Lord of the harvest joyfully saying, "Here we are and the sheaves thou hast given us."

"JESUS, LOVER OF MY SOUL."

"JESUS, lover of my soul,"
Sang a sentinel one night,
As he paced his lonely beat
In the pale moon's waning light.
"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly;"
Plaintively he sang, and low,
While he felt that death was nigh.

"Cover my defenceless head"—
Softly on the still night air—
"With the shadow of thy wing,"
Sang he thus his sad heart's prayer.
Trustingly he sang the words,
Thinking only God would hear;
But the night winds wafted them
To a hidden foeman's ear.

Through the murky shades of night,
From a reconnoitering band,
There had crept a daring scout
To that picket's lonely stand,
And with sure, unerring aim,
On his foe had drawn a bead,
When, in suppliant tone, he heard,
"Cover my defenceless head."

Down his deadly rifle came;
He, himself a man of prayer,
Could not take the life of one
Trusting in his Saviour's care.
Softly from his covert then
In the shadows he withdrew;
Leaving still that heart to beat,
Which he knew was brave and true.

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
In life's tempest be thou nigh;
And amid its gathering gloom
Let me to thy bosom fly.
When the day of wrath is come—
When thou shalt to judgment bring—
Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of thy wing."

[What is related in these verses was a matter of actual occurrence during the Civil War; and was brought to light at a casual meeting of the persons concerned some years after peace was restored. In a company of travellers, the "sentinel"—now famed for his vocal music—sang the hymn again, and the "scout," being present, thought he must be the same who sang on that notable night: and upon inquiry, in conversation that followed, found that he really was: the singer remembering well the time and place, and the sad, disconsolate feeling that prompted him to sing the prayer of his heart. QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Arthur W. Sweckbridge, Norwood, Mass., writes:

Some time ago, some one asked why the tribe of Levi was chosen to serve at the Tabernacle. It was because at a time when all the rest of Israel had turned away from God, that they stood for him, and in proof of their loyalty to him, they were used of God in chastising the others. Compare Ex. 32: 26-29, with Deut. 10: 8-10.

H. M. Barrow, Ringtown, Pa. In "Songs of the Jordan" in your Feb. 1st issue, you say of the River, "thrice were its waters driven back." I prided myself on being a fair Bible scholar, but that is new to me. I never heard of its going back but twice, by Joshua and Elijah. Please tell me the third time.

The first time was by Joshua (Joshua 3, 16); the second by Elijah (II. Kings 2: 8); and the third time by Elisha (II. Kings 2: 14.)

W. H. Millhause, Lancaster, Pa, Is it a sin to play the game of cards called euchre?

Even without the gambling adjunct, cards are a profitless amusement and, therefore, vanity (see Luke 8: 14; II. Tim. 3: 4, 5), and should be among the things avoided by the Christian. Even in their least objectionable form, they are still a stepping-stone to one of the worst of vices. A small volume dealing with this subject was recently written by Rev. E. P. Marvin and published by A. W. Hall, Syracuse, N. Y.

J. B. Wampler, Blanco, Pa. What is the number of copies of Rev. Dr. Talmage's sermons that are printed per week? And also into how many different languages are they translated and printed? Give me an approximate number of the readers of his sermons weekly?

The combined circulation of the daily papers publishing Dr. Talmage's sermons regularly each Monday in this country exceeds 2,000,000 per issue. There are about 2,300 weekly papers with a circulation approximating 3,500,000 each issue. His sermons appear in religious papers in England with 350,000 circulation each issue. They are translated regularly and published in the German, French, Hungarian, Swedish, Greek, Turkish, Arabic and Japanese languages; circulation about 10,000,000 a week altogether and allowing five readers to each over 50,000,000 are brought face to face with his sermons weekly.

E. L. Duncan, Wylie, Tex. What is the meaning of Rom. 7: 9?

That a man might consider himself blameless and entitled to God's favor until he looked into the law Then he saw himself a sinner, condemned, and with no hope, but in God's mercy.

A Reader, Nyack, N. Y. What is the meaning of Matt 5: 28? As we cannot control our thoughts; must the verse be understood in a figurative sense?

Are you sure you cannot control your thoughts? You can choose whether you will dwell on a given subject, or banish the thought of it as it arises. The word, "lust," implies a motion of the will. A man may innocently wish that he possessed a watch, but he is no longer innocent if he stands at a jeweler's window eagerly gazing at a particular watch and wishing he had an opportunity of stealing it. Christ was showing that sin originated in the heart and therefore morality without change of heart was insufficient for salvation.

Subscriber, Webster City, Iowa. 1. Does Christ intimate in Matt. 7: 14, that the total number saved will be few? 2. What is meant by "this generation" in Matt. 24: 34?

1. He was stating a fact which the observation of his hearers must have confirmed, that the way of the ungodly was easy and many traveled it, while the way of the godly was narrow and those that entered it were few in comparison with those who went the other way. 2. The generation of which he was speaking. The generation that saw the beginning of the signs he had been describing would witness the consummation. That is, the time would be short that they would occupy.

OLD TESTAMENT TESTIMONY.

The Second Advent and the Millennium Predicted and Described in the Old Testament.

BY REV. W. FRITH.

CAN anything be more important in these days, than the obtaining of a clear idea of Christ's Second Advent, of the events that will then take place, of the conditions on which we may participate in its glories and of the duties incumbent on us as to our unconverted and unenlightened friends and kindred. Never was there a time when so many students of God's word were agreed in expecting the coming of Christ in their lifetime. It seems to be, as the apostle said, "At our doors." There is only one source from which we can obtain information and that is the Word of God. Few persons have any idea how much of that God-given book is devoted to this subject. There needs to be more searching of the Bible, and we are strongly encouraged to it.

There is a special benediction pronounced by our ascended Lord, to those of his people who make the predictions of the Apocalypse the subject of their special examination and study: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy and keep those things which are written therein, for the time is at hand." (Rev. 1: 3.) It is evident, therefore, that these predictions which relate to the Second Pre-Millennial Advent of our Lord are of exceptional interest and importance; and that he would have us make these things our special study and meditation in these last times. Few doubt this who read their Bibles, because it is so often declared and reiterated, that none but infidels would venture to question the fact. But many questions are raised as to the time and circumstances of his coming. Yet even these, we think, may be approximately ascertained, if the student of Scripture will only give himself time to examine the various texts which bear upon the subject.

The Hebrew or Old Testament Predictions are generally supposed to refer more largely to the First Advent than to the second, but if all the Messianic Psalms are consulted, and the whole scope of the context duly regarded in the interpretation the predictions which refer to Messiah's Second Advent, kingdom, reign, and rule will be found to far out-number those which refer to his incarnation, life, suffering, service, and death.

Nor indeed is that at all to be wondered at, if we consider the distinct purpose of the two Advents. For the first was but preliminary or introductory to the second. The first was a period of service and suffering for thirty-three years, for a special redemptive purpose; the glorious and ultimate issues of which would be seen in the pacific reign and rule of the "Lord from heaven;"—first during his millennial supremacy on earth and then in his eternal sovereignty with the Father and the Holy Ghost, ever one Jehovah, "world without end."

Examine Ps. 46: 13-14:—Now there can be little doubt, we think, that the ultimate reference of the Hebrew Psalmist, as inspired by the Holy Ghost, is throughout the whole Psam to picture prophetically, in imagery borrowed from the regal customs of Oriental monarchs, the Second Advent of our Divine Redeemer, when he shall come for his chosen bride, in kingly majesty; and also to picture the Church (see verses 13 and 14 especially) "as a bride adorned for her husband." This interpretation is borne out by taking the whole scope of the Psalm, and comparing it also with Rev. 19: 7-8:—"Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready."

Look at Isaiah 53: 10.—In this chapter, of course, the First Advent is unquestionably referred to and described; but these words, "He shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord (Jehovah) shall prosper in his hands," as read in the light of the New Testament, unquestionably refer to the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus, and his millennial reign and eternal kingdom. Without this they have no meaning. And two utterances of his own confirm this interpretation: "It is your Father's [illegible] (Luke 12: 32), and "Let not your heart be troubled;—I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." (John 14: 1-3.)

[illegible] Holy Scripture will find little or [illegible] But the reason why the predictions relative to the Second Coming of Christ for his Bride, the Church, are not so copious in the Old Testament, is, because it was written mainly to a Hebrew people, and, [illegible] to a communion and destiny above the earth.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing March 12. Esther 4: 14; Hebrews 2: 1-3

MORDECAI'S suggestion to the Queen is capable of extensive application: "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Little likely was it that the poor woman had such a thought in her mind. Her beauty and her charms had won for her a high position and there the matter ended. Pleasure and luxury had been attained; what had she to do but to enjoy them? But Mordecai looks deeper. It might be that she was raised to her position to perform a duty in a crisis that God had foreseen. He thinks it was so, and by threats he holds her firmly to the performance of that duty. Looking back through history, his theory is substantiated. At a great crisis God has a man specially qualified to do the duty of the hour. When Christianity was to be preached throughout the world, Paul with his profound learning and restless energy and protected by his Roman citzenship was at hand. When the time was ripe for the Reformation, Luther appeared. When Scotland was in danger of being led back into Romanism by a beautiful and charming woman, the stern, uncompromising Knox stood sentinel over his country's destinies. And in later times Garibaldi, Bismarck, Lincoln and Grant, and many others appeared with special qualifications for performing the special functions required at a particular time. And God's ways in humbler spheres are the same as in the higher spheres. A man may have attained the summit of his ambition in becoming Governor of his State or Mayor of his city; or he may be at the head of an extensive business; or a preacher to whom multitudes listen; or he may be the editor of an influential journal; or the one professing Christian among hundreds of godless employes. Is there some duty needing to be done by such a one? Let him beware how he evades it. It may be that he was placed in his position for the very purpose of performing that duty. "Who knoweth?" It may be a painful duty, he may shrink from it and be tempted to resign his honors rather than undertake it, but he cannot escape the responsibility. There is no position, however humble, without its duties. Every power, every gift entails a corresponding power. The tools in the mechanic's box are not more certainly designed for their respective uses than men are designed for specific duties. God provides the opportunity and it rests with the man to take advantage of it. And to give solemnity to the fact, there is the explicit statement that every man must give account of himself unto God.

THE MARINETTE, WIS., Y. M. C. A.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Marinette, Wis., is to be congratulated on having entered on possession of the commodious building, a picture of which appears on this page. At the dedicatory services, recently held, a history of the work was given which shows what Western men and women can do when they give their energy to an enterprise. It was not until February, 1892, that the project of a new building was fairly launched, and by February, 1893 the Association was installed in its own home. The first impetus to the enterprise was given by Evangelist M. B. Williams, who eloquently advocated it a meeting in the Opera House of Marinette. Pledges were given on that day to the amount of $6,500. In a short time the fund reached nine thousand, and then arrangements were made for the purchase of a site. On July 4th, the corner-stone was laid and by January 24 of this year, the workmen had left the building all ready for the furniture to be put in place. Probably no Y. M. C. A. in the country can point to a record showing such rapidity of execution.

THE NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, AT MARINETTE, WIS.

The work, however, although rapid, is substantial. The material is brick with a front of gray granite. Two stores with a gymnasium sixty-seven feet by forty-four occupy the ground floor. On the second floor are the reception-room, an assembly-room, a tastefully furnished parlor, the boys' room, which is equipped for games and amusements, and the reading-room in which are magazines and papers in English, French, German, Norwegian, Swedish and Polish. These, with the large hall and a kitchen and the rooms for the officers, make up the interior arrangements. The total cost, including the site, was $17,000. But beside this the Associations has many possessions in furniture and fittings which have been supplied by the Ladies Auxiliary Committee with its own funds and are not included in the $17,000 which the Association undertook to pay. The institution is comparatively young. It was founded not quite seven years ago, mainly through the effort of Rev. A. C. Blackman, pastor of the Baptist Church of Marinette. The Secretary is Mr. H. Cordner, who is a most earnest, energetic worker, and whose efforts in carrying this project through to triumphant success have been untiring.

KING'S DAUGHTERS AT THE FAIR.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made by the Order of King's Daughters for a thorough exhibit of the work of the Order at the World's Fair. Every secretary throughout the country has received a request for a photograph of any institution that has been founded or materially helped by the Order or that is being supported by it wholly or in part. These will be exhibited in the King's Daughters' section of the Woman's Building. Efforts are also being made to raise a fund for the distribution of free literature there, and, if possible, to keep a representative in the section during the whole time the Fair is open, to meet and welcome any members of the Order who may visit Chicago. A registry will be kept in the section, where it is hoped that every King's Daughter who comes to the Fair will write her name. June 14 is the day appointed for the Congress of the Order. One of the large halls of the Auditorium has been secured and the whole day will be devoted to the meetings. The President of the Central Committee urges all the members who think of visiting the Fair to arrange if possible to be present on that day to meet the members of the Order from foreign lands, to become personally acquainted with them and to participate in the exercises of the day. She adds: That "as one of the largest societies of women in the world our aim is to aid in all kinds of good work, and it is proper that we should be represented on that one great occasion when woman and woman's work are brought before the consideration of the women of the whole world."

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

THE Executive Committee has changed the date of the International Convention at Indianapolis to July 13–16. The date formerly fixed was July 6–9, but the attention of the Committee has been called to the fact that on those days the Christian Endeavor Convention will be held in Montreal. The Committee wish it to be understood that the change of date does not imply any alliance with the Christian Endeavor Society, but that it is made in the spirit of amity which should exist between societies working for the same object on different lines.—Rev. R. B. McDaniel, of Philadelphia, suggests that some provision be made in the Indianapolis programme to report the work attempted and the results secured under the Convention pledge taken at Detroit to "try and win one soul for Christ during the year."—One of the most encouraging signs of usefulness connected with the Young People's movement is the important part it takes in connection with revivals. The Secretary of the Union at the Baptist Church, Creston, Ia., writes that special services have been held at that Church at which many were converted; and he adds: "Twenty-three of the recent converts have enrolled as active members in the B. Y. P. U., and others will soon follow their example. Our B. Y. P. U. members have been faithful helpers during the meetings. Our Union is growing in many directions. Our membership is now more than eighty."—There is evidence of similar usefulness at Boston, Mass. Mr. B. S. Roberts, of the Ruggles Street Church of that city writing to the Young People's Union says: "Some time ago I wrote of the progress of our work, and again we can report that the Lord has been very near to us and has manifested himself to us in many ways. Since the first of January over 150 have given their hearts to God and they have been mostly young people. Our Union is growing under these new converts and we expect soon to have 300 active members. A mass meeting of our City Unions is to be held at Tremont Temple, Feb. 16, and we expect to have a good time."

AFRICA'S RUINED HOMES.

How the Arab Slavers have Brought Death, Desolation and Misery Upon Them.

FOR centuries the curse of slavery has hung like a gloomy pall over a large portion of the African continent. Notwithstanding the combined efforts of the civilized nations of Europe to check the evil, Arab domination in the interior is still so strong as to apparently defy interference. As a race they believe in slavery, and it is a common experience in native life for the Arab slavers to suddenly descend upon a peaceful and unsuspecting village, fire the huts and crops, shoot and kill all who offer the slightest resistance, and carry off men, women, and children in chains to the sea-coast slave markets where they are sold publicly. Such incidents are of frequent occurrence even now, in the country surrounding the Upper Congo and its tributaries, and in many other parts of Central Africa. As a rule, these encounters generally result in the success of the invaders, who are better armed than their victims, and who have, as allies, native tribes whom they have trained to the blood-thirsty trade of man-hunting.

Many travelers, including Livingstone, Stanley, Burton, Speke, Grant, and Schweinfurth, have written heartrending descriptions of this terrible traffic in human flesh. Christian governments, including those of England, Belgium, France, Germany, and the United States, have done much to lessen the evil, by sending warships and armed forces to fight the Arabs; yet the number of helpless natives who are annually killed or enslaved by the Arabs is very great. Thousands are slain in defence of their humble homes, thousands die on the long march to the slave marts, and hundreds of thousands perish in sudden agony or prolonged torture at the hands of heartless masters. The land they formerly occupied with their wives and children is left to the wild beasts, their homes are razed to the ground, and it sometimes happens that a blackened, smouldering heap of ashes is all that is left to tell that the raiders have passed that way.

One of the most active opponents of the slave trade thus describes the uniform experience of the natives in the many parts of the interior:

All that are captured—men, women, and children—are hurried off to some market in the interior. Then commences for them a series of unspeakable miseries. The slaves are on foot. The men who appear the strongest, and whose escape is to be feared, have their hands tied (and sometimes their feet) in such a fashion that moving becomes a torture to them; and on their necks are placed yokes, which attach several of them together. They march all day; at night, when they stop to rest, a few handfuls of raw sorgho are distributed among the captives. This is all their food. Next morning they must start again. But after the first day or two the fatigue, the sufferings, have weakened a great many. The women and the aged are the first to halt. Then, in order to strike terror into the miserable mass of human beings, their conductors, armed with a wooden bar to economize powder, approach those who appear to be the most exhausted, and deal them a terrible blow on the nape of the neck. The unfortunate victims utter a cry, and fall to the ground in the convulsions of death. The terrified troop immediately resumes its march. Terror has imbued even the weakest with new strength. Each time some one breaks down the same horrible scene is repeated. At night, on arriving at their halting place, after the first days of such a life, a not less frightful scene awaits them. The traffickers in human flesh have acquired by experience a knowledge of how much their victims can endure. A glance shows them those who will soon sink from weariness; then, to economize the scanty food which they distribute, they pass behind these wretched beings and fell them with a single blow. Their corpses remain where they fall, when they are not suspended on the branches of the neighboring trees; and it is close to them that their companions are obliged to eat and sleep as well as they can.

Stanley has declared that a single large band of Arabs, under the leadership of several chiefs, at one time set out on a slave hunt that lasted eleven months. Their operations were between the rivers Congo and Lubiranza—on the left bank, and between the Biyerre and Kirundu. This district measured about 34,750 square miles or considerably larger than Ireland. Their progress was marked at every step by ruined villages and heaps of dead. Their human harvest—which they dragged along with them—included countless numbers of children, many mere infants, boys and girls who had been ruthlessly orphaned and snatched away from their happy village homes. Women, many of them nearly dead of wounds, were bending under loads of food and fruit, and chained and yoked together, were goaded onward in the march by armed Arabs. Not a man among them, all having been killed by the slavers. Youths in rows of twenty, had iron rings about their necks, and the children were secured by copper rings around their tender limbs. Mothers, carrying infants, were chained together in groups, the chains falling across their breasts. In this diabolical fashion 2500 human beings, representing 118 ruined villages, were driven to market and to despair and death. Other travelers have estimated that, reckoning the widespread butchery in the villages and the deaths en route 1000 slaves are thus secured at an average sacrifice of 6500 lives!

Slavery's Horrors: A Native African Killed by Portuguese Mercenaries.

Many of the interior tribes live in clean, well-built towns and villages, where, amid peaceful surroundings, industry and happiness prevail. Major Wissmann, the German traveler, lately described some of these places in the Sankulu and Lomani country. The towns were regular and attractive, the huts clean and the people peaceful and kind. They lived in beautiful villages, miles in length, cultivated the land, and wove cloth, manufactured pottery and iron articles and showed some skill in wood carving. Such a people needed only the Gospel to make them entirely happy. Later, however, their quiet was invaded by the Arab guns of Tippu Tib's hordes, and their fate was sealed. When he passed that way again the paths were no longer clean as they used to be. "A dense growth of grass covers them, and as we approach the skirt of the groves we are struck by the dead silence which reigns. No laughter is to be heard, no sign of a welcome from our old friends. The silence of death breathes over the lofty crowns of the palms, slowly waving in the wind. We enter, and it is in vain we look to the right and left for the happy homesteads and the happy old scenes. Tall grass covers everything, and a charred pole here and there, and a few banana trees, are the only evidences that man once dwelt here. Bleached skulls by the roadside, and the skeletons of human hands tell what has happened here since our last visit."

The Soudan, the vast tract of country surrounding Tanganyika and the great lakes, the Manyema country, the Congo, Uganda, the Equatorial Province of Emin Pasha, and the entire district between the Sahara and Zanzibar, have been devastated by the Arab slavers. In this wicked traffic the Portuguese have for many years been active abettors. They are, next to the Arabs, the worst enemies of the native Africans. So deeply are they detested by the natives that it would seem to be a crime for which no lighter punishment than death could be awarded for a native even to approach in his canoe a portion of the shore in the hands of Portuguese mercenaries.

It is related that a native who had done so was, on his arrival, surrounded and knocked out of his canoe, which was first overturned and then scuttled, or pierced through with holes by a number of shots fired into it. It was thus made useless for further service. Not content with destroying his property, a number of men came over the bank, and soon overcame the defenceless boatman. First they tied his hands behind his back so that he could offer no resistance, and afterward with heavy blows drove him away from the bank. What made the cruelty hardest of all to the poor fellow, perhaps, was the fact of his being so treated by men of his own race and color. A butt of a rifle served as a bludgeon to deal him a knock-down blow on the head. They then forced him to a kneeling position by way of forming a target for their shots, and afterwards the whole gang of mercenaries, standing only five yards off, commenced firing a deady fusilade with, of course, only too deadly effect. This is the scene depicted in in the illustration on this page, and it is a sad commentary on the condition of the Dark Continent at the present time.

A Social Sin.

Is flirtation a sin? writes Rev. Joseph F. Flint in the Young Men's Era. It is not a sin, if by the term is meant the recognition of the exquisite sense of difference between men and women. The more sharply this difference is emphasized in dress, demeanor, and the general conduct of life, the better. The more highly civilized a people becomes, the more striking and attractive appear the feminine characteristics as distinguished from the masculine. The fact is, young people do not see enough of each other in a proper way. There is nothing more helpful and wholesome in the formation of a young man's character than the friendship of a good woman.

The answer is emphatically yes, flirtation is a sin, when there is a sheer descent to what is merely a physical difference, when one fails to guard "this most delicate bloom of all human delight," from the gross and common handling which soils its purity. Thus flirtation becomes the devil's kindling wood to light the fires of secret sensuality. Everything depends upon the motives, the habits, the character, and circumstances of those concerned. Precisely the same outward behavior toward the opposite sex may veil the grossest intentions or may mean nothing at all. Where there is evil in the heart, the eye and the voice will betray it, but when the association of men and women is kept rigidly along mental and spiritual lines, flirtation is out of the question. It is one thing to seek a life-companion, and another and very different thing to play the "masher." In the latter case, flirtation becomes damnation. Married flirts are an abomination, they forfeit what is sweetest and best—pure affection.

AN ORPHAN'S KEEPSAKE.

THE contents of school-boys' desks are sometimes very amusing, says a Western writer. The master at a boarding-school had to superintend the opening of some forty or fifty desks, in connection with a theft of the foot-ball funds. A pipe, a pistol, and other contraband articles were found in some desks. In one a tooth-powder box full of ants; in another, silk-worms and lettuce leaves. A burst of laughter arose when, from another was produced a small leather purse, containing not the stolen money but a young lady's glove.

"When I came, in my eager search, to the desk of nearly the smallest boy in the room," says the master, "a small parcel fell from the owner's hand. A queer whitey-brown paper parcel it was, bound round with string in the most intricate convolutions and series of knots. Of course I had to examine that parcel. As I put out my hand for it, the boy hesitated. The other fellows exchanged glances, as much as to say that we had run the fox to earth at last. Even older and wiser heads thought the same. There stood the frightened, anxious little boy, his blue eyes filled with tears, his fair face all marred with terror, and his soft, wavy, flaxen hair, that gentle hands had doubtless smoothed this many a day at home, all tangled now.

"'Please don't open it, sir,' pleaded the child, for such he was; 'pray, don't open it before the boys.'

"Had I followed my own inclination, I should have given back the parcel unopened. But that could not be. With my pen-knife I cut through the string, undid the many wraps of paper, and disclosed to view a small pill-box, which might well have contained the missing money. I opened the box. There were no ants this time, no money either; but, nestled in a bed of wool, was a dainty locket, and with it a small scrap of paper, on which was written, 'For my dear Percy, with his mother's love.' The locket enclosed a piece of a loving mother's hair, and the little boy was an orphan only a few weeks."

Mistaken Smartness.

EXTRAVAGANCES, exaggerations, unqualified assertions, smartness without basis, repel rather than attract. It is words of soberness and truth that attract attention, sink deep into the heart, and mould opinion and conduct. The clear, clean, conscientious statement has native strength and does far more to convince and persuade than the outbursts of an exuberant rhetoric. Hence the power which in all ages has attached to the utterances of the Holy Writ. They are weighty, but never intemperate.

WAITING FOR THE ANGELS.

WAITING through the days of fever,
Waiting through nights of pain,
For the waft of wings at the portal,
For the sound of songs immortal,
And the breaking of life's long chain.

There is little to do for our dear one—
Only to watch and pray—
As the tide is outward drifting,
As the gates of heaven are lifting,
And its gleam is on her way.

The tasks that so often taxed her,
The children she held so dear,
The strain of the coming and going,
The stress of the mending and sewing,
The burden of many a year,

Trouble her now no longer;
She is past the fret and care.
On her brow is the angel's token,
The look of a peace unbroken.
She was never before so fair.

You see, she is waiting the angels,
And we—we are standing apart,
For us there are loss and sorrow,
For her is the endless morrow,
And the reaping-time of the heart.

CHAPTER I.

HO, FOR THE WESTERN WORLD.

AS a somewhat prolific and copious "story-teller," for, as I have repeatedly stated, I disclaim all right and title to be called a writer of "novels," popularly so-called, I have invariable chosen subjects more or less intimately connected with home and social, and chiefly village and country life. Most of my leading characters are living portraits, and the principal events and "situations" described have their basis in actual fact; mainly such as have come under my own observation. I do not hesitate to avow that all those of my books which have been written on these lines have been written with a definite moral and religious object. They are, everyone of them, "stories with a purpose:" and not the least gratifying among the evidences that have stirred my heart as to the higher successes of my public life, are the warm and unsolicited testimonies that have come to me, from old and young, that I have not labored in vain, nor spent my strength for naught.

In the production of the present story of "Brave Barbara, or the Story of an Old Bible," I have the same high object in view, and I would fain believe that herein, more than ever before, I have succeeded in bearing effective witness to "The Truth as it is in Jesus;" in teaching that the Bible, is the heaven-sent and infinitely precious Guide to faith and conduct; and in proving the happy truth of God's abiding faithfulness and care toward those who in every stress and strain of life are faithful "to him that called them;" and that > Fellow-freedom unknown,

> Standeth God within the shadow,
> Keeping watch above his own.

In the present story, however, I have gone further afield. "Brave Barbara" is a historic character, and her story is that of a once living heroine, one of the vast number of little noted "braves" who have been, and are, the glory of the church of our Lord Jesus Christ through all the centuries. By the wonderful Providence of God, she became the forerunner and pioneer, practically the founder in the United States and Canada of one of the greatest of all the Christian churches; a church which, in its own proper home, is to be numbered only by millions, and which in its Gospel missions to heathen lands is at this day causing large tracts of the spiritual wilderness to "blossom as the rose."

In narrating the story of her noble and even romantic career, with all its intimate surroundings of historic events, gospel movement, and social life, there is little need for the play of fiction, even in minor details, the simple truth itself is sufficiently stirring to supply the close study of "Brave Barbara," and her German Bible with thrilling interest, exciting adventure winning pictures of lives well lived and deeds well done; and of all the "charms of fair romance, seen from the vantage ground of truth." Having thus introduced myself to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I proceed to introduce them to my heroine, Brave Barbara, and to tell the story "as 'twas told to me."
